

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DÉBATES, IN THE
UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND APPOINTED TO MEET 1 FEBRUARY, 1866, IN THE TWENTY-

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, February 1, 1866.

THE EIGHTEENTH PARLIAMENT of the United Kingdom was dissolved by Proclamation on the 6th day of July, 1865; by which Proclamation, also, new Writs were ordered to be issued for calling a new Parliament; which Writs were made returnable on Tuesday the Fifteenth Day of August then next.

The Meeting of the Parliament thus called was adjourned by Writ to the 1st day of November; thence to the 23rd day of November; thence to the 28th day of December; and, lastly, to Thursday the 1st February; on which day it met for Despatch of Business.

THE PARLIAMENT was opened by Commission.

The HOUSE of PEERS being met,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House,

VOL. CLXXXI. [THIRD SERIES.]

“That Her Majesty not thinking fit to be personally present here this day, had been pleased to cause a Commission to be issued under the Great Seal, in order to the opening and holding of this Parliament.”

Then Five of the Lords Commissioners, namely—The LORD CHANCELLOR, The LORD PRIVY SEAL (The Duke of Argyll), The LORD CHAMBERLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Viscount Sydney), The LORD STEWARD OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Earl of Bessborough), and The LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY (The Postmaster General), being in their Robes, and seated on a Form placed between the Throne and the Woolsack, commanded the Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod to let the Commons know “The Lords Commissioners desire their immediate Attendance in this House, to hear the Commission read.”

Who being come;

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said—

“My Lords, and Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

“HER MAJESTY not thinking fit to be present here this day in Her Royal Person, hath been pleased, in order to the opening and holding of this Parliament, to cause Letters Patent to be issued under Her Great Seal, constituting us and several other Lords therein named Her Commissioners, to do all things, in Her Majesty's name, on Her part necessary to be performed in this Parliament: This will more fully appear by the Letters Patent themselves, which must now be read."

Then the said Letters Patent were read by the Clerk. And then

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said—

"My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"We have it in command from Her Majesty to let you know that as soon as the Members of both Houses shall have been sworn, the cause of the calling of this Parliament will be declared to you; and, it being necessary that a Speaker of the House of Commons should be first chosen, it is Her Majesty's pleasure that you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, should repair to the place where you are to sit, and there proceed to the appointment of some proper person to be your Speaker, and that you should present such person as you may choose here To-morrow, at two of the clock, for Her Majesty's Royal approbation."

Then the Commons withdrew.

The House was adjourned during pleasure, to unrobe.

The House was resumed.

PRAYERS.

The LORD CHANCELLOR singly, in the first place, took the Oath at the Table.

ROLL OF THE LORDS—Garter King of Arms attending, delivered at the Table (in the usual Manner) a List of the Lords Temporal in the First Session of the Nineteenth Parliament of the United Kingdom: The same was Ordered to lie on the Table.

WRITS AND RETURNS electing The Viscount Powerscourt a Representative Peer for Ireland in the Room of the late Viscount Gort, deceased, with the Certificate of the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland annexed thereto—Delivered (on Oath), and Certificate read.

Several Lords took the Oath.

House adjourned at half past Five o'clock, till To-morrow, Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, February 1, 1866.

On which day, being the day appointed by the Royal Writ for the meeting of the new Parliament, Sir Denis Le Marchant, Clerk of the House of Commons, and Thomas Erskins May, and Henry Ley, Esquires, Clerks Assistants, attending in the House, and the other Clerks attending according to their duty, Charles Romilly, Esquire, Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in Great Britain, delivered to the said Sir Denis Le Marchant a Book, containing a list of the Names of the Members returned to serve in this Parliament.

Several of the Members repaired to their seats.

A Message was delivered by Captain Spencer Clifford, Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod:

"Gentlemen,

"The Lords, authorized by virtue of Her Majesty's Commission, desire the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the House of Peers, to hear the Commission read."

Accordingly, the House went up to the House of Peers;—and a Commission having been read for opening and holding the Parliament, The Lords Commissioners directed the House to proceed to the Election of a Speaker, and present him To-morrow at Two of the clock in the House of Peers, for the Royal approbation.

And the House being returned;

CHOICE OF A SPEAKER.

The RIGHT HONOURABLE WILLIAM MONSELL, addressing himself to the Clerk (who, standing up, pointed to him, and then sat down), said:—Gentlemen, it is now our duty to proceed, in obedience to the commands of Her Majesty, to the exercise of our undoubted right and privilege of electing a Speaker. This duty is no trivial or merely formal one, for the dignity of the office is commensurate with the influence and the widely-extended power of the Assembly over which he is to preside; and our ancestors, through many generations, have shown their sense of the importance of the office by the eminent men they have successively placed in that Chair. Yet high and important as were the responsibilities and duties of the men who were elected to the office—in the last century, such men, for instance, as Mr. Onslow and Lord Grenville—the duties and responsibilities of the Speaker in the present day are far greater even than were those which attached to those illustrious men. In one particular, of course, the duties of both are precisely the same. It was the first and most sacred duty in both times to preserve inviolate the privileges of this House, on which the liberties of the people of this country depend; and I think that anybody who has surveyed the history of past years must feel that that duty is one which requires as much watchfulness, as much care, and as much firmness in the Speaker of the present day as it did in the days to which I have alluded. But if we come, for instance, to the question of private business, and if we look back merely to the commencement of the present century, we shall find Mr. Wilberforce insisting more than once on the necessity of electing a Speaker of the highest possible qualifications, on account, he said, of the enormous importance of the private business of the House, and the large amount of money that was involved in the proper discharge of it. But the private business of this House, I need not remark, was in those days very different from what it is now. I believe that the principal private business then was connected with Canal Bills, which, in fifty years, amounted to only £11,000,000 of money; but during the last Session the private Bills presented to this House involved £128,000,000 of money. For the proper discharge of that most important business of the House the assistance of eminent Committees was called into requisition during the last Parliament; but it must be perfectly obvious, I think, to every Gentleman, that it is upon the directing mind of the Speaker—upon his determination to arrange, in every way he can, that the business should be carried on in a cheap and satisfactory way, without sacrificing in the slightest degree the influence and power of this House—it is upon him, I say, that the proper arrangement and discharge of that duty mainly depends. Or, take another instance. At the time to which I have alluded the debates of this House did not penetrate through any portion of the country—indeed, the debates were hardly reported at all. I believe it is well known that Mr. Pitt expressed his desire to see some one oration of Bolingbroke, and no such oration was to be found; and that in the case of Lord Chatham it is to the accidental circumstance of a gentleman of most powerful memory being present on the delivery of one of his greatest orations that we owe its preservation. But now, the debates of the House, by means of a cheap and accurate press, are circulated throughout every part of these kingdoms, and indeed very much beyond their bounds. These debates are the chief means of forming the public opinion, and I may say the political education, of this country. Well, I need hardly remark that it is on the manner in which the Speaker discharges his duty, it is on his firmness and impartiality, that the completeness of these debates depends; it is on the enforcement of those rules which can alone prevent majorities from tyrannizing over minorities, and which can alone make every different shade of political opinions heard in the debates, that the completeness of the political education of the people depends. There is, of course, another most important duty of the Speaker—that of preserving the high standard of order and of regularity in the conduct of our debates, which distinguishes this Assembly from, I believe, every other political assembly in the world. And when I refer to the conduct of our debates I think I only anticipate the feeling of every Gentleman in this House, when I speak of the loss which we have lately sustained. Our difficulties, and the difficulties of the Speaker, are of course increased by the loss of one whose large and generous nature, loyal in friendship, tolerant to opposition, was mellowed by age, and by a Parliamentary experience greater perhaps than that which ever belonged to any former statesman. We all of us, to whatever political party we belong, who had the honour of sitting in this House with Lord Palmerston, all of us recognized in him that unerring instinct which enabled him to stay the rising wave of angry controversy. We felt the mild and softening influence in debate of his genial, kindly, and sympathetic nature, and of a good humour that, under the most difficult circumstances, never failed to exercise upon us the happiest effects. Under these circumstances, I think myself fortunate in being able to submit to you as Speaker no new or untried man, but one who has already discharged the duties with honour to himself, and who has earned the respect of every one in the House. As to those who sat in the last Parliament I need only appeal to their memories. They all know how careful he was in watching over our privileges; they know how attentive he was to the private business of the House, and how, under his direction, its conduct has been improved. Those who had any matters of difficulty to consult him about can bear witness to his kindness and the manner in which he always received them, thinking nothing of trouble in giving them the benefit of his most sagacious advice. And as to those who did not sit in the last Parliament and are now Members of this House, if they require anything to verify the truth of the assertion which I make—with, I am sure, the concurrence of every Member of the late Parliament—they have only to look to that most valuable addition that has lately been made to Hansard, where they will see collected all the decisions that the Speaker made during each year of the late Parliament. They will there find, I think, a clearness, a decision, and a wisdom which entitled the Gentleman who made those decisions to the confidence of the House over which he presided. If I may be permitted to refer to what I consider an accurate description of the Right Hon. John Evelyn Denison, I would quote the language applied somewhat more than a hundred years ago to his illustrious predecessor Mr. Speaker Onslow as marking his peculiar qualifications for the office—

“A thorough knowledge of the orders and methods of Parliament, a clearness and readiness in delivering opinions in matters of the greatest intricacy, an impartiality in judging on all occasions.”

These were the qualifications of Mr. Speaker Onslow, and these have been proved to be the qualifications during two Parliaments of the right hon. Gentleman whom I have the honour to propose to you. It would be improper in me, and I am sure it would be painful to him, if in his presence I were to say anything more of those merits and qualifications which we all recognize, and I, therefore, conclude by proposing that the Right honourable John Evelyn Denison do take the Chair of this House as Speaker.

EARL GROSVENOR: I rise to second the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the county of Limerick. Under other circumstances, I should have felt that the task had fallen into somewhat unworthy hands; but as I understand there is no opposition to the election of the right hon. Gentleman, who has already filled the office of Speaker during two Parliaments with great credit, and to the entire satisfaction of the House, it is not necessary that I should add anything to what has been already so well said. I may, however, be allowed to say that I am confident, if the right hon. Gentleman be re-elected, he will not fail in that great ability with which he has hitherto discharged the duties of his office, that there will be no diminution in his watchful vigilance over the public interests, and that he will evince the same strict impartiality that uniformly characterized his presidency over our debates, while holding the office in former Parliaments. The office of Speaker is one which requires peculiar qualifications, and demands a considerable amount of personal sacrifice, while at the same time it has great dignity and no small influence attached to it. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman possesses all the qualifications referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick; and in seconding the Motion which has been made, I am sure the House will agree with me in wishing he may have health and strength, whether this Parliament may be a long or short one, adequately to discharge his peculiar duties, not only with satisfaction to himself, but to every Member of the present House of Commons. I beg to second the Motion of the right hon. Member for Limerick county.

MR. BRIGHT: I am well assured the House will not suppose that I rise to make any opposition to the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman behind me. If need were, I could say a good deal in its favour. I was not here at the time when the right hon. Gentleman below me was elected Speaker on the first occasion—I was not in England at the time; but I read of his election with great pleasure, and thought it about the very best choice the House could have made. After eight or nine years' experience, I believe, with the right hon. Member for Limerick, that the course of the right hon. Gentleman has been marked by impartiality, by dignity, and by success. In fact, without impartiality in such a position there could be no dignity, and without dignity there could be no success. I therefore give my hearty support to the proposition which has been made. But I rise for the purpose of making a suggestion with reference to a matter which I believe

The Right Hon. William Moncell

I am permitted to speak on upon the present occasion; and if any one doubts it, I might refer to a very eminent and very useful Member of this House—the late Mr. Joseph Hume—who introduced the subject on a similar occasion. I may state that I have not mentioned to any Member the question I wish for a moment to bring under the notice of the House, and I only, therefore, am entirely responsible for mentioning it. I refer to the practice which has prevailed for generations, I suppose, and which obtains even to this time, of requiring that Members of the House who accept invitations to the official dinners or evening parties of the Speaker should appear either in court dress or uniform. Many Members of this House may think this is a very trifling matter, and I do not intend to contest it with them; but if anybody does think it trifling, I hope he will not refuse to concede that the matter is one for fair consideration. My own impression is that this custom is a little out of date, especially among the Members of a popular Assembly. There are, I believe, 160 or 170 gentlemen coming to this Parliament who were not here in the last or any preceding Parliament. Well, they have not yet been initiated into these matters; but I think the fact of there being so many new Members here makes it the more proper that I should now mention this subject. The Speaker of this House is only superior to any other Member by reason of our choice; and I cannot see—I believe no man living can see—that, except for this old custom, there is any necessity or advantage in the Speaker being compelled by this practice to require that all Members of this House who accept his invitations should appear in court dress or in military costume. It may be thought mean to speak of cost. In a House where there are so many rich men—and all are supposed to be rich who come here—I do not speak of cost; but I remember an hon. Member holding the rank of a colonel in the army once complaining, and complaining, too, with a seriousness of manner, that it had taken fifty guineas to put him inside a suitable dress in which to appear at the Speaker's table. That may be thought by many to be a small matter, and perhaps it is; but if our Speaker is but the first among equals, and is made what he is in honour and dignity by the choice of the House, I see no necessity why—even if such things be necessary in the circles of Courts—such a practice should be retained among the members of a popular assembly. I will state a case in point. Last year the House sustained a heavy loss—and I a much heavier loss than any other hon. Member—in the removal for evermore of a dear and lamented friend of mine, without whose presence here I feel myself almost alone. Well, for twenty-four years—from 1841 to 1865—he was a Member of this House, yet during the whole of that period he felt himself restrained from accepting any official invitation either from Viscount Eversley, when he held the office of Speaker, or from the right hon. Gentleman below me (Mr. Denison) while he has occupied the Chair. Now, my lamented friend was not a man of eccentricities; he was a man to whose merit the whole world has borne testimony, and posterity will say that he was one of the most eminent men who ever adorned the Parliament of this country. But so strongly did he feel on this question that he was restrained during the whole of that twenty-four years from dining with the Speaker of this House, or from attending his official evening parties and levées. Well, there have been to my certain knowledge other Members of this House less eminent than he, but not less entitled to be regarded in a matter of this kind, who have entertained the same feeling. I cannot, therefore, see why this point should be thought an absolute trifle, or, if it be a trifle, that even a small minority should be forced to concur with the majority in respect to it. If there be any country gentleman who likes to appear in decorated apparel, or if there be any homely manufacturer from the North who is gratified by figuring in the blazing garments of a deputy-lieutenant, I do not object to it in the least. I should like every man to please himself in this matter. But if there are some of us, as is the case with myself, and, I believe, many more, who would like to make their appearance in a quieter costume, with less that is gorgeous and astounding about them, why should not their taste be gratified also? This is not a subject which I expect the House to debate, nor do I even say that it is worth debating. I throw it out only as a suggestion which I trust my right hon. Friend who is about, with the unanimous consent of the House, to take the Chair, will consider. And if he can abolish this Act of Uniformity and establish an Act of Toleration, so that, provided we appear at the entertainments of the Speaker as we should at the houses of each other if invited to dine there, we should not be thought to transgress the rules of the House, I believe that then some small burden will be removed from the minds of some Members, and that the dignity of the Speaker will in no degree be impaired.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not rise for the purpose of saying anything in addition to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick, for that is quite unnecessary, but to say a single word, as definitely as the subject will admit of, to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Birmingham. He has incidentally called the attention of the House, as it may have been quite competent for him to do, to a matter which may undoubtedly be connected with the convenience, and probably also with the feelings and opinions, of some hon. Members of this House; but I think the House in general will feel that my right hon. Friend (Mr. Denison), whom it is proposed to elect to a most important office in this House, could not be expected by the House, and could not be expected especially by the hon. Member for Birmingham—I will not say to express off-hand a judgment on a matter of this grave importance, but to commit himself in any way with regard to it without having a very full opportunity for consideration. I would, therefore, only add that I am satisfied that any communication which any hon. Gentleman may have to make, either now or at any future time, to my right hon. Friend touching the dignity or the comfort of any Member of this House will receive the fullest consideration at the hands of the right hon. Gentleman, with his accustomed courtesy and kindness.

The House then calling Mr. EVELYN DENISON to the Chair—

Mr. EVELYN DENISON stood up in his place and said: I offer my respectful thanks to the House for the honour they propose to confer upon me. I am much beholden to my right hon. Friend and my noble Friend for the manner in which they have proposed and seconded my nomination to the Chair. I can hardly venture to assume to myself much of the commendation which they have been pleased to pass upon me. The favour of the House, the gracious manner in which that favour has been bestowed by its choice of me to fill the Chair, for the third time, by a unanimous voice, might unduly elevate me in my own imagination, had I not a strong and abiding sense of many imperfections and shortcomings; and I attribute the favour of the House, to its proper cause—its too indulgent appreciation of my imperfect services. That I have endeavoured to do my duty as a zealous and faithful servant of the House I can truly say. What I have been able to do you know, and it would not become me to enlarge upon it. Neither would you wish me to enter into professions for the future. I will not, therefore, detain you with one unnecessary word, but simply say that I submit myself with all respect to the desire of the House.

The House then unanimously calling Mr. EVELYN DENISON to the Chair, he was taken out of his place by the said Right honourable William Monsell, and the Right honourable Earl Grosvenor, and by them conducted to the Chair.

Then Mr. SPEAKER ELECT, standing on the upper step, said: I return my thanks to the House once more from this Chair. On looking round the House I miss—we all miss—one familiar face. The House has sustained a great loss. We have lost him who was the foremost man among us, the leader of this House—who, by his great abilities, his long experience, and a rare combination of qualities, had conciliated to himself in a remarkable degree the confidence of this House. We remember often when, after long sittings, the patience of the House was well-nigh wearied out, how his good temper, his genial spirit, smoothed the ruffled surface, and sent us to our homes at peace with each other and with him. I do not propose to speak an eulogium on Lord Palmerston. The House will permit me these few words of regret, of esteem, and of grateful friendship. Of the great body of the House, my Colleagues in past Parliaments, whom I am happy to see again around me, I ask a renewal of that generous support which they have on former occasions afforded me. There is a large number of Members present who have seats in this House for the first time. They succeed to no ignoble inheritance. I would venture to say to them that the fame of this House, both for the conduct of debates and the transaction of business, depends, in no small degree, on the rules and orders which it has formed for its own government. A study of these rules would be useful to every Member, and the better they are known the more certain I should feel of general co-operation in my endeavour to uphold them. If any difficulty connected with the business of the House should present itself to any Member, I hope he will do me the favour to communicate with me. I shall always be happy to receive him and to confer with him in the spirit of frank and friendly counsel.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Mr. Speaker—I presume, Sir, in my own name, and I am sure I may say in the name of the whole of the Members of this House, to tender to you our most cordial congratulations on your having been for the third time, by the unanimous voice of this House, placed at the head of the Commons of England. Sir, you have succeeded to the Chair amid growing duties and growing responsibilities. The wants of modern society make themselves felt within these walls, both by the increasing amount of public business and by the increasing amount also of what we term the private business of the House. Your duties in the latter respect are in a great degree withdrawn from the observation of the world, and partially withdrawn even from the observation of the Members of this House; but the long experience of those conversant with that important branch of our occupations has convinced them that that department has never been more carefully and more efficiently attended to than during the period while you, Sir, have occupied the Chair. As regards the public business of the House, all those who hear me, and, I may add, the public out of doors, are competent judges of the manner in which you sustained your arduous functions, and which has been borne testimony to with a force far beyond any that can be expressed by words—by the silent and unanimous vote of the House which has now placed you in the Chair. But it is true that in some respects you have difficulties to confront even beyond those arising out of the constantly increasing calls on the time, diligence, and wisdom of the House. We have seen within a generation a great change in the composition of this House, and likewise a great change in the composition of those constituencies by whom it was chosen. At the period of the Reform Act the transition which this House then underwent (the effect of the important alterations of a constitutional character then made), was immensely softened by the continuing presence on the Benches of the House of a number of men who had attained distinction and acquired authority under the old Parliamentary system. From year to year, from Parliament to Parliament, one by one, they have passed away. So lately as on the last occasion when you, Sir, were chosen to fill that Chair, there were still remaining here three persons who had attained to great Parliamentary distinction, and who had filled high offices before the passing of the Reform Bill. I mean, first, my noble Friend Lord Russell, who has been removed, in acknowledgment of his public services, to the other House of Legislature; secondly, my right hon. Friend Sir James Graham, than whom few, indeed, of the Members of this House made more valuable contributions to the conduct of its public business; and the last person to whom I allude, and the most eminent of them in respect to the place he occupied in the favour and attachment of this House, I need hardly mention—Lord Palmerston. After what has been so well said by my right hon. Friend behind me, and by yourself, Sir, I need hardly dilate on the character of that distinguished man, the more especially as it may be my duty very shortly to make a proposition to the House which will naturally introduce the subject. But one thing I will venture to say. You, Sir, have glanced at the loss which you yourself experienced by the lamented death of so great and experienced a statesman. There is one person at least in the House who may venture to compete with you in the sense of that loss, and that is the humble individual who has the honour now to address you, considering the responsibilities which have devolved on him. Sir, we have, as was to be expected after the lapse of so many years during which the late Parliament existed, an unusual number of Gentlemen chosen for the first time to the high duty of representing the interests of their country within these walls. But there is amazing strength in the traditions of this House, and there is unequalled aptitude among English Gentlemen for conforming to the spirit of those traditions. It is remarkable to observe, from Parliament to Parliament, how little those who watch our proceedings from without, or those who take part in those proceedings within these walls are able to remark any difference in the firmness and regularity and discipline with which the House discharges its high functions, in consequence of the infusion of new Members which constantly follows a dissolution; and, however much we may lament the loss of those distinguished men to whom I have referred, we may still reflect that there remain among us, on both sides of the House, men whose ability, experience, character, and weight will enable them to afford you efficient aid in the discharge of those arduous duties which will devolve, Sir, upon you. We may, Sir, presume to look forward with confidence to the continuance of that vigilant jealousy for the liberties, and that high regard for the honour of this Assembly, which are the two main pillars of the dignity and efficiency of the House. You, Sir, will contribute your share from the elevated position you now occupy to the accomplishment of that task, and we in our several spheres shall be ready to second you to the best of our ability. In conclusion, allow me to express the wish that has already been uttered by my noble Friend behind me, that health and strength may be spared to you for many years to discharge the high functions to which you have been called, in the manner most pleasing to your own mind, and in a way calculated to elevate you to the highest degree in the eyes of the House and of the country.

MR. DISRAELI: I hope, Sir, I may be permitted, on behalf of Gentlemen on this side of the House, to offer you our congratulations on the event, so gratifying to the House, which has just occurred; and the more so, as from the mode in which the business of this morning has been conducted, you might, if I were silent, for a moment suppose that your elevation to the Chair has been a matter of indifference to us. I believe I am expressing a very general feeling on their part when I say that regret is felt here that your nomination to the Chair was not seconded from this side. On the previous occasion that mode was followed. There are, I believe, other precedents for such a course of proceeding under such circumstances; and if precedents did not exist, I think we ought to have made one, because this is an occasion on which the general and cordial feeling of the House could not be shown in too striking and significant a manner. You have to-day, Sir, been re-elected to the Chair for the third time. I have myself always been of opinion that re-election to the Chair is, in fact, a greater distinction than the original choice. Political manoeuvres and Parliamentary passions may contrive to raise an individual to the elevated post you now occupy, but they cannot keep him there, Sir. For that result the possession of great and personal qualities is necessary—natural courtesy, adequate learning, firmness and impartiality, and, above all, that inspiring sense of honour which is our surest guide in the perplexities of public life, and which ever has been, and, I trust, ever will be, the characteristic of English gentlemen. It is because the House sees that you, Sir, possess those qualities that you have been re-elected to the Chair for the third time this day; and it is because we feel on this side of the House that you possess those qualities that I am authorized, on behalf of Gentlemen here, to offer you the tribute of our respect and congratulation. I would not have said more, had it not been for some unexpected allusions made to another subject. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer alluded to increased responsibilities falling on him; but I can assure the right hon. Gentleman of that of which he need hardly be reminded; for, though he appears now for the first time as leader of this House, yet he has sat in it for many years, and been one of its most eminent and distinguished Members: his experience, then, must have taught him that on all occasions, when the order and honour of this House are concerned, the leader of the House may appeal for support to those sitting opposite to him with the same confidence as to the Members occupying seats on his own side. Sir, I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman that there is one cause why on this occasion, in the responsible office which he now occupies, he may feel some distrust. I do not think that it is possible for us to re-assemble under this roof—many of us who have sat in all the Parliaments of the Queen, and some of us who have been Members of the House during three reigns—and not feel emotion when they mark that the familiar form which you, Sir, have referred to can no longer be observed among us—a form connected so intimately with the history of this country, and with the most important transactions of this House of Parliament. It is impossible to deny that the disappearance of such a character from the scene—of so much sagacity, of so much experience, and, I may say, of so much fame—must in some degree, and for some time, derogate from the authority even of the House of Commons. But,

Sir, it is not on this occasion that I wish to refer to the character of a great statesman, but rather to the happy disposition of the man, which lent, indeed, a charm to the labours and anxieties of public life. By his good temper and good sense he facilitated the course of public business beyond what it is easy to ascertain, or even, perhaps, to imagine. I am sure it must be the general sentiment among us, that the influence over our debates will not soon cease of his genial experience and his moderating wisdom. But, notwithstanding this loss, I will express my hope that this present Parliament, in intelligence and public spirit, will not be inferior to the preceding Parliaments of this happy reign.

House adjourned at a quarter
after Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, February 2, 1866.

The House met; and Five of the LORDS COMMISSIONERS, namely—The LORD CHANCELLOR, The LORD PRIVY SEAL (The Duke of Argyll), The LORD CHAMBERLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Viscount Sydney), The LORD STEWARD OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Earl of Bessborough), and The EARL OF DALHOUSIE, being in their robes, and seated on a form placed between the Throne and the Woolsack, commanded the Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod to let the Commons know "The Lords Commissioners desire their immediate attendance in this House."

Who being come;

SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, PRESENTED AND APPROVED.

MR. EVELYN DENISON, Speaker

"MY LORDS,

"I have to acquaint your Lordships that, in obedience to Her Majesty's commands, Her Majesty's faithful Commons, in the exercise of their undoubted right and privilege, have proceeded to the election of a Speaker, and that their choice has fallen upon myself. I now present myself at your Bar, and submit myself with all humility to Her Majesty's gracious approbation."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR;

"MR. DENISON,

"We are commanded to assure you that Her Majesty is fully sensible of your zeal for the public service, of your ample sufficiency to perform the important duties which her faithful Commons have selected you to discharge, and Her Majesty does most readily approve and confirm you as their Speaker."

Then MR. SPEAKER said,

"With profound respect and gratitude I bow to Her Majesty's commands. And it is now my duty, in the name and on the behalf of the Commons of the United Kingdom, by humble Petition to Her Majesty, to lay claim to their ancient undoubted rights and Privileges, especially to freedom from arrest and molestation of their persons and servants; to freedom of speech in debate; to free access to Her Majesty whenever occasion shall require; and that the most favourable construction should be put upon all their proceedings. And for myself, I humbly pray that any errors that may occur in the discharge of these duties may be imputed to me alone, and not to Her Majesty's faithful Commons."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR;

"MR. SPEAKER,

"We have it further in command to inform you that Her Majesty most readily confirms all the rights and privileges which have ever been granted to or conferred upon the Commons by any of Her Royal predecessors.

"With respect to yourself, although Her Majesty is sensible that you stand in no need of such assurance, Her Majesty will ever put the most favourable construction upon your words and actions."

Then the Commons withdrew.

Several Lords—took the Oath.

Several Lords—took the Oath prescribed by the Act 10th Geo. IV. to be taken by Peers professing the Roman Catholic Religion.

House adjourned at Five o'clock, to

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, February 2, 1866.

The House being met, and Mr. SPEAKER ELECT having taken the Chair, a Message was delivered by the Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod :

"MR. SPEAKER,

"The Lords authorized by virtue of Her Majesty's Commission, desire the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the House of Peers."

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker Elect, with the House, went up to the House of Peers, where he was presented to the said Lords Commissioners for Her Majesty's approbation.

Then the LORD CHANCELLOR, one of the said Lords Commissioners, signified Her Majesty's approbation of Mr. Speaker Elect.

The House being returned;

MR. SPEAKER said: I have to report to the House that, in the House of Peers, Her Majesty, by Her Commissioners, was pleased to approve the choice made of myself for your Speaker; and that I have, in your name and on your behalf, made claim and humble petition to Her Majesty for all your ancient and undoubted rights and privileges, particularly freedom from arrest of your persons and servants, freedom of speech in debate, free access to Her Majesty whenever occasion should require, and that the most favourable construction should be placed on all your proceedings. All these Her Majesty, by her Commissioners, has been pleased to grant and accede in as ample a manner as they have been granted and acceded to your predecessors on every former occasion. I have now to remind the House that it is their duty to take the oaths required by law.

MR. SPEAKER then took and subscribed the Oath, first alone; and after him several other Members took and subscribed the Oath; and several Members professing the Roman Catholic Religion took and subscribed the Roman Catholic Oath; and several Members professing the Jewish Religion took and subscribed the Jewish Oath.

House adjourned at half after Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, February 6, 1866.

Several Lords—Took the Oath.

The Session was opened by THE QUEEN in Person.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

HER MAJESTY, being seated on the Throne, adorned with Her Crown and Regal Adornments, and attended by Her Officers of State:—The PRINCE OF WALES (in his Robes) sitting in his chair on Her Majesty's right hand—(the Lords being in their Robes)—commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, through the Deputy Lord Great Chamberlain, to let the Commons know "It is Her Majesty's Pleasure they attend Her immediately in this House."

Who being come, with their Speaker;

The LORD CHANCELLOR, taking direction from HER MAJESTY, said;—

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"It is with great Satisfaction that I have recourse to your Assistance and Advice.

"I HAVE recently declared My Consent to a Marriage between My Daughter Princess Holena and Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein Sonderbourg-Augustenburg. I trust this Union may be prosperous and happy.

"THE Death of My Beloved Uncle The King of the Belgians has affected Me with profound Grief. I feel great Confidence, however, that the Wisdom which He evinced during His Reign will animate His Successor, and preserve for Belgium her Independence and Prosperity.

"MY Relations with Foreign Powers are friendly and satisfactory, and I see no Cause to fear any Disturbance of the general Peace.

"THE Meeting of the Fleets of France and England in the Ports of the respective Countries has tended to cement the Amity of the Two Nations, and to prove to the World their friendly Concert in the Promotion of Peace.

"I HAVE observed with Satisfaction that the United States, after terminating successfully the severe Struggle in which they were so long engaged, are wisely repairing the Ravages of Civil War. The Abolition of Slavery is an Event calling forth the cordial Sympathies and Congratulations of this Country, which has always been foremost in showing its Abhorrence of an Institution repugnant to every Feeling of Justice and Humanity.

"I HAVE at the same Time the Satisfaction to inform you that the Exertions and Perseverance of My Naval Squadron have reduced the Slave Trade on the West Coast of Africa within very narrow Limits.

"A CORRESPONDENCE has taken place between My Government and that of the United States with respect to Injuries inflicted on American Commerce by Cruisers under the Confederate Flag. Copies of this Correspondence will be laid before you.

"THE Renewal of Diplomatic Relations with Brazil has given Me much Satisfaction; and I acknowledge with Pleasure that the good Offices of My Ally The King of Portugal have contributed essentially to this happy Result.

"I HAVE to regret the Interruption of Peace between Spain and Chili. The good Offices of My Government, in conjunction with those of the Government of The Emperor of the French, have been accepted by Spain, and it is My earnest Hope that the Causes of Disagreement may be removed in a Manner honourable and satisfactory to both Countries.

"THE Negotiations which have been long pending in Japan, and which have been conducted with great Ability by My Minister in that Country, in conjunction with the Representatives of My Allies in Japan, have been brought to a Conclusion which merits My entire Approbation. The existing Treaties have been ratified by the Mikado; it has been stipulated that the Tariff shall be revised in a Manner favourable to Commerce, and that the Indemnity due under the Terms of the Convention of October 1864 shall be punctually discharged.

"I HAVE concluded a Treaty of Commerce with The Emperor of Austria, which I trust will open to that Empire the Blessings of extended Commerce, and be productive of important Benefits to both Countries.

"THE deplorable Events which have occurred in the Island of Jamaica have induced Me to provide at once for an impartial Inquiry, and for the due Maintenance of Authority during that Inquiry, by appointing a distinguished Military Officer as Governor and Commander of the Forces. I have given him the Assistance of Two able and learned Commissioners, who will aid him in examining into the Origin, Nature, and Circumstances of the recent Outbreak, and the Measures adopted in the course of its Suppression. The Legislature of Jamaica has proposed that the present Political Constitution of the Island should be replaced by a new Form of Government. A Bill upon this subject will be submitted for your Consideration.

"PAPERS on these Occurrences will be laid before you.

"PAPERS on the present state of New Zealand will be laid before you.

"I HAVE given Directions for the Return to this Country of the greater Portion of My Regular Forces employed in that Colony.

"I WATCH with Interest the Proceedings which are still in progress in British North America with a view to a closer Union among the Provinces, and I continue to attach great importance to that Object.

"I HAVE observed with great Concern the extensive Prevalence, during the last few Months, of a virulent Distemper among Cattle in Great Britain, and it is with deep Regret, and with sincere Sympathy for the Sufferers, that I have learnt the severe Losses which it has caused in many Counties and Districts. It is satisfactory to know that Ireland and a considerable Part of Scotland are as yet free from this Calamity, and I trust that by the Precautions suggested by Experience, and by the Divine Blessing on the Means which are now being employed, its further Extension may be arrested.

"THE Orders which have been made by the Lords of My Privy Council by virtue of the Powers vested in them by Law, with a view to prevent the spreading of this Disease, will be laid before you; and your Attention will be called to the Expediency of an Amendment of the Law relating to a Subject so deeply affecting the Interests of My People.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I HAVE directed that the Estimates of the ensuing Year shall be laid before you. They have been prepared with a due Regard to Economy, and are at the same Time consistent with the Maintenance of Efficiency in the Public Service.

"THE Condition of Trade is satisfactory.

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"A CONSPIRACY, adverse alike to Authority, Property, and Religion, and disapproved and condemned alike by all who are interested in their Maintenance, without Distinction of Creed or Class, has unhappily appeared in Ireland. The Constitutional Power of the ordinary Tribunals has been exerted for its Repression, and the Authority of the Law has been firmly and impartially vindicated.

"A BILL will be submitted to you, founded on the Report of the Royal Commission, on the Subject of Capital Punishment, which I have directed to be laid before you.

"BILLS will be laid before you for amending and consolidating the Laws relating to Bankruptcy, and for other Improvements in the Law.

"MEASURES will also be submitted to you for extending the System of Public Audit to Branches of Receipt and Expenditure which it has not hitherto reached, and for amending the Provisions of the Law with respect to certain Classes of Legal Pensions.

"YOUR Attention will be called to the Subject of the Oaths taken by Members of Parliament, with a view to avoid unnecessary Declarations, and to remove invidious Distinctions between Members of different Religious Communities in Matters of Legislation.

"I HAVE directed that Information should be procured in reference to the Rights of Voting in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament for Counties, Cities, and Boroughs.

"WHEN that Information is complete, the Attention of Parliament will be called to the Result thus obtained, with a view to such Improvements in the Laws which regulate the Rights of Voting in the Election of Members of the House of Commons as may tend to strengthen our free Institutions, and conduce to the Public Welfare.

"IN these and in all other Deliberations I fervently pray that the Blessing of Almighty God may guide your Counsels to the Promotion of the Happiness of My People."

Then HER MAJESTY was pleased to retire:

And the Commons withdrew.

House adjourned during pleasure.

House resumed.

QUESTION.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that during the last Session of Parliament he had often called the attention of their Lordships to the condition of the British Consul and the British subjects imprisoned in Abyssinia, in the hope that he might obtain some definite information upon the subject. He had not, however, fully succeeded in his object, and he now asked the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he had any intelligence to communicate respecting the matter? He particularly desired to be informed as to the last account that had been received of the condition in which the prisoners were; whether Mr. Rassam had advanced at all in the mission which was intrusted to him, and which had been so long in hand; and whether any further efforts had been made during the long interval which had elapsed since Mr. Rassam set out to secure the liberation of those prisoners. As he had not given notice of his intention to ask the Question, but merely mentioned the matter to the noble Earl a few minutes before, he should not press for a definite answer at present.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, he would prefer postponing his answer.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY ON HER MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY: My Lords, I rise for the purpose of moving the presentation of a humble Address to Her Majesty in reply to the gracious Speech with which it has pleased Her Majesty to open the present Parliament. I do so, I can assure your Lordships, with the utmost diffidence in my own power, and, if I had simply consulted my inclination, I would have readily conceded the task to some other Member of your Lordships' House, who from greater experience and talent would have been better able to do justice to the numerous and important topics contained in Her Majesty's Speech. I must, therefore, beg your Lordships to extend to me as fully as possible that forbearance and consideration which I know your Lordships always accord to those who address your Lordships for the first time.

My Lords, before entering upon the topics which are alluded to in Her Majesty's Speech, I must congratulate your Lordships upon the happy circumstance that it has pleased Her Majesty once again to open Parliament in person. I feel assured that this event will be viewed by your Lordships with the utmost satisfaction, and I am confident that it will be hailed with joy by the people of this country, who are at all times anxious to avail themselves of every opportunity to display their loyalty and affection towards Her Majesty.

Your Lordships have, I feel convinced, heard with pleasure the announcement which Her Majesty has graciously made of the approaching marriage of the Princess Helena. Such an event, calculated as it is to secure the happiness of the Princess will, I am sure, find a ready response at the hands of your Lordships. Nor, I am sure, is that pleasure likely to be diminished by the fact that we are not, in all probability, to be deprived by that marriage of the example and presence of Her Royal Highness in this country. It is a fortunate circumstance in the present day that dynastic or political considerations are no longer the ruling motives in the selection of Royal alliances. We view rather with pleasure the prospects of domestic happiness which they may hold out; and, in this instance, I trust the choice of Her Majesty has fallen upon one who is well calculated to promote the happiness of the Princess Helena. I feel certain, too, that your Lordships' satisfaction will be increased by the knowledge that Her Majesty, while thus consulting the happiness of her daughter, is not likely to be deprived of the society of one whose presence must ever brighten her home and mitigate that solitude which we all so much deplore.

My Lords, I am sure that your Lordships will also sympathize with the grief expressed by Her Majesty at the death of her illustrious relative the King of the Belgians, whose decease, bound as he was to this country by no common ties, cannot fail to be a source of universal regret. He was a wise and constitutional Prince, called upon under circumstances of an extraordinary kind to reign over a new kingdom, where he gained for himself the affection and esteem of his people during a reign prolonged beyond the ordinary term. In this new and difficult position the late King of the Belgians commanded the respect of every European kingdom, and died beloved and revered at home. His son, with so bright an example before him, will, we may confidently hope, seek to emulate it, and may well look forward to a brilliant future.

My Lords, I should be consulting neither my own feelings nor those of your Lordships, did I not here pay a tribute to the memory of one whose death has deprived this country of an eminent statesman and of a faithful servant, and the House of Commons of one of its eldest and most valued Members. My Lords, there were few in this country who heard of the death of Lord Palmerston without feeling that no ordinary man had passed away—a man able in counsel, wise in debate, conciliatory in manner, possessed of a knowledge of his fellow-countrymen seldom attained by any. He secured to himself the affection, the confidence, the esteem, and the respect of the people of this country in a manner seldom if ever equalled, but certainly never surpassed, by any former statesman. At an age far exceeding that usually allotted to man, he was selected at a time of peculiar difficulty by the almost unanimous voice of the country as the one man best fitted to be intrusted with the interests of the Empire, and I am sure that his memory will long be regarded with affection and respect by the people.

My Lords, our commercial relations with America are so vast, and, above all, the desire of this country is so general for the welfare of that great country, that I am convinced that your Lordships will hear with peculiar satisfaction of the termination of the civil war which for four years deluged her fields with blood and wasted her resources. But that satisfaction must have been greatly increased by the knowledge that the termination of that war has been hallowed by the utter extinction of slavery on the North American continent. My Lords, could it be necessary to look for any means to strengthen the good feeling which exists in this country towards America, I am sure no better means could have been found than in the fact that her free institutions are no longer contaminated by slavery, and that all within her shores, whether white or black, are by law free alike. I am sure, too, my Lords, the feeling of this country will be most general in the anxious wish that the Government of America will be successful in their endeavours to repair the damages caused by the civil war, and that the whole of the American people will in future be strengthened and united. I am sure your Lordships will give the utmost consideration to the correspondence between the Governments of the United States and of this country on the subject of the injuries which have been inflicted upon the commerce of the former country by ships under the Confederate flag.

My Lords, the renewal of diplomatic relations between this country and Brazil must have been viewed by your Lordships with great satisfaction; and your Lordships will have heard with additional pleasure that Her Majesty's Government, in conjunction with that of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of the French, have lost no time in tendering their friendly offices to the Governments of Spain and Chili, in the hope of preventing a war between those countries. Your Lordships will be further gratified to learn that their good offices have been accepted.

Her Majesty has informed your Lordships that a Commercial Treaty has been concluded with the Emperor of Austria; and, with the example of the late treaty with France before us, I am sure we may confidently expect that the commercial intercourse between the two countries will be greatly increased.

My Lords, the next paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech is one which I approach with considerable anxiety, as it refers to a subject which has led to angry controversy before people were in possession of evidence to enable them to arrive at any decided opinion. Your Lordships are all aware of the feelings with which the first news of the outbreak in Jamaica was received, and you are also aware of the feeling of indignation with which a large and influential portion of the people in this country received the accounts of the severities said to have been exercised in the repression of that rebellion. Governor Eyre, unfortunately, unadvisedly, and unaccountably, did not avail himself of the usual means of placing before this country the full circumstances of the case. Neither did he support by evidence the opinion he had formed of the outbreak. Under these circumstances, having no evidence before them—having no means of deciding upon the merits of the case—Her Majesty's Government—I think, wisely—adopted the only course open to them in appointing a Commission to inquire upon the spot into the character of the outbreak. Of the character of the Commissioners so appointed this House* and the country can have but one opinion—for the character of each and all of these gentlemen is such as to secure that any investigation they may undertake will be searching, full, and impartial; and I myself, my Lords, shall be ready to abide by their decision. But, my Lords, in the meantime, until it be proved by evidence to the contrary, I shall believe that Governor Eyre was possessed of information of which we know nothing, and that he had certain knowledge of the circumstances which he mentioned in his first despatch; for I cannot believe that Governor Eyre, whose antecedents are so opposed to such a supposition, that the general of the forces, that every official, and all the influential persons throughout the island could have been so carried away by panic as to imagine that a general organized system of rebellion was in existence without evidence to that effect having been laid before them. Neither, my Lords, until it is proved by evidence, can I believe that the severities said to have been exercised have not been grossly exaggerated; for I cannot believe that except under circumstances absolutely necessary for the preservation of the colony and of the lives of the white inhabitants, Governor Eyre would have sanctioned severities which would have been an outrage upon humanity.

My Lords, Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to intimate that papers will be laid before you on the subject of New Zealand; and I am sure your Lordships will learn with satisfaction that a considerable portion of Her Majesty's troops employed in that island are ordered to return home. Most sincerely do I trust that it may be long before any considerable force will have to revisit that island; because not only do I believe that it is the duty of the colonists themselves in such a war to protect themselves, but I believe also that they are far better able to carry it on successfully than are regular troops whose very discipline and organization which render Her Majesty's army so effective in other parts of the world are in a war of that kind actually in the way. The colonists themselves, accustomed to a rough life in a new country, unincumbered by baggage, are far better able than any regular forces to cope with the Natives. If left to themselves they will either come to some terms of peace with the Natives against whom they are opposed, or they will soon get rid of their antagonists, fighting them in their own way upon their own ground.

My Lords, Her Majesty has informed your Lordships that the Orders which have been issued by the Privy Council relating to the disease among cattle which has devastated many parts of the country will be laid before you. By the blessing of Providence, I am happy to say that in my own immediate neighbourhood its ravages have not been felt, and I am therefore unable to speak from personal experience upon the subject. But the urgency of the case is such that I am sure your Lordships will give the utmost consideration to any measure which may be brought before you by Her Majesty's Government.

My Lords, I approach the subject of the Fenian conspiracy in Ireland with the deepest regret; for we must all grieve at the disloyalty, the wickedness, and the folly of those who organized and who support this foul conspiracy. But, my Lords, while we do so it appears to me that in the present condition of Ireland there are circumstances calculated to raise a lively hope of a bright future for that country. At no period of her history has there been the same combination, the same union among all the respectable inhabitants of that country. Irrespective of religion, irrespective of class, irrespective of party, all are ready to join themselves together for the protection of law, order, and the Constitution. Not one respectable individual, not one person of property, not one person of consideration in the country, has joined the Fenian movement. At no time have the juries more nobly, more justly, and more calmly performed their duties. My Lords, under these cheering circumstances, though we may regret the wickedness and the folly of those deluded men, we cannot for one moment fear the ultimate result of their conspiracy. They may injure their country, they may drive capital from Ireland, but of the ultimate result, I repeat it, there can be no doubt. I trust that sedition once banished from the land much of that unanimity, much of that combination for good which now exists may still continue, and that all may unite to promote the advancement and prosperity of Ireland. My Lords, in the full information evidently possessed by the Irish Government, in the calm, dignified, unimpassioned conduct of the Lord Lieutenant, we have the best guarantee that no outbreak can take place in that country without the knowledge of the Government; and, knowing this, knowing the overwhelming force which might be brought against them, I would fain hope that those who are engaged in this plot may be induced to see the hopelessness of their cause, and that Ireland may be saved from actual outbreak. But if they in their delusion venture to appeal to the arbitrament of arms, I trust no feeling of mistaken humanity will prevent them on the first outbreak receiving such a lesson as will show the utter hopelessness of their cause, and, by convincing them of the folly of their movement, the further effusion of blood may be prevented.

My Lords, the various measures which will be brought before your Lordships by Her Majesty's Government will, I am sure, receive your careful consideration. We are informed by Her Majesty that information will be laid before this House as to the rights of voting in the election of Members of Parliament, and that, when that information is complete, a measure will be brought before you on that subject. My Lords, on several previous occasions Reform Bills have been brought under the consideration of the Legislature, and at one time a Bill was brought in by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby), at the time he was at the head of the Government. I therefore think it can hardly now be said that no discussion on this subject is necessary. Neither do I think that in the present day it can well be said that no change in the franchise should take place. Of the intentions of Her Majesty's Government on that subject I can, of course, know nothing. I can only express my hope that any measure they may bring forward will, while protecting the rights of property and the intelligence of the country, secure a fair and substantial representation of the working classes.

My Lords, I thank you for the forbearance with which you have heard me. I am fully aware of the imperfection of the remarks I have made, and I will not further trespass on your Lordships' time and consideration, but will move that the following humble Address be presented to Her Majesty:—

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal Subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble Thanks to Your Majesty for Your Majesty's Gracious Speech.

"We humbly thank Your Majesty for informing us that Your Majesty has declared Your Consent to a Marriage between Your Majesty's Daughter The Princess Helena and Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein Sonderbourg-Augustenburg; and with Your Majesty we trust this Union may be prosperous and happy.

"We assure Your Majesty that we participate in the profound Grief felt by Your Majesty at the Death of Your Majesty's beloved Uncle The King of the Belgians; but we feel confident that the Wisdom which He evinced during His Reign will animate His Successor, and preserve for Belgium her Independence and Prosperity.

VOL. CLXXXI. [THIRD SERIES.]

"We rejoice to learn that Your Majesty's Relations with Foreign Powers are friendly and satisfactory, and that Your Majesty sees no Cause to fear any Disturbance of the general Peace.

"We trust that the Meeting of the Fleets of France and England in the Ports of the respective Countries has tended to cement the Amity of the Two Nations, and to prove to the World their friendly Concert in the Promotion of Peace.

"We humbly assure Your Majesty that we learn with Satisfaction that the United States, after terminating successfully the severe Struggle in which they were so long engaged, are wisely repairing the Ravages of Civil War; and that with Your Majesty we regard the Abolition of Slavery as an Event calling forth the cordial Sympathies and Congratulations of this Country, which has always been foremost in showing its Abhorrence of an Institution repugnant to every Feeling of Justice and Humanity.

"We humbly convey our Thanks to Your Majesty for informing us that the Exertions and Perseverance of Your Majesty's Naval Squadron have reduced the Slave Trade on the West Coast of Africa within very narrow Limits.

"We thank Your Majesty for directing Copies to be laid before us of the Correspondence which has taken place between Your Majesty's Government and that of the United States with respect to Injuries inflicted on American Commerce by Cruisers under the Confederate Flag.

"We express our Thanks to Your Majesty for informing us that diplomatic Relations with Brasil have been renewed; and that the good Offices of Your Majesty's Ally The King of Portugal have contributed essentially to this happy Result.

"With Your Majesty we regret the Interruption of Peace between Spain and Chili; and we earnestly trust that through the good Offices of Your Majesty's Government, in conjunction with those of The Emperor of the French, the Causes of Disagreement may be removed in a Manner honourable and satisfactory to both Countries.

"We thank Your Majesty for informing us that the Negotiations which have been long pending in Japan have been brought to a Conclusion which has received Your Majesty's entire Approbation; that the existing Treaties have been ratified by the Mikado; and that Stipulations have been made for the Revision of the Tariff in a Manner favourable to Commerce, and for the punctual Discharge of the Indemnity due under the Terms of the Convention of October 1864.

"We humbly express to Your Majesty our Thanks for informing us that Your Majesty has places in the kingdom which have wholly escaped its ravages.

"Parva metu primo, mox sese attollit in auras, Ingrediturque solo, et caput inter nubila condit."

The question your Lordships have now to consider is whether the course taken by Her Majesty's Government has been such as to meet the magnitude of the evil and the exigencies of the case. Was it adequate to the occasion? Public opinion has answered this question in the negative. Great dissatisfaction has been engendered; the action of the Government has been regarded with general disappointment and disapprobation; and distrust has taken the place of confidence and assurance. It cannot be said that Her Majesty's Ministers have been taken by surprise, for there were sufficient indications from other quarters of the great importance of the subject, and of the peril with which it is attended. Your Lordships have been told that the Government had acted in one respect with great vigour. But it is well known that the Government at first refused to comply with the memorial from Irish landowners and farmers that the importation of cattle into Ireland should be stopped. The memorialists were told that there were insuperable obstacles in the way of granting this request. But when the representatives of the Irish people took up the question and forwarded a strong remonstrance to the Government on the subject, these insuperable difficulties were at once overcome; the importation of cattle into Ireland was prohibited; and the country had, in consequence, enjoyed complete immunity from the ravages of the disease. What was the course taken with respect to the disease by the French Government? On the 5th of September the French Minister for Agriculture addressed a letter to the Emperor, recommending the most stringent measures to prevent the importation of the disease into the ports of France, that the introduction of foreign cattle from the sea coast and from the northern and eastern frontiers should be prohibited. The Emperor of the French at once acted on those suggestions. The Belgian Government pursued an analagous course, and the consequence was—as it had been in Ireland—that those two countries had to a large extent escaped the ravages of the plague. Would that the Government of this country had acted with the same energy and decision. Her Majesty's Government, in the first instance, gave

the justices in petty sessions power and authority to take certain steps to stop markets and fairs and appoint inspectors. Nine out of ten of those inspectors, however, had never seen the disease; yet they had the power of destroying every animal they suspected, although they were often unable to distinguish the true rinderpest from pleuro-pneumonia or other inflammatory disorders to which cattle are liable. After the disease had raged for three months the Government determined to appoint a Royal Commission. It contained among its members men of great eminence and talent, of practical knowledge and scientific research, who devoted a large portion of their time and labour to the investigation of the subject, collected some important facts, and on the 31st of October issued a Report, but in consequence of not being unanimous, probably, their recommendations were set at naught. The time of year had now arrived when the principal agricultural societies of the country are accustomed to hold their meetings in London. The Council of the Royal Agricultural Society of England took the whole matter into consideration, they drew up most important resolutions, and a deputation in December last waited upon the noble Earl the President of the Council and the Secretary of State for the Home Department. They made recommendations which were endorsed by other agricultural bodies, but which the Government declined to adopt. At length a great change came over the Government, and they transferred the powers conferred upon the justices in petty sessions to the justices in quarter sessions. This change of plan clothed the question with fresh difficulties, ambiguities, and perplexities. It made confusion worse confounded, for the various quarter sessions issued different orders, some more stringent than others, which have caused great inconvenience, and the inhabitants of several districts not being able to comprehend why these discrepancies and incongruities should exist, applied to the magistrates for information; but the explanation they received not being satisfactory, they still entertain hopes that the Government, even at the eleventh hour, are prepared to recommend some definite course of action for the guidance of the whole country, in lieu of leaving the matter in the hands of local authorities, whose views and opinions are certain to differ, and whose decisions could not pos-

nature of the subjects to which I have to call your Lordships' attention. Before, however, I proceed to these subjects, I cannot but most heartily congratulate your Lordships upon one circumstance which characterizes the present occasion. It is, I am confident, with feelings of the sincerest pleasure and gratification that you have seen Her Majesty so far restored to health and strength, after her severe afflictions, as to be enabled again to perform the functions of her high office, and in person to open her newly-assembled Parliament. Irreparable as is the loss which she and, in common with her, the nation have suffered, it may be that the very affliction itself, and the universal sympathy which it has called forth, will be the means of still further intensifying those sentiments of loyalty and attachment which England has ever felt towards her Sovereign, and which cannot fail to receive a fresh impulse from her re-appearance in the sphere of public life.

My Lords, the speech from the Throne contains matter both for congratulation and for condolence with Her Majesty—matter for congratulation in the approaching marriage of the Princess Helena—an event which, I am confident, your Lordships will cordially welcome, as contributing to Her Majesty's gratification, and, I trust, to the happiness of a member of the Royal Family; matter for condolence in an event which has at once deprived our Sovereign of a revered and beloved relative, and a neighbouring and friendly nation of a wise and sagacious ruler, whose prudent policy advanced it to its present state of prosperity, and whose counsels spread their influence far beyond the comparatively narrow limits of his own Kingdom through the whole length and breadth of Europe. The Belgians will, I doubt not, have your Lordships' sympathy and your best wishes that their present Sovereign, wisely following in the footsteps of his predecessor, may be enabled like him to preserve and to promote the welfare and independence of his subjects. My Lords, there is one more sad event which has occurred since we were last assembled here which I cannot pass over in silence, even though I only echo the sentiments expressed by the noble Mover of the Address. This country has lost one of its most venerable and one of its most popular statesmen. It has lost one who, by his affability and by his tact, could conciliate all those with whom he came in contact, and who, by his wide experience and political sagacity, gained for himself the respect and the confidence of the whole nation. I will, my Lords, leave it to those better qualified than myself to pass an eulogium upon his life, devoted for more than half a century to the service of his country. All that I will say is that his memory will long be cherished with affection by the nation which now deplores his loss.

My Lords, I will, in the next place, refer to our foreign relations. Throughout the civilized world peace and tranquillity again prevail. The Chilian and Spanish difficulties, it is true, threatened at first to give rise to a war; but it may reasonably be hoped that, before any further acts of hostility are committed which may tend to exasperate both parties, and to render an amicable solution of the question at issue impossible, the friendly interposition of the Great Powers may effect a reconciliation between the contending nations. In North America your Lordships will have heard with great satisfaction that the last year has been signalized by the termination of the deadly fratricidal contest which has for four years devastated that country. Our nation, it is true, was personally interested in the event; but the joy which it experiences at the restoration of peace is not of a purely selfish nature. It unfeignedly rejoices that a nation possessed of boundless resources, and endowed with indomitable energy, has again freedom to develop its constitution, its industry, and its commerce. It rejoices that the conclusion of the war is the signal for the abolition of negro slavery—an institution which is the bane of civilized society and a barrier to all true social progress. It rejoices, further, that the victorious have known how to use their victory with clemency, and to follow a moderate and wise line of policy in the reconstruction of the Union; and, finally, it sincerely hopes that no untoward events may tend to counteract the ties of race, of amity, and of interest, which should ever connect us with the re-United States. Our relations with other foreign Powers are no less calculated to contribute to your Lordships' satisfaction. With Brazil we are again on terms of amity. With France our union was never more cordial, never more firm. The mutual hospitalities which our fleets have interchanged tend, in no slight degree, to quicken those friendly feelings, and to strengthen the entente cordiale between the two nations, and in so doing give us the surest hopes that peace will prevail in Europe, and that civilization will spread throughout the world. With Austria we have recently entered into a Treaty of Commerce—a treaty which benefits this country by extending its commercial relations, and by opening a new field to mercantile adventure, and which, above all, marks the first success achieved by the principles of free trade against the stronghold of the protective system.

My Lords, the questions relating to our colonial policy have already been so ably treated by the noble Marquess who has just sat down that I need detain your Lordships but a very short time with them. The colonies are generally prosperous, and the more tranquil condition of New Zealand has warranted the withdrawal of a large proportion of Her Majesty's troops. But there is one deplorable exception to this general rule, which affects not less the welfare of an important colony than the reputation for justice and integrity of the mother country itself. My Lords, the facts of the Jamaica outbreak are still involved in obscurity. How far there was an organized rebellion among the black population of the island—how far that rebellion was the result of the previous unfair administration and tyrannical conduct of the white race—and, lastly, how far the emergency justified the apparently extreme severity of the execution—are questions which, I would humbly suggest, we are as yet not in a position to answer. Two diametrically opposite opinions seem to prevail on the opposite shores of the Atlantic. In Jamaica itself there is apparently a universal conviction that a widely-ramified conspiracy had been organized by the black population for the purpose of annihilating the white, and that the events at Morant Bay were but a premature outbreak of a general rebellion; and, further, the feeling seems generally to prevail that the Governor was not merely justified in his conduct, but that, for the energy with which he suppressed the outbreak, he deserved the gratitude of the whole island. In this country, on the other hand, large classes of men have most unfairly prejudged the whole question. Upon the most insufficient evidence they have condemned Governor Eyre—they have condemned him without a hearing—the very crime which they impute to him in his dealings with the negroes; and in some cases deny that there was any organized conspiracy at all. Both these opinions are equally unsatisfactory. In one case the opinion was given under the influence of a panic;—the colonists were under the impression that a race three times their number was preparing to destroy them en masse, and with the remembrance of the previous outbreak of 1831, and with the example of Hayti before their eyes, they might not unnaturally be induced to exaggerate their danger—if they did exaggerate it—and in the fulness of their gratitude to justify any measures which had been the means of effectually averting it. In the other case, men have ventured, upon the most imperfect evidence, to pass sentence on events which occurred 5,000 miles from these shores under a set of conditions of which they have never had the slightest experience. From their own position of security they have rashly condemned the measures of those who were acting under the belief that their lives and properties were in hourly danger. Under these circumstances, my Lords, and allowing that prima facie Governor Eyre's measures seem to be unnecessarily severe, there was but one course for Her Majesty's Government to pursue; and this course they have adopted. A judicious and carefully selected Commission, with Sir Henry Storks at its head—a man of acknowledged administrative power, and of a character above all unfairness or partiality—has been sent out to investigate the circumstances of the case. To enable this Commission fully and impartially to perform its duties, Governor Eyre has been temporarily superseded—a step which has been the subject of adverse criticism, but which was, under the circumstances, absolutely necessary, and which in no way prejudges the case or throws any stigma on the Governor's conduct. When this inquiry is completed, and the whole circumstances are laid before you, it will remain with your Lordships to condemn or approve the measures of the Jamaica Executive, as the case may be:—while it is still pending, it cannot but be unfair to express a decided opinion either way.

There remain three subjects of the most vital importance connected with the home policy of this country, in consideration of which I venture to make a still further claim on your Lordships' indulgence. In Ireland, my Lords, revolutionary schemes have again been brought to light—schemes which though they may be wanting in every essential element of success have yet been productive of considerable annoyance, and may temporarily retard the rapid development of the resources and the industry of the island. Fenianism is a vibration of the vast movements which have recently agitated the Transatlantic States. Five years or more has it been in coming to maturity, and now its promoters have doubtless been encouraged to persist in their designs by the delusive hope that the termination of the war in America would be the signal for a rupture with this country—a hope which I trust and believe is doomed to lasting disappointment. However annoying the schemes of the revolutionary brotherhood may be, there are, at all events, many circumstances which, if we compare the present with previous outbreaks of 1798 or 1848, cannot fail to quiet any alarm we may feel on their account. In the first place, the Fenians are countenanced by no religious party whatever—the parson and the priest unite in denouncing them. In the second place, it is remarkable that no persons of education, of property, of wealth, or of respectability are to be found in their ranks. All men possessed of these advantages are prepared to resist any outbreak which may occur. Lastly, the honesty and courage with which the Irish juries have performed their duty gives us at once the best proof of the loyalty that prevails among the respectable classes in Ireland, and the surest grounds for confidence that the authority of the law will remain unimpaired. I need scarcely say how much is due to the judicious and energetic conduct of the Dublin Executive. They allowed the conspiracy to assume assailable dimensions before they interfered; but, at the same time, did not postpone that interference until it ceased to be amenable to the power of the law, and could only be suppressed by the power of the sword. This unhappy conspiracy has been throughout treated as a matter which should excite neither our alarm nor our contempt; and, thus treated, there can, I trust, be no reason to doubt that before long it will succumb before the triple authority of law, property, and religion.

My Lords, the second of these questions which is alluded to in Her Majesty's Speech, and which is of such great importance that I venture to approach it only with considerable diffidence, is the great constitutional question of Reform. Scarcely any one would, I think, venture to maintain that the present system of the representation of the people in Parliament is faultless. The Bill passed in 1832, beneficial as it was, was not absolutely perfect; and, moreover, since those days the condition of the middle and lower classes of society has undergone a very considerable change. Education and culture have in that period made rapid strides, and have extended their influence to numbers who before scarcely felt their effects at all. And so, my Lords, experience has shown, and all parties agree in admitting, that there are inequalities and defects of one kind or another in our present system of representation. The correction of these defects has constantly been the subject of debate; during the last fourteen years no less than four different measures for Reform have been introduced; they have successively been rejected or withdrawn, and have left the question at issue in as vague and uncertain a condition as they found it. Surely, my Lords, it is high time that measures were taken to arrive at some definite conclusion on this all-important point? Surely, it is at once below the dignity of the Legislature, and contrary to the wishes of the nation, that a question which so nearly affects the interests of all its classes should any longer remain without solution. Such a solution, however, is not to be found in abstract principles or in political theories, but in the dictates of practical sense, in wide experience, and in accurate knowledge of the particular circumstances of the case, guided by statistical information; and this information Her Majesty's Government are at the present time carefully collecting in as precise and accurate a form as the means which they have in their power will enable them to do. And this will form a solid basis for the measure, whatever be its nature, which will be brought before your Lordships' House. Guarding against the danger of subverting the existing order of things, and creating confusion in the political and mercantile interests of the Kingdom, I trust that, when the time comes, your Lordships will give your sanction and approval to some well-considered measure of Reform which may tend to correct or to modify any existing anomalies, and to add vigour and stability to the institutions of the country.

There is still one question of the most serious importance on which I will venture a few remarks, and then I will cease to trespass any further on your Lordships' patience. Our nation is at the present moment suffering from the effects of a national calamity. The cattle plague which visited this country in the middle of the last century has again re-appeared among our herds, and the fearful rapidity with which it is spreading may reasonably excite the greatest alarm among all classes of society. The rapidity of its progress, and deadliness of its effects, are but too clearly indicated by the simple facts of the case. In June there was but one spot infected by the disease; there are now more than 18,000. The number of new cases which occurred during the past week, amounting to 11,000, exceed by 1,000 those that were reported for the whole month of November. And, again, the Returns of last week show an increase of 1,400 on the week immediately preceding it. Already 120,000 animals, if the Returns can be trusted, have been attacked, and of these 90,000 have either died or been killed. These figures disclose a most alarming state of things. Medical science has hitherto been completely baffled in its investigations. In all probability it was introduced into this country by some Dutch cattle imported to the Metropolitan Market. And since it has been introduced, the subtle and the deadly effects of the poison it generates are but too well known to your Lordships. There is scarcely any agency of which it does not avail itself in its rapid extension—the clothes of the herdsmen, sheep, dogs, birds, and even the wind itself, will carry the seeds of the distemper for at least 200 yards; and, further, the eccentric course which it often follows, leaving some spots, for no apparent reason, completely free, and attacking the adjoining farms with the utmost violence, show its affinity to human epidemics and frustrate the investigations of science. As to remedies, we are no less at a loss. Each one may ascribe the recovery of the few cattle out of his herd to the cures which he himself employed. But in reality all the remedies and drugs which have hitherto been applied have proved equally ineffectual, and the hopes which were derived from the supposed affinity of the disease with small-pox seem doomed to like disappointment. Under these circumstances, several Orders in Council have been issued, empowering the local authorities to use such means as were deemed necessary to check the progress of the murrain, either by slaughtering infected animals or by stopping all cattle traffic within their district; and an Act is at the present moment prepared to give further powers to these local courts, who will, I trust, by mutual co-operation and by uniform and stringent action obviate the necessity for the interference of the central power. It has been maintained that the emergency has already demanded this interference on the part of the central power. But it must be remembered that circumstances differ in different localities, and that any uniform measure applied to the whole country would fall very differently on different places. The farmers and landowners of Cheshire and Yorkshire would welcome any measures of however a stringent and universal character; but the twenty-three counties in this island which are as yet free from the disease, and the large towns which are still well supplied with meat, would not receive them with such unqualified approval, nor would they in any way co-operate in enforcing them; and, further, it has always been a principle in this country to leave the management of local affairs to local authorities, who are supposed to be better acquainted with the peculiar circumstances of their case, and at the same time to have a greater interest in it, and consequently the central Government has not at its disposal all that organization which exists in so many Continental States, to enable it to carry out stringently and effectually the measures it deems expedient. These are serious, if not impassable, difficulties which hitherto any uniform measure would have had to encounter. And I cannot but think that, of the two alternatives of employing central or local powers, Her Majesty's Government chose the right, and, perhaps, the only practicable one. It will remain with your Lordships to determine whether any further means are to be taken to check the rapid extension of the plague, and what the nature of these means should be—whether any uniform or partially uniform plan could be devised which could at once be carried into execution by the local authorities, and regulate their measures. There is, however, one source of consolation in this calamity—namely, that it has pleased Providence, in His mercy, to send it upon this country at a time when perhaps of all periods of its history it will be best able to bear it. It has visited us in a year of abundant harvest, and at a time when commerce is more active and productive than ever it was before, and when the revenue, notwithstanding reductions in taxation, shows a balance of between two and three millions—at a time, in fact, when this country has reached a height of prosperity almost unparalleled in the history of the world.

My Lords, my task is now accomplished. I have to the best of my power, however imperfectly that may be, touched upon the main topics of Her Majesty's Speech. All that remains for me now to do is to thank you most sincerely for the patient and indulgent hearing you have given to my remarks, and to conclude with a hope that the Address which I now have the honour of seconding may meet with your Lordships' unanimous approval. [See Page 33.]

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND: My Lords, I have never before risen to address your Lordships on a similar occasion, but I trust I may now be allowed to address a few observations to your Lordships on one topic referred to in the Royal Speech, in which I, in common with Her Majesty's subjects at large, take the deepest interest—I allude to the cattle plague. To that one topic I will confine my observations. Before doing so, I beg to express my hearty concurrence in all that has fallen from the Mover and Seconded of the Address in those portions of their speeches in which they dwelt upon the pleasure which it must give your Lordships to find that Her Majesty has again opened Parliament in person, and the regret with which you must have heard of the death of the late Prime Minister, and of his Majesty the King of the Belgians. The cattle plague has, as the noble Earl who seconded the Address has observed, been raging in this country for more than six months; it has gone on increasing from month to month, and we had as yet found no means of repressing its virulence. As yet there has been found no specific remedy for the disease, and men of all shades of political opinion who have given their attention to the subject seem to have arrived at the conclusion that a system of prevention not of cure is that which alone it is practicable to adopt. That being so, I should like to ask what the Government has done in the matter? The answer is that they have done next to nothing. They have done almost worse than nothing. They have, it is true, issued a number of Orders in Council; but I believe that if the money expended on their issue had been laid out in taking effective measures to stop the disease and indemnifying the unfortunate sufferers from it, the cattle plague would be a thing of the past, and your Lordships would not that evening be engaged in discussing the subject. As it was, the Orders in Council which were sent out one after the other were in themselves vague, unsatisfactory, and often contradictory of each other—they agree in nothing but in showing the evident determination of the Government to shift all responsibility, as far as possible, from their own shoulders. Sometimes it has been placed upon the magistrates in petty sessions, and sometimes upon the magistrates in quarter sessions; but always it is to be remarked that the Government will not take the responsibility upon themselves. I may be told—indeed, we have been told by the noble Lord who seconded the Address—that the difficulties of the case were almost insuperable; that although the disease had appeared in England about a century ago, yet the experience then acquired as to its action had so died out that it must really be looked on as something new, and that all that the Government could do was to institute an inquiry into the matter, and that they had done all that was in their power. I, however, venture to question the correctness of that view. In the first place, a Committee had, in 1854, been appointed by the House of Commons to take into consideration a Bill which was then pending in that House—the Cattle Diseases Prevention Bill, and by that Committee a great deal of evidence was taken, Professor Simonds, among others, being one of the witnesses who was examined. Now, he found that Professor Simonds on that occasion stated that the rinderpest was a disease perfectly well known, and that he himself had seen it prevailing in Russia and Bavaria. He, moreover, described the steps which were taken in those countries as having proved perfectly satisfactory in preventing the spread of the plague. With such evidence before the Government, how is it possible, I will ask, to contend that the rinderpest is a thing with which we were altogether unacquainted? But I will go a step further, and remind the House that in September last a Royal Commission was appointed for the purpose of investigating the disease, and that a majority of that Commission reported at the end of October, in the strongest possible manner, in favour of stopping all communication in the way of the transit of cattle throughout the country. What has the Government done in consequence? Instead of adopting the stringent measures recommended by the Commission they have thrown the responsibility on the local authorities, and have refrained from doing anything themselves.

Yet they showed by their own conduct that they were aware that the means which they declined to adopt were, in reality, the most efficacious remedy for the disease; because there are two very remarkable instances in which they did act, and acted with great rigour on that view, and with great success. One was in the case of Ireland. There was, happily, no rinderpest there, and the Government very properly stopped the importation of cattle into that country. It is perfectly true that they did not do so without hesitation. When the Home Secretary first received a deputation on the subject, he said there were insuperable difficulties in the way of stopping the importation of cattle into Ireland; but some persuasive eloquence used by the Irish Members had the effect of altering the determination of the Government, and the insuperable difficulty was swept away. But to go from the West to the North, I find another remarkable case of action by the Government, and it is incidentally alluded to in the Royal Speech—I allude to the case of Argyllshire. There was no rinderpest there; and there the Government again took very vigorous steps. So that he was, he thought, justified in saying that they could not plead ignorance on the subject as an excuse for the course which they had pursued in this country, or for saying they had done all that it was possible for them to do. I have ventured to make these observations to your Lordships because I hope that, even now, at that late hour, we may be able to induce Her Majesty's Government to rouse from their lethargy and do what I conceive to be their duty—namely, to stop all movement of cattle in England, and also all importation of cattle into England from abroad. The other day I attended a large meeting in my own county on that subject, and I noticed that the passage in an able speech, made by a gentleman present, which was most applauded, was that in which the speaker said, "We must put our shoulders to the wheel, and get rid of the rinderpest; or, if we cannot do that, we must get rid of the Ministry."

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: I ask your Lordships' indulgence for a short time while I allude to a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne on a subject in which I take the deepest interest. I am happy to find that, owing to the very able manner in which the noble Duke has addressed you, it is unnecessary for me to occupy much of your time. Feeling, however, as I do, that the conduct of Her Majesty's Government before and since the alarming spread of this cattle plague is open to grave censure, I am unwilling, on this occasion, to remain altogether silent. In the paragraphs in the Speech delivered by Her Majesty which allude to the cattle plague, I confess that I think the wording of the last part of the first paragraph is somewhat extraordinary. The passage to which I refer is that in which Her Majesty says—

"I trust that by the precautions suggested by experience and by the Divine blessing on the means which are now being employed its further extension may be arrested."

I venture to think that it would have been a preferable mode of expressing the sentiment if that part of the Speech in which Her Majesty is made to hope that "the Divine blessing on the means which are now being employed may arrest the further extension of the cattle plague" had preceded, instead of coming after, the mention of "the precautions suggested by experience." The next paragraph proceeds to state that—

"The Orders that have been made by the Lords of the Privy Council by virtue of the powers vested in them by law, with a view to prevent the spreading of this disease, will be laid before you."

Now, I would venture to call the attention of the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) to this paragraph, and to ask whether it is perfectly certain that the Government have acted in strict accordance with the law? There is an old maxim delegatus delegari non potest. I believe that the action of the Privy Council has been taken under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 107, s. 4. By that section the Privy Council are empowered to make such orders and regulations as to them may seem necessary for the purpose of prohibiting the removal of cattle, and so on; and, in another part—

"To make any other order and regulation for the purpose of giving effect to the Act; to revoke or annul any order when so made, and that such orders should have the like effect as if they had been inserted in the Act."

Now, under this Act, the Privy Council had power to make such Orders as they pleased; but I doubt whether they had power to delegate to another body those powers which the Act of Parliament conferred upon them. I think that in dealing with these provisions of the law the Government have been unfortunate. I agree with my noble Friend, the Government were in one of two difficulties. Either the Government were perfectly cognizant of these matters or they were not. Now, *I think they cannot plead ignorance, for many reasons which I will not weary your Lordships by repeating. They have been already referred to by my noble Friend. Professor Simonds, in his evidence before the Royal Commission, stated that he made his visit to Galicia in 1857 in consequence of information which had reached the Government from Consuls abroad, especially at Lubeck, of the spread of the cattle disease at Luxembourg, and of its steady advance towards those Continental ports from whence we were importing cattle. This was in 1857. I would venture to call the attention of your Lordships to the opinion of Professor Simonds, after having satisfied himself that this disease that broke out in England was identical with that in Galicia. He says—

"In July, 1857, I ascertained that the disease had appeared in England, and the result was the present Order of the Privy Council."

He was then asked what was the effect of the first Order in Council, and I call the noble Earl's particular attention to this, for at first I really thought it was a misprint—he was asked what was the effect of the first Order in Council; and his answer was—

"I think the effect was to spread the disease more quickly than it would have spread otherwise."

The Government have been urged throughout to take the responsibility upon themselves. It is a responsibility that belongs to the Executive of this country; it is what they have no right to shirk. But what was the course which the Government took? In the first place, they issued an Order in Council empowering magistrates in petty sessions to stop traffic in cattle at markets and fairs in their petty sessional division; and what is the result? The magistrates in petty sessions did stop the traffic in cattle at markets and fairs, but in no two petty sessional divisions had the same orders been issued. Nay, I know an instance where the magistrates in petty sessions in the county put a stop to all fairs and markets in their petty sessional division; but the mayors of two boroughs in the same division declined to do so. And we had this state of things, which was very inconvenient, to say the least—that the county markets were closed by order of the petty sessions, while the markets in the towns were open by order of the mayors. The Secretary of State was applied to in this difficulty, and he wrote very politely to the mayors of those boroughs, calling attention to the fact, and the mayors replied—no doubt with equal politeness—declining to make any alteration. That is a state of things which, if the Government had acted properly, never could have arisen. What was the next Order? The Privy Council empowered the magistrates in quarter sessions to put a stop to cattle traffic. In other words, they would not incur the odium, if odium there were, of doing it themselves. They shrank from the responsibility which belonged to them as the Executive, and placed that responsibility on the magistrates of the county. My Lords, I will not trespass longer on your time with reference to this subject; but having felt great interest in it, I was unwilling to be altogether silent. There is one other topic introduced into Her Majesty's Speech on a subject in which I was more or less mixed up, and on which I wish to make a few observations. I allude to the paragraph in which we read—

"A Bill will be submitted to you founded on the Report of the Royal Commission on the subject of Capital Punishment, which I have directed to be laid before you."

I think I am speaking the sentiments of the majority of my brother Commissioners when I express our very great annoyance that the Report of that Commission, before it was signed by the Commissioners, and before it had been presented to Her Majesty, should have appeared in the columns of The Morning Star. I consider that to be a breach of confidence towards the Members of the Commission, and a gross want of respect to the Sovereign on the Throne.

LORD FEVERSHAM said: I desire to make a few observations on the cattle disease, because I also am dissatisfied with the paragraphs of the Speech which refer to that subject, and it is my intention to propose an Amendment to the Address on that point. Your Lordships are well aware of the circumstances attending this unparalleled and destructive malady. It first appeared in the month of June in the metropolis, then it extended to the suburbs of London, and last it became diffused through many of the counties, until it stalked unchecked through the length and breadth of the vallies, and has climbed unsubdued to the summit of the hills, and there are few places in the kingdom which have wholly escaped its ravages.

"Parva metu primò, mox sese attollit in auras, Ingréditurque solo, et caput inter nubila condit."

The question your Lordships have now to consider is whether the course taken by Her Majesty's Government has been such as to meet the magnitude of the evil and the exigencies of the case. Was it adequate to the occasion? Public opinion has answered this question in the negative. Great dissatisfaction has been engendered; the action of the Government has been regarded with general disappointment and disapprobation; and distrust has taken the place of confidence and assurance. It cannot be said that Her Majesty's Ministers have been taken by surprise, for there were sufficient indications from other quarters of the great importance of the subject, and of the peril with which it is attended. Your Lordships have been told that the Government had acted in one respect with great vigour. But it is well known that the Government at first refused to comply with the memorial from Irish landowners and farmers that the importation of cattle into Ireland should be stopped. The memorialists were told that there were insuperable obstacles in the way of granting this request. But when the representatives of the Irish people took up the question and forwarded a strong remonstrance to the Government on the subject, these insuperable difficulties were at once overcome; the importation of cattle into Ireland was prohibited; and the country had, in consequence, enjoyed complete immunity from the ravages of the disease. What was the course taken with respect to the disease by the French Government? On the 5th of September the French Minister for Agriculture addressed a letter to the Emperor, recommending the most stringent measures to prevent the importation of the disease into the ports of France, that the introduction of foreign cattle from the sea coast and from the northern and eastern frontiers should be prohibited. The Emperor of the French at once acted on those suggestions. The Belgian Government pursued an analagous course, and the consequence was—as it had been in Ireland—that those two countries had to a large extent escaped the ravages of the plague. Would that the Government of this country had acted with the same energy and decision. Her Majesty's Government, in the first instance, gave

the justices in petty sessions power and authority to take certain steps to stop markets and fairs and appoint inspectors. Nine out of ten of these inspectors, however, had never seen the disease; yet they had the power of destroying every animal they suspected, although they were often unable to distinguish the true rinderpest from pleuro-pneumonia or other inflammatory disorders to which cattle are liable. After the disease had raged for three months the Government determined to appoint a Royal Commission. It contained among its members men of great eminence and talent, of practical knowledge and scientific research, who devoted a large portion of their time and labour to the investigation of the subject, collected some important facts, and on the 31st of October issued a Report, but in consequence of not being unanimous, probably, their recommendations were set at naught. The time of year had now arrived when the principal agricultural societies of the country are accustomed to hold their meetings in London. The Council of the Royal Agricultural Society of England took the whole matter into consideration, they drew up most important resolutions, and a deputation in December last waited upon the noble Earl the President of the Council and the Secretary of State for the Home Department. They made recommendations which were endorsed by other agricultural bodies, but which the Government declined to adopt. At length a great change came over the Government, and they transferred the powers conferred upon the justices in petty sessions to the justices in quarter sessions. This change of plan clothed the question with fresh difficulties, ambiguities, and perplexities. It made confusion worse confounded, for the various quarter sessions issued different orders, some more stringent than others, which have caused great inconvenience, and the inhabitants of several districts not being able to comprehend why these discrepancies and incongruities should exist, applied to the magistrates for information; but the explanation they received not being satisfactory, they still entertain hopes that the Government, even at the eleventh hour, are prepared to recommend some definite course of action for the guidance of the whole country, in lieu of leaving the matter in the hands of local authorities, whose views and opinions are certain to differ, and whose decisions could not possibly be expected to be susceptible of amalgamation or concurrence. It is not surprising that the subject of indemnity and compensation for the losses sustained should have been mooted, for in many parts of the country these losses have been most heavily felt. Although I am aware this is not the time or place to discuss this point, I will venture to say if it was the determination of the Government not to grant any remuneration or indemnity out of the public funds, it was the more incumbent on them to adopt from the first every precaution, to exhaust every effort, and to assume the whole responsibility of dealing vigorously with the subject in lieu of telling a deputation to wait and see. If a man's house is on fire he does not wait and see whether it will be burnt down before he takes steps to extinguish the flames. Delays were said to be dangerous, and that was particularly true in the present case. The noble Lord concluded by moving his Amendment.

Amendment proposed to be made to the Address by inserting after the words ("so deeply affecting the interests of my people")

"We beg Leave submissively to add our deep Regret that upon this important Subject the Government did not from the first assume the Responsibility of issuing an Order for Uniformity of Action throughout the Country, as essential to avert the Progress and to mitigate the Severity of so virulent, appalling, and destructive a Malady."

THE EARL OF ESSEX said, he must express his concurrence in almost all that had fallen from the noble Lord who had just sat down. In his opinion, Her Majesty's Government had shown the greatest want of vigour throughout the whole of their proceedings on this subject. He was quite aware how unwilling Governments were to undertake responsibility, and to go out of the track of routine; but extraordinary crises called for extraordinary action and vigour, and he must express his conviction that Her Majesty's Government had shown the greatest possible lack both of courage and action in this matter. If ever there was a case in which vigour and uniformity of action were required it was this; but how was it possible to secure either when the Privy Council delegated to the petty sessions, or quarter sessions, the powers they ought to have exercised themselves? He was perfectly well aware that if the passage of cattle from place to place within the country had been stopped six months ago, great dissatisfaction would have arisen among the farmers; but the case was now altered. The people were all strongly impressed with the absolute necessity of strong measures, and would, of course, submit to their imposition. In every newspaper, provincial as well as metropolitan, letters from agriculturists appeared calling upon the Government to exercise its authority, for the suppression of the disease; and the same demand was made by speakers at agricultural meetings throughout the country. In a few weeks hence it would be extremely difficult to take the necessary steps. At the present time the cattle were penned up in the farmyards; but what would be the consequence when they were turned adrift to feed in the fields, or driven to market for sale? The House would perceive at once how greatly the chances of infection would be increased. He abjured Her Majesty's Government to take such steps as would entirely put a stop to all movement of cattle. He did not know whether he should be in order in asking the question, but if he were, he would ask what Her Majesty's Government were proposing to do? He was sure the answer would be listened to with the greatest interest, and received by the community at large with no little dismay if the hope he had ventured to express were not favourably responded to.

THE EARL OF WINCHILSEA said, he perfectly agreed with the noble Earl that Her Majesty's Government had done little or nothing; but he was disposed to go still further, and to say that in the little they had done they had exceeded their authority; and they had done that which they had no more right to do than they had to put their hands into any of their Lordships' pockets and take out what they pleased. The Act of 1848 was sufficiently strong in its provisions. It gave the Government power with reference to persons bringing diseased beasts into any fair or market—it gave them power to stop the fairs and markets altogether; and it gave them control over all the highways and thoroughfares of the country. But the first thing they did was, not to exercise those powers, but to send inspectors on to private premises, with power to break open doors if entrance was refused them, those inspectors being authorized to kill any cattle which they might consider to be infected; and they directed penalties to be inflicted upon the proprietors of cattle who objected to these proceedings. Now he believed that those assumed powers were wholly illegal, and that when the inspectors broke open doors they were guilty of burglary—at any rate he thought that in such cases the owner would have an action at common law against the inspector, or ultimately against the Crown or the country wherever a beast had been killed contrary to the will of the proprietor. Perhaps the noble Lords opposite would come down to the House with a Bill of Indemnity. If they did, it would, no doubt, be very politely received; but that this or the other House would pass such a measure, unless it contained some restitution to the owners of the cattle which had been killed, he could scarcely bring himself to believe. He thought the Government owed the agriculturists some compensation for having brought in the disease; for he maintained that it had been introduced by the laches of the Government as plainly as if they had brought in the plague in a bundle of old clothes from Mecca. At any rate they had allowed the importation of beasts from Hungary and Russia, where it was notorious that cattle were subject to a disease analogous to the plague. What the Government should have done was only to have allowed the importation of foreign beasts into particular ports, where inspectors might have been stationed, and where the beasts might have been got into a proper state of health before they were allowed to go further into the country. There was nothing, however, to prevent the admission of diseased cattle at this very moment. The plague came from Europe, and how did they know that new cases did not arrive every week? During the three months of winter they might have prevented the movement of stock; but the 1st of May was drawing near, and then a penalty of £10,000 would not prevent the farmers from turning their cattle out to grass—in fact, they could not help themselves; it was a positive necessity, for the beasts must otherwise starve. It was very well known that even now the Order in Council was not strictly obeyed; for, on all hands, as their Lordships must have seen, cattle were driven along the highways with impunity. If Her Majesty's Government were in doubt as to what they should do, let them study The Gentleman's Magazine for 1745. George the Second's was not considered a very liberal Government, but his Government paid half the value of each beast that was killed to the owner. He invited the Government of to-day to be as liberal as the Government of 1745. His noble Friend the Secretary of State for the War Department had certainly shown a spirit of liberality. He had issued a remarkable document announcing that, in consequence of the sufferings of the Yeomanry Cavalry, the Government would not press for the tax on their horses. This tax would amount to about £60,000 he understood. That was as if their Lordships were to say that because there happened to be small-pox in a few cottages on their estates they would give away no beef at Christmas. It seemed to him that the £60,000 which would be saved by not calling out the Yeomanry, might very well go to form the nucleus of an insurance fund to compensate the farmers for the loss they had sustained by the neglect of the Government in allowing this abominable disease to come into the country. The Government had, in fact, made them a present not only of this disease, but also of pleuro-pneumonia, and of foot-and-mouth disease, by permitting the introduction of foreign beasts without proper precautions. As he had already said, the Government had not put in force the enormous powers given to the Privy Council by the Act—the provisions of which seemed to have been passed by some autocratic body rather than by an English Parliament—and they had done that which they had no right whatever to do. If one of their Lordships instructed his steward to buy fifty beasts, and the man went and bought a hundred and fifty horses, no regard for his character, or for his wife and family, would restrain that noble Lord from dismissing him. Whether Her Majesty would take that course with her present servants he could not tell; but he was afraid they were too strongly backed up by another House. He must, however, say that no Gentlemen were ever placed—if he might use the term in a Parliamentary sense—in so ignominious a position as that occupied by the noble Lords opposite.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, after the course this discussion has taken, I think it will be better if I at once furnish your Lordships with some information in reply to the various speeches made, partly on the other side and partly on this side of the House, all, however, in a great degree condemnatory of the conduct of the Government, with regard to this great disaster, the cattle plague. I certainly am not surprised, considering the length of time this disaster has continued, and the fact that it is in most parts of the country rather on the increase than on the decrease, that noble Lords should express themselves somewhat warmly upon the subject. I doubt, however, whether the noble Earl who has just sat down (the Earl of Winchilsea) is justified in characterizing the Government as burglars, and the actual importers of the cattle plague into this country, in so light and cheery a manner, scarcely befitting the gravity of the subject to which he was referring. The noble Duke who spoke fourth in the debate (the Duke of Richmond) and the noble Earl (the Earl of Winchilsea) have impugned the legality of the course pursued by the Government, and they have expressed their belief that the Government had no right to give power to the local authorities to issue orders. But the fact is that the local authorities did not issue orders—they only received authority to carry into effect, by giving notices, the general Order of the Privy Council. I cannot believe that the noble Lord who has proposed an Amendment (Lord Feversham) seriously wishes to press it upon the consideration of your Lordships, whatever may be his opinion as to the course pursued by the Government in not assuming from the first the responsibility of issuing an Order for a uniform system throughout the country. If he does press the Amendment he certainly will not secure the vote of the noble Earl behind me (the Earl of Essex), who confesses that measures which would be welcomed now would not have been regarded with favour six months since. It would have been perfectly impossible for the Government to put a stop to the importation of foreign cattle and the movement of cattle in the United Kingdom at the commencement of July last. The accusations made by the noble Duke (the Duke of Rutland) against the Government are not consistent, and one or the other of them must necessarily be unfounded. He charges Her Majesty's Government with having done nothing, and with having done worse than nothing; one of these charges, if established, must disprove the other. Her Majesty's Government knew nothing concerning the existence of the disease until the 10th of July, and cases were reported in Kent on the 14th of July, in Sussex on the 18th, and in Hampshire on the 21st of the same month. Now, allowing only seven days for the incubation of the disease, the contagion must have existed in Kent on the 7th and in Sussex on the 11th—the day following that on which the Government heard for the first time of the existence of the disease in the country; so that no uniform system could have excluded the plague, even if the Government could have accepted and acted upon one. I will refer presently to the question whether the conduct of the Government has been judicious; but in answer to the charge that we have done nothing, I claim for the Government and for the officers concerned in the subject very great activity in the matter. On the afternoon of the 10th of July, Professor Simonds gave information that he had reason to believe that the rinderpest existed in the city in some few cases. I was informed of the matter that afternoon, and I gave immediate orders that Professor Simonds should at once examine into the nature and causes of the disease, and report upon the cases which were said to have occurred. Orders were also particularly given to the police, who assisted in the investigation. On the 17th the Professor reported. We received his letter on the 18th, and we communicated that day with the Home Office. They replied, stating that under the Act alluded to an Order in Council could be issued; and we gave urgent instructions the same day to prepare the Order which was subsequently passed on the 24th. The attention of the agricultural portion of the community had meanwhile been directed on the 12th by Professor Simonds to the existence of the disease, and between that time and the 24th, when the first Order was passed, there were consultations of every kind. It will, however, weary your Lordships if I go into the details of every matter which engaged the attention of the Privy Council. I may mention one fact with regard to the illustrious statesman whose decease has been lamented on both sides of the House—that he paid great attention to the subject to within a week of his death; and, as a singular instance of the activity of his mind, I may add that a very short time before his death he wrote a clear and lucid memorandum on the scientific part of the question. There has been an excellent pamphlet written by Dr. Lyon Playfair, one of the Commissioners, and in that pamphlet he throws considerable blame on the Government; but he distinctly says that up to the time of the Report of the Commission the action of the Government was prompt and decidedly in advance of public opinion, and I think that there cannot possibly be a doubt as to the truth of that statement. He says, as noble Lords have said to-day, that subsequent to the publication of the Report of the Commissioners, we lagged behind public opinion; and this charge may be true to a certain extent. But when public opinion was so divided upon the nature of the cattle plague and the manner of dealing with it, either by way of prevention or cure, it is not any strong accusation against the Government that they did not immediately act upon the many conflicting suggestions which might seem from time to time to receive the public approval. It was quite true that an able and competent Commission was appointed, and that a Report was issued by them at the end of October. It was two or three weeks before we acted upon the Report, and for this reason—that Commission was not unanimous. There are three other Reports appended by other members of the Commission, each of them not only different, but written with marked ability. It was, therefore, impossible for the Government to take action until the evidence upon which those Reports were framed had been printed. It has been suggested that we have endeavoured to get rid of all odium, that we have shrunk from all responsibility which belonged to us as the Executive by throwing it upon the local magistrates. But I may say that there has been no timidity in this matter on the part of the Government. I believe the duty of the Government is to do that which they believe to be right, and especially to avoid doing that which they feel they cannot efficiently and firmly carry out. With regard to an enforced uniformity of action, each noble Lord who has spoken upon the subject has referred to the different modes in which the various Orders of the Privy Council have been carried out in the several counties of the kingdom. This diversity of practice I believe to be important evidence as to whether it is possible for the central authority beneficially to enforce uniformity and at once to establish an iron rule, and to carry it out in the different districts. It is said by the noble Duke (the Duke of Rutland), that foreign countries have successfully encountered the disease, and that it is disgraceful that we should have failed when Prussia and France have succeeded.

Earl Granville

I must ask the noble Duke to consider the great difference between this country and Prussia and France. I may mention that Austria entirely failed in stamping the disease out; while Prussia and France, dealing with it boldly, were eminently successful. It has been said that a week of the rule of Louis Napoleon was the only thing which could stop the progress of the disease in this country. But it must not be forgotten that Louis Napoleon possesses advantages not possessed by the constitutional Government of this country, it is impossible to carry out here the rule which is so successful abroad. The central power is so paramount in France that a man cannot cut down wood on his own estate without first communicating with the Minister of the Interior. Many persons, whether Legitimists, Orleanists, or Imperialists, complain that the action of local government is paralyzed by the very centralized system which has not been introduced by the Emperor of the French in particular, but which has been the ordinary system of the French Government for many years. But the consequence of that centralized system is that the organization is perfect. Government has its own prefects and under-prefects; its own mayors appointed by itself, Gens d'Armes and Gardes-Champêtres upon every field, the whole forming the most powerful Government that can be. In the same way in Prussia a system somewhat similar is adopted. The people are accustomed to it and like it, but every little matter forms the object of the solicitude of Government. If you are going down a hill in a light carriage you are obliged to put down the drag in a certain place, and to take it up at another. That system may be regarded in that country as a very perfect one, but would it be endured here for a day? Is it impossible for this question to be dealt with, and successfully dealt with, by our local governments? You have counties in England where the methods of encountering the disease have been perfectly successful, and yet where it would have been impossible for the Government to have successfully attempted action. Thus, in Aberdeenshire the local authorities have been able to deal with it. I am sorry to hear that the disease has once or twice attacked that county. It was quite curious, in one of the last cases, to see how nine or ten gentlemen, without any compulsory laws, took upon themselves to subscribe the necessary funds, and, by purchasing and killing the diseased cattle, entirely to stamp it out in a way which it would be impossible for a central Government to attempt. But the noble Duke complains of the different systems adopted in different counties. Now, the arrangements in the North Riding of Yorkshire are different from those in the West Riding, and I have seen a letter from the chairman of the committee of the latter division of the county, in which he gives the strongest possible opinion that the notion of sending the butcher to the ox would be most injurious, and would be most likely to propagate the disease, and to enable the farmer and the butcher to palm off bad meat upon the public. With respect to giving directions to the local authorities in boroughs, there is the case of Liverpool, where a difficulty arose from the market being out of the district of the borough; but in that case the disputing parties met, and I believe that the difficulty has been compromised. With regard to public opinion, I do not know how far public opinion goes in reference to this matter, but the debates in Parliament will be the best test of it. It has been said that the Government should have enforced uniform action from the beginning. Now in order to bring the question of uniformity of action before the justices, a circular was sent to the chairmen of quarter sessions on the 12th of October, asking them to give suggestions for the consideration of the Government; and in only two instances—in that of Northumberland and Bedfordshire—was a uniform course demanded, the general request being that the local authorities should have power to stop the removal of infected beasts and of manure. My Lords, I think it is some indication of the great difficulty of dealing with this subject, and of the great changes which have taken place in public opinion with respect to it, that there are such great differences of opinion between the very competent men who act on the Commission. I am told—I suppose I am at liberty to mention it—that another Report is already agreed to by the Commissioners appointed to consider the subject, which will contain most valuable information, but which will not offer any further suggestions as to the course which should be taken by Government—I suppose in consequence of our not having attended to their previous recommendations. The noble Lord (the Earl of Essex) has asked me what the Government intend doing in the matter. My reply is that at the earliest possible moment—on Monday next, I believe—it is intended that a Bill shall be introduced into the other House to make some alterations in the law, and making various changes which we think will be useful. I am quite sure that any Bill of this sort will be met in no party spirit, but will be treated as a measure to be adopted for the advantage of the country. I am sure that your Lordships will excuse my not anticipating the introduction of that Bill by making any statement as to its provisions.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I watched for some time for some Member of the Government to rise to address your Lordships on the subject to which the noble Earl who has last spoken has just referred, and I am glad that at last some information has been presented to us. My noble Friend, however, is so successful in making the "worse" cause appear the "better," that I cannot refrain from offering a few remarks on his speech. Every noble Lord who has spoken, whether on this or the other side of the House, has agreed in condemning the course which Her Majesty's Government have taken on this subject. For my own part I am afraid I must endorse their opinions, and perhaps even go beyond what they have said; for while not going so far as to say that the Government are responsible for the introduction of this disease, I do say they are responsible for its spread and extension throughout the country. The noble Earl endeavoured to vindicate the Government on two points. He said that it would have been impossible for the Government to have acted differently in the months of July and August, when the disease first became known; and he also said it was impossible to establish uniformity of action throughout the country. Now, I will not take up the case at that early date; but I will show to your Lordships that a few months later the Government might and ought to have acted. There were then, at least, several alternatives open to them, the adoption of any of which would have brought the question to a more or less successful issue. When once the Government were made aware of the appalling state of circumstances revealed, they ought to have called Parliament together and taken its opinion on the matter. Failing Parliament being called together, they might have acted under those powers which it was thought were of sufficient force to meet the emer-agency; or, lastly, if they were not disposed to exercise their own responsibility, they should, in justice and pity to the country, have enabled the local bodies, to whom they had transferred those responsibilities, to act with effect. But in none of these points have the Government done their duty. The Report of the Commissioners was published in the middle of October, and when was Parliament called together? On the 6th of February—several days later than for years it had been customary to be assembled. This is trifling with the question. It is a mockery of the great interests which are suffering and almost perishing at this moment. But putting aside the question of calling together Parliament, suppose the Government had acted under the powers which belonged to them. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) says it was impossible for them to act as desired, because we had not a centralized Government; and the noble Earl quoted the examples of Austria, France, and Prussia, to show the power of action of centralized Governments. France and Austria might have so acted; but was Belgium a centralized Government? Was it necessary to have an autocratic Government in order to close the ports of Ireland? Was it necessary to have an autocracy in order to keep the county of Aberdeen free from disease? Why, the great agricultural societies have been earnestly pressing the Government to take action in this matter. But was it not in their power to stop or regulate the importation of diseased or doubtful cattle from infected countries? You know that importation had brought the disease; and, for anything you know, importation might be extending it. Yet importation was allowed to go on. Again, why was the Metropolitan Market allowed to remain open—that market which has been the curse of the country, which was not only itself an open centre of infection, but was distributing the disease in every direction. Again, you had inspection in your own hands—what did you do in that respect? Inspectors were appointed under such a system that inspection either resulted in the indiscriminate slaughter of every beast attacked, or became a mere idle form and ceremony. Inspectors were required to pass cattle at night, when they could not see them, and when it was absolutely impossible they could perform their duties. On this very ground we had at the same time inspectors appointed by the Privy Council Office, by the Metropolitan Market's Committee, and by the Middlesex magistrates. Some, too, of those inspectors were utterly ignorant of their duties. Some were tradesmen, shoemakers, even butchers; and so, partly from ignorance, partly from jealousy, partly from conflicting powers, facilities were given for the extension of the disease. A very moderate amount of foresight and regulation would have disposed of all this difficulty. But I go farther. I ask why did not the Government take measures to stimulate the ingenuity of private individuals by offering rewards for the discovery of a remedy for the disease? When, a few weeks ago, vaccination was thought to be one of the suitable remedies, there was a complete deficiency even of vaccine matter in London. I fully admit that the whole question of insurance is surrounded by the greatest possible difficulty; but we had at least a right to expect that in a letter of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, published in the autumn, incitements should not be held out to the illusory schemes of local insurances which have failed, and which will in nine cases out of ten fail. But if the Government were not disposed to act in this matter, they were at least bound to give sufficient powers to the local authorities to enable them to act. What did they do? They issued Orders in Council, but those Orders in Council are so contradictory and confused as to be of no use whatever. I would call attention to two of these Orders. One is dated the 23rd of November, which consolidated all previous Orders. It vested the powers henceforth in the hands of petty sessions. But, as every child might know, this immediately led to an extraordinary difference of action throughout the country, each bench acting on a separate principle, and such was the confusion introduced that it became impossible to know under what law any county, or even any part of a county, was governed. But the Government began to find out their mistake, and so they passed another Order, in which they rushed from one extreme to another—from the petty sessions to quarter sessions. But quarter sessions are a very unwieldy body, and there is the greatest difficulty in getting them to work. They are very well calculated to discuss business once in three months, but they are wholly unfit to deal with sudden emergencies. Without powers of delegation the greatest difficulty was experienced in working the Orders in Council, the meetings being adjourned in many cases from fortnight to fortnight, or die in diem. But the Government could not even draw up the Order without the grossest blunders. This Order in Council was dated the 3rd of January. The quarter sessions met without exception on the 1st or 2nd of January, and consequently, though they might discuss, they could not pass the resolutions, and gentlemen, after attending the quarter sessions from different parts, were obliged to separate without doing anything in respect to these resolutions. Was it fair for the Government to throw the country into all this confusion, and cause this unnecessary grievance? Was there no almanack in any department of the Privy Council to inform the noble Earl that by Act of Parliament all quarter sessions are to be held on a certain day, or was the Home Secretary really ignorant of the facts, or was he really indifferent to the whole matter? I should like to ask the Government the reason of the very unsatisfactory nature of these proceedings. The noble Earl says that a memorial in October was sent up to the Privy Council Office from one court of quarter sessions, pointing out the great danger attending the transmission of hides and manure. If there is one thing more than another that is dangerous and deleterious it is the free transmission of hides and manures, but the Government did not deal with it until the 20th of January last; and this, of which in October the noble Earl was warned as dangerous, was left utterly uncared for till that 20th of January. I will now ask the House to consider a question which will be very often asked—namely, “Where are we at this moment—what is the position in which we now stand?” Ever since the adoption of free trade the agriculture of the country has been mainly dependent on the breeding of stock; and can any reasonable man deny that in the destruction of stock a very great difficulty is imposed upon the farmer of England to maintain his solvency and to pay his way? Their cattle are perishing at the rate of 10,000 a week, and that rate is progressing under such circumstances that there is a great probability that our agriculture will be brought to an entire stop; but if it do not disappear the loss of stock which has been already sustained, and is being now sustained, must so dislocate the whole circle and machinery of agriculture as in a short time to bring it to a standstill. A noble

Lord who spoke earlier in the evening (the Earl of Essex), pointed out very truly that this is a most critical time of the year. We shall have in a month or six weeks all the cattle now under cover turned out. At Lady Day there will be changes in tenancies, sales of produce, breeding and grazing difficulties, in fact, all sorts of movements and re-arrangements. Unless between this and then we succeed in striking down this disease we shall find the landlords on the eve of bankruptcy, and the tenants on the eve of ruin. I cannot conceive any calamity greater than that which at this moment threatens to overwhelm us; and what has Her Majesty's Government done to avert it? They have done absolutely nothing—nothing—nothing. I listened to all that fell from the noble Earl with great attention, but I could not trace the faintest indication in it of one single measure of practical utility. I do not pretend to know what were the motives of Her Majesty's Government, but I will state to the House what people in the country say. When they did not call Parliament together in the autumn, people say that the Government knew its own insecure and shaky position, and feared to meet Parliament. When they did not act themselves and use the power they were already possessed of, but threw the responsibility upon others, people say they feared the clamour which might arise in the great towns at any disturbance of the meat market—that they dreaded the displeasure of the consumer rather than remembered the duty of considering what were the best interests of the whole community. I will not say myself that these conjectures are true; but I think it is perfectly clear from what has taken place that the Government were exceedingly ignorant. I do entreat them to bring forward at once, and without delay, some measures which will meet the difficulty. There are three things to be done. First of all we have to deal with the question of importation. Depend upon it, the agriculturists will never stand having a drawn sword continually suspended over their heads in the shape of imported disease always ready to descend upon them. Importation must, therefore, either be regulated, or it must be stopped. Secondly, something must be done in the next few weeks to smite down the disease, and to bring it within manageable compass. God knows whether that is now possible or not, but it is the bounden duty of the Government to try. Thirdly, when the disease is checked some carefully constructed and efficient machinery must be devised by which we may eradicate it as often and as fast as it appears again; for I fear it will live in the country for years and years before it finally disappears. I was glad to hear the noble Earl say the Government would next week propose some Bill on this question; but I should have been much better pleased if he had at once laid his proposition on the table. Every single hour of delay swells the mischief in an enormous degree, and I hope to have before the close of the debate some more satisfactory assurance on this point.

THE MARQUESS OF ABERCORN: My Lords, in the few observations I am about to make, I shall confine myself to one point only. I agree with the noble Mover and Seconder of the Address in their remarks upon the mischievous conspiracy which has unfortunately broken out in Ireland; and I think with them, that the measures adopted by the Lord Lieutenant have been marked with vigour and good sense. The dignified demeanour of the Judges, the courage and discernment displayed by the juries under circumstances of no ordinary difficulty, the prudent and courteous attitude of the counsel for the prosecution—and, indeed, for the defence also—have all tended to increase the dignity of the law in Ireland. But while I do not find fault, and feel rather inclined to give praise for what has happened since the issue of the Special Commission, I think the late Government have acted most unwisely in delaying these prosecutions so long. It is hardly fair to charge upon the present Government of Ireland the delays of its predecessor; but the Home Government is substantially the same, and therefore we can hardly acquit them altogether. The delay which postponed these prosecutions until after the general election was most unwise and most unfortunate. It may be invidious to inquire too closely what so suddenly aroused the Government from its slumbers to a sense of danger at the exact moment when the votes of the electors were all recorded at the general election; but, whatever the cause, the Government has incurred a deep responsibility for allowing the seeds of sedition to be sown broadcast before their eyes. With your permission, my Lords, I will state a few facts respecting this Fenian conspiracy, which are not generally known. In 1858-9 the Government of the noble Earl who sits near me (the Earl of Derby) had received information of the existence of the Phoenix Society, evidently the precursor and nursery of Fenianism. Some ten or twelve persons were then arrested, and one of them, named Sullivan, was sentenced to ten years' penal servitude. The others, owing to some informality in their trials, were re-committed, the presiding Judge thinking the evidence so strong against them that he refused to admit them to bail. In the interval before the next trial my noble Friend retired from office, and was succeeded by the late Government. The first act of Mr. Cardwell—who was appointed Secretary for Ireland under the new Administration—was to liberate all those persons, on the condition that they should plead guilty and be liberated on their recognizances, holding them liable at any time to be called up for judgment. This was done; but these prisoners made it a condition, before they would accept these terms, that their colleague, who had been sentenced to ten years' penal servitude, should also be released on the same terms. Of these men, three were named Donovan, Rosser, and Mulghany. What, I ask, has been the result of that misplaced leniency? Why, that the very men I have mentioned have been tried again and sentenced to ten years' penal servitude by the Commission which has recently held its sittings in Ireland, for the aggravated offence of which they have since been guilty; the Government having, with what I cannot help regarding as a total want of judgment, permitted them to remain in Dublin during the last four or five years hatching their plots, instead of having, as they might have done, according to the terms imposed in 1859, called them up for judgment. Again, the head of the conspirators—Shake—otherwise the notorious Stephens, who had absconded to avoid being convicted by my noble Friend's Government, was, notwithstanding that the Government were in possession of evidence in connection with him, which ought to have made them cautious, allowed to return to Ireland, and to lay the foundation of all those machinations which have almost broken out into open insurrection; while Donovan became the editor of The Irish People, and was allowed to propagate the most violent and seditious doctrines, although the Government had it in their power to deal with him, as I have just stated, at any moment. I blame, too, the Government for sanctioning such a demonstration as that of the funeral of M'Manus, one of the rebels in 1848, which furnished the occasion for the making of seditious speeches, and the display of colours and badges which were well known to be of a Fenian character. There cannot, I think, be the slightest doubt that such laxity of conduct as that to which I advert has induced the Fenians to imagine that the Government either did not care to interfere with their proceedings, or dared not interpose their authority. As to the ultimate result of that conspiracy, although I cannot absolve the Government from the charge of having by their remissness allowed it to grow to its present height, and although it has dealt a blow to the commercial credit, the security and the advancement of Ireland, which all the conciliatory measures which the present or any other Ministry may pass will fail for some time to come to obviate, yet I have no ultimate apprehension of the result, for I feel satisfied there is in that country an amount of loyalty by which the evil will be successfully combated.

EARL GREY: My Lords, I shall not follow the noble Earl who has just sat down into the subject with which he has dealt, not because I do not think it of the highest importance, but because I hope it will, on some future occasion, be brought seriously under our notice by Her Majesty's Government. There is, however, another subject, not certainly of greater importance, but of greater urgency, on which more than one noble Lord has spoken this evening, and on which I should like to make a few remarks. I allude to the cattle plague, for their conduct in respect to which the Government have been severely censured by more than one of the noble Lords who have preceded me. I do not think that in all respects this censure is deserved; because I believe that for some time after the disease broke out it would have been difficult, if not impossible, for them to adopt measures as stringent as the nature of the case would seem to demand. We were most of us at first—at least, I certainly was myself—but very imperfectly aware of the magnitude of the calamity, and up to the time when the Report of the Commission was issued, and even somewhat beyond that period, I have no serious fault to find with the course which the Government pursued.

Since then, however, their conduct has not, in my opinion, been so decided as it ought to have been, nor do they appear to me to have been sufficiently alive to the great importance of the crisis. As was said by my noble Friend who spoke last but one (the Earl of Carnarvon), the breeding and feeding of cattle is now the groundwork of all improved agriculture. Ever since the repeal of the Corn Laws we have been pressing on the farmers the necessity of breeding more cattle, we have been continually telling them that to grow more and cheaper corn they must keep more stock, and this advice has been generally acted upon. To increase their cattle in order to increase the productiveness of their land has been the great object of the best farmers, and the destruction of their stock by such a scourge as the cattle plague would break down our whole present system of agriculture, and might occasion a loss which it would take half a century to repair. This calamity is one of the most fearful that can be imagined. It means the insolvency of the whole tenantry of England, the impoverishment of the landlords, and the destruction of English agriculture. Under these circumstances Her Majesty's Government, knowing what had been the experience of other countries—how all attempts to cure the disease had proved futile, and, on the other hand, how successful measures of prevention had been—was it not their duty to take preventive measures of the most stringent character? That they properly discharged their duty in leaving matters to the local authorities I, for one, utterly deny. The noble Earl spoke of following public opinion in this matter. I cannot admit any such excuse. It is the duty of the Government to lead, and not to follow public opinion. Public opinion, I say, my Lords, requires to be led by those who hold the high position of Her Majesty's Ministers—the direction should be given from above and not from below. The English people, and indeed all nations that are fit for freedom, are ever disposed to follow the guidance of their authorized leaders when they act with vigour and judgment, and it is when such qualities are wanting in its leaders that the country is dissatisfied. Nay more, I say that no Government is more likely to lose the confidence and support of a people than one which seeks to evade or to shift from itself responsibility. For my part, I think too highly of the English nation not to believe that they would be prepared to support their Government if it exhibited promptitude and energy in a great emergency. But if Her Majesty's Ministers were not willing to act upon their own responsibility by adopting more stringent measures to stay the pestilence, how can they defend themselves for not having called Parliament together at an earlier period? During the winter months the movement of cattle from one place to another might have been entirely suspended, without inflicting any permanent injury or very heavy loss upon the country, and without occasioning an amount of inconvenience too great to be temporarily borne. [Earl GRANVILLE: Fat stock?] I purposely avoid entering into details, but if fat cattle were allowed once to go to market, they ought never to be allowed to return from it. In the winter months, I repeat, the inconvenience to which I have referred might be submitted to, and I believe that if Parliament had been called together early in November, and if the Government had explained to Parliament, and through Parliament to the country, what was required to meet the urgent necessities of the case, both Parliament and the country would have supported them in adopting such stringent measures as by this time might have checked this fatal scourge. But now the plague has been spreading; every week shows an increase over its predecessor in the extent of its ravages, and both the expense and the difficulty of stopping the pestilence would be tenfold greater than it would have been only two months ago. By neither taking effectual measures on their own authority, nor yet calling Parliament together and so allowing the country an opportunity of declaring its wish for the timely adoption of severe regulations, the Government have incurred a very grave responsibility; for, by not summoning Parliament it is not that they have done nothing; they have done a great deal, for they have deprived the country of the means of enforcing those regulations which I believe in Northumberland—I cannot so well speak for other counties—almost every man was of opinion ought to have been adopted to stay this dreadful disease. There the complaint is that during those months, when these regulations would have been effectual and comparatively but slightly inconvenient, next to nothing was done; and now when the spring is coming on, when all the fodder for cattle in the houses is nearly exhausted and the cattle must of necessity be put out to feed, the difficulty of stopping infection will be infinitely greater than before. If Parliament had met earlier much might have been done to check the ravages of the disease, by enabling counties to raise money by rates for the purpose of buying and destroying infected cattle. Your Lordships are aware with how much success this has been done by means of a voluntary association in Aberdeenshire; but it was impossible, unless the law had given greater powers than now exist, that this example should have been generally followed by other counties. In a county situated like Aberdeenshire, which is not very populous, where the farms are generally large and the tenants a highly energetic and intelligent class of men, voluntary action and association in this matter were possible; but none of your Lordships who are acquainted with our English counties will believe that such a system would be practicable in them. Certainly it would not be practicable to the same extent here as in Aberdeenshire. For these reasons, I must say I think Her Majesty's Government are liable to severe censure for the course they have pursued. I am quite aware that their intentions were excellent, and that want of judgment and of vigour was their only fault; but in such a case as this, the lack of those qualities is about as serious a fault as a Government can have.

My Lords, I would next advert to the portion of the Speech from the Throne which refers to the subject of Parliamentary Reform. The Speech says—

“I have directed that information should be procured in reference to the rights of voting in the election of Members to serve in Parliament for counties, cities, and boroughs. When that information is complete, the attention of Parliament will be called to the result thus obtained, with a view to such improvements in the laws which regulate the rights of voting in the election of Members of the House of Commons as may tend to strengthen our free institutions and conduce to the public welfare.”

My Lords, when I read those words, I cannot but infer that the reports which have been in circulation on this matter are really true—I mean the rumours that Her Majesty's Government intend to deal with the great question of Reform by introducing a Bill, the whole scope of which will be confined to a reduction of the franchise. My Lords, I need hardly tell you that for some time reports to this effect have been generally current, but hitherto I had refused to give them directly to degrade and demoralize the electors that it would be almost better to put the seats up to public auction, and dispose of them to the highest bidders. My Lords, these are facts which I defy any man to disprove; and with these facts before us, can it for a moment be pretended that a Reform Bill would deserve its name if it omitted all reference to evils so gross, and make no effort to remove them? But a Reform Bill confined to the reduction of the franchise would increase these evils; for I have no hesitation in saying that in some of the smaller boroughs a reduction of the franchise would introduce corruption where it does not now exist. Such a Bill, therefore, would be a sham and a delusion unless meant only to serve, as suggested by Mr. Bright, as a stepping-stone towards further changes. I do not forget that, when a Reform Bill was last before the House of Commons, the small boroughs were ably defended by very high authorities. It was argued, that however objectionable they may be in principle, however gross some of the abuses to which they give rise, yet practically they provide for the entrance into the House of Commons of a class of Members who would otherwise be shut out, and who could not be excluded without serious detriment to the character of that House, and to its fitness for the discharge of its duties. I am far from contending that these arguments are without weight, or that there is no truth in the statements on which they rest; but it does not follow, because there is a certain amount of good mixed up with the gross abuses which now prevail, that we ought contentedly to allow these abuses to flourish. The juster conclusion would seem to be that, to which we might also be led by other considerations, that the simple disfranchisement of the smaller boroughs would be unwise; that a good Reform Bill cannot be produced by merely attempting to tinker the existing system, but must be founded on a careful revision of that system as a whole; that we ought closely to examine its working, and decide upon the changes to be introduced in a spirit of reverence for what experience has proved to be good in our Constitution, but with courage to deal boldly with real abuses. A Reform of this kind, it may be said, would be so difficult to carry that it would be vain to attempt it. I do not deny that there would be difficulty in accomplishing a real Reform of Parliament; but in human affairs to attain great objects, great difficulties must generally be encountered. Painful labour, earnest and anxious effort, seem to be the means appointed by Providence for accomplishing all that is truly good and valuable whether for men or for nations. It would, undoubtedly, be no easy task to devise and carry a Reform Bill really deserving the name—a Reform Bill not meant only to serve the temporary interests of a Ministry or a party, or to meet unreasonable and ill-considered demands from any part of the nation, but wisely calculated to promote the good of the whole and to strengthen the foundations of our Constitution. This would, indeed, be no easy task; but is that a reason for our allowing a scheme glaringly bad and imperfect to be carried? And I must add, that the circumstances of the present time afford an opportunity that ought not to be neglected for endeavouring to carry a really good Reform. The general prosperity and tranquillity of the country, and the absence of bitter party spirit, afford facilities such as we have never before enjoyed for a deliberate consideration of this most important subject. All parties, too, have admitted some Reform to be needed, and all are, I believe, sincerely anxious that the question should be settled without delay and in a satisfactory manner. If, therefore, proper means are adopted by Her Majesty's Ministers for arriving at the result we desire, I see no reason for despairing that a plan of Reform might be worked out, which would meet with the approval of the great majority of men of intelligence, and calm and sober judgment. But whatever hopes of this kind we may entertain would be dashed to the ground by the bringing forward of any ill-considered and partial measure by the Government. The bringing forward of such a measure would be only too sure again to rouse the spirit of faction and of political animosity, and to banish that calmness which is necessary for the satisfactory settlement of the question. I must, therefore, earnestly appeal to my noble Friend (Earl Russell) to save us from so great a calamity, even if to do so he should be compelled to postpone somewhat longer than he could wish bringing this subject under the consideration of Parliament. I am as anxious as he can be that the question should be settled without unnecessary delay, but it is a case in which the old proverb "the more haste the worse speed" will be found eminently true. A little time would be well spent in previous the House of Representatives of the American Congress. There was no attempt to disguise his object, but he said it would be very unwise to attempt too much at once, because then he said they would be sure to be defeated; but, he added, that if they could induce the Government to introduce a Bill only to alter the franchise, and if the Government should carry the Bill with their support, they would obtain an improved position, and, to use his significant word, "an improved leverage" for further Parliamentary action. That is a significant word, "leverage," for it implies the overthrow of the whole existing system, so that there may be a clear ground for building up a new one. If I concurred with Mr. Bright as to the result to be aimed at, I should entirely concur with him as to the means to be used. If I thought it desirable to make the House of Commons a mere numerical representation of the majority, and not of all classes and interests, then I should say by all means adopt the course which Mr. Bright recommends; because, if such a sweeping change as he aims at were proposed openly and at once, it would not only be scouted by both Houses of Parliament, but scouted also by the nation. I believe that an overwhelming majority of the whole nation would reject at once measures of this kind if openly proposed. But I also know—and Mr. Bright seems to know likewise—from the experience of other countries, that nations may be brought by degrees to adopt plans which they would shrink from if pressed upon them in their full extent at once; that, in short, a fortress which defies capture by storm may very often be taken by sap. Differing altogether from Mr. Bright as to the object we ought to strive for, and believing that we ought to improve the present Constitution, and not to invent a new one, I think the first point we ought to insist upon in a Reform Bill is that it shall be one which the Ministers who propose it can conscientiously recommend to us as being calculated permanently to settle the question; and, therefore, a much larger measure would give me far less alarm than such a Bill as it is implied by the Speech that we may expect. Let me point out to my noble Friend that a Bill dealing with the franchise only never can be accepted as a settlement of the question by a sincere Reformer. Any measure intended to settle this question must deal with the present distribution of seats; because this is the part of the existing system which stands most in need of amendment. The present franchise may be faulty, and I believe it is, but, at all events, it is not repugnant to reason and common sense. It may have the fault of not providing sufficiently for the representation of the working classes, but assuredly it by no means excludes them from all share of political power. In the Committee which your Lordships appointed in 1860, it was proved that in one, at least, of the present boroughs the working men formed the majority of the whole constituency. In others, particularly the manufacturing boroughs, the working men form a large portion of the voters, and that a much larger number of them might be in the possession of the franchise if they chose. It was proved that very many of them earn wages quite sufficient to enable them to live in £10 houses were it not, unfortunately, too common for them to spend their money in indulgences it would be far better for them to forego, instead of in providing comfortable homes for their families. The law regulating the right of voting is also open to objections, on account of its complexity and the uncertainty of its operation, because it depends upon the interpretation of nice legal questions. Still it cannot be denied that under the provisions of the law as it stands Members are returned for our counties and boroughs, who, upon the whole, very fairly represent the opinions of the places where they are chosen. Nothing of the same kind can be said in favour of the existing distribution of seats. It rests upon no principle whatever, but is utterly arbitrary and capricious. The shares of political power conferred upon different constituencies have not the slightest relation either to their comparative numbers, wealth, or intelligence, their independence, or even their general character. You have the right of separate representation withheld from large and flourishing towns, whose inhabitants are distinguished for their independence and intelligence; and, on the other hand, you have that right enjoyed by decayed boroughs of 200 or 300 voters, and sometimes of even a smaller number, who possess no such qualifications. Some of these boroughs are to all intents and purposes nomination boroughs, some are much worse, being venal and utterly corrupt. Not only are the returns for these places governed by money, but by money employed in a manner which tends so directly to degrade and demoralize the electors that it would be almost better to put the seats up to public auction, and dispose of them to the highest bidders. My Lords, these are facts which I defy any man to disprove; and with these facts before us, can it for a moment be pretended that a Reform Bill would deserve its name if it omitted all reference to evils so gross, and make no effort to remove them? But a Reform Bill confined to the reduction of the franchise would increase these evils; for I have no hesitation in saying that in some of the smaller boroughs a reduction of the franchise would introduce corruption where it does not now exist. I am as anxious as he can be that the question should be settled without unnecessary delay, but it is a case in which the old proverb "the more haste the worse speed" will be found eminently true. A little time would be well spent in previous preparations, for the purpose of ensuring that the Reform Bill to be submitted to Parliament may be found well adapted to answer its purpose, and to gain the acceptance both of Parliament and of the nation. And in pressing these considerations upon Her Majesty's Ministers, allow me to remind them that, desirable as it is to settle the question of Reform, there is no pressing and immediate necessity for doing this at once, in order to apply a remedy to any crying evils so far as relates to the manner in which the House of Commons as now constituted discharges its high duties in the government of the country. We have not now to deal with such a state of things as we had in 1830. In 1830 it was justly imputed to the un-reformed House of Commons that it had become altogether unequal to the proper performance of its functions in the Constitution; that for many years it had grossly failed either truly to represent public opinion, or to secure to the nation the benefits of good government and wise legislation; that it had, on the contrary, become an instrument for maintaining grievous abuses and even the cause of their existence. This I repeat was justly said of the un-reformed House of Commons; it cannot with even a colour of justice be said of the reformed one, which successfully, and with great benefit to the nation, discharge the duties that belong to it. However desirable, therefore, a further Reform may be, a change is not now of the pressing and urgent necessity that it was five-and-thirty years ago. And, in support of this assertion, I will cite a witness of very high authority. In the speech at Rochdale to which I have already referred, Mr. Bright, in speaking of the Reform Act of 1832, desired his hearers

"To look to the great changes which have taken place since that stirring event, changes, all of which" he informed them "with scarcely any considerable exception, have been in favour of freedom, and in favour of the right and true interests of the great masses of our population."

And he then proceeded to show that greater security had thus been given to the Throne, and that "The realm has been for years more tranquil, and for a longer period than at any period of our recorded history."

I presume that Mr. Bright would agree with me in thinking that the end of all government is the welfare of the people, and that a Reform of Parliament is only desirable as the means of arriving more surely at that end; but if so, when Mr. Bright himself informs us that the House of Commons, as now constituted under the Reform Act, has worked so well for the good of the people, we have a right to infer that there can be no such pressing necessity for again altering the arrangement which was made in 1832 as to warrant our introducing fresh changes, without most carefully examining them to ascertain whether they will indeed be improvements. I trust, therefore, we shall not be asked to adopt blindly an obviously imperfect measure, which can only be regarded as the first instalment of what used to be called in derision "bit-by-bit Reform." If any such proposal should unfortunately be made to us, I trust that we shall reject it; but, on the other hand, I hope we shall also avoid the equally dangerous mistake of refusing all Reform. After what has happened in the last few years, I am persuaded that the present Constitution of the House of Commons cannot be permanently maintained unaltered. Its faults are too real and too serious for this to be either possible or desirable; and an obstinate rejection of all Reform, while the question might be dealt with deliberately and calmly, will surely lead in the end to our being driven to adopt in haste dangerous if not fatal measures. As men of sense and judgment, we ought alike to avoid the mistakes of both extremes, and neither consent to rash and ill-considered changes, nor yet refuse our assent to those which are really required. Let us look our position fairly in the face, and having taken proper pains to ascertain what improvements are required in the Constitution, let us endeavour, with all our strength, to carry those improvements into effect. I do not argue in favour of more delay than is necessary for due deliberation in order to make sure that the steps we may decide upon taking are the right ones. And if for this purpose it should be necessary that the question of Parliamentary Reform should for a short time be postponed, there will be ample room for the exercise of all the energy and wisdom of Parliament in dealing with other and pressing subjects. The state of Ireland has been adverted to in Her Majesty's Speech, and requires early and grave consideration. The municipal Government of this great town, which every day more clearly shows to be in a state utterly unsatisfactory, ought to be remodelled. The question as to what measures ought to be taken for extending education, for checking pauperism, and saving a large part of our population from their present degraded condition, is one of the deepest interest, since no man can look at the evils physical as well as moral, of which the existence in our large cities has of late years been revealed, without feelings both of alarm and of shame. Then, too, the abuses in the employment of children, and the difficult questions as to the mutual relations of labourers and their employers, urgently demand the attention of Parliament. The subjects I have mentioned—and I might have increased the list—urgently require the intervention of Parliament, in order to correct evils which have arisen, and to ward off dangers that threaten us from the growth of the nation, and from that very increase of its wealth and population which we are apt to regard with such pride and satisfaction. The progress of legislation has not been in proportion to the growing wants of a country so rapidly advancing. In the last Parliament especially, legislation on these questions has been nearly a blank, and little has been done to meet the new wants of our fast changing social condition. Not that I believe the last Parliament under proper guidance would have been either unable or unwilling to deal with the great social questions I have mentioned—it was the Ministers of the Crown who were unable or unwilling to assume the lead which properly belongs to the position they hold. I trust that now with a new Administration, and a new Parliament, these questions will be more vigorously dealt with. I am sure that their neglect would be ill compensated by throwing on the table of the House of Commons a crude and undigested measure of Parliamentary Reform. In conclusion, let me assure my noble Friend that, though I may have spoken strongly, I have made these remarks in no spirit of hostility to his Administration. It is, on the contrary, my earnest desire to see that Administration succeed, and to be enabled to give it my humble support; but I am convinced that neither the present nor any other Ministers of the Crown can long continue to hold office, either with advantage to the country or with credit to themselves, unless they apply themselves with earnestness and vigour to the great social problems which now agitate the public mind. This opinion is entertained not only by myself but is shared by many others. I feel,

Earl Grey

therefore, that I am really acting a friendly part towards my noble Friend in warning him of the necessity of deeply considering these matters before he has yet finally pledged his Government to any definite course of action.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, I am very sorry to be obliged to recall the attention of the House to the question of the cattle plague. Her Majesty's Government having announced their intention of bringing forward a measure on that subject—and as there is nothing in the Address to commit noble Lords to any opinion on the conduct of the Government—I must express my regret that the unanimity which is usually thought desirable in voting the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne has not been preserved on the present occasion, and that the subject of the cattle plague has not been reserved for discussion on some future day. At the same time, it would be scarcely respectful to those noble Lords who have in succession and with some violence attacked the conduct of the Government were I not to say a few words upon the subject. The main charge against the Government is that they have not adopted an uniform system for the whole of the country. I do not believe that the noble Lord (Lord Feversham) will push his Amendment to a division; but I would urge upon noble Lords who have supported the Amendment by their remarks that they ought at least to be at one among themselves respecting the course which the Government should have adopted. I have listened attentively to all the speeches which have been made upon the subject by noble Lords this evening, and, as far as I can make out, each one advocates a different course of action. The noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Rutland) applied to this side of the House the word "ignorant." I do not complain of the use of the word, but I will say that the speech of the noble Duke shows a singular want of information. He was, however, loudly cheered by those around him. He said—what was perfectly true—that the Government did take one or two energetic measures; and he indicated what they were. He said they prohibited the importation of cattle to Ireland and to the West of Scotland, the Highlands being particularly mentioned. He seemed to think that it was due to some personal influence of mine that importation had been prohibited in Argyllshire, and he asked me to explain how this exceptional treatment had arisen. I will explain what course the Government have pursued. They proceeded on precisely the same principles in one place as in another — namely, that of giving to unanimous local interest and local opinion that weight and authority which is strictly their due. They gave to local opinion full weight in England, as they did in Ireland and in Scotland. But look at the total difference in the local cases. Ireland is exclusively an exporting country. If it imports at all, it is only a few bulls for the purpose of breeding. The people of Ireland came in a body, and asked the Government to issue an Order in Council prohibiting the import of cattle into Ireland. There was no great consuming population in that country, and no agricultural interest to oppose the demand; and, therefore, as the country was unanimous upon the subject, Government determined to grant their request. The importation of cattle into the West of Scotland was prohibited under precisely similar circumstances; with the exception of a few prize bulls no cattle are ever imported into that part of the country, neither is there a consuming population who would suffer by the prohibition. Another circumstance which affected both Ireland and the West of Scotland, but not the rest of the kingdom, was that by their geographical position it was easy to carry the prohibition into effect, whereas in other cases it would at all events be exceedingly difficult to do so. I do not know whether the noble Duke thinks that it is due to my influence with the Privy Council that there are only two roads into the county of Argyll from the Low Country, and that there are only two or three ports on its seaboard; but, at all events, it is exceedingly easy to prevent cattle being driven along the former, or landed at the latter. I admit that the districts so isolated were benefited, and I hope they will continue to be benefited by the precautions which have been adopted. The suggestion of the noble Duke, however, that a similar prohibition might have been extended to the whole of Great Britain, is of an entirely different nature. In England there are a large number of counties and of large cities interested in the importation of cattle, and it would have been most injurious and unjust if Government, in the first instance, had prohibited the importation of cattle

into this country. Another point to which I wish to direct your Lordships' attention is, that although it may be quite possible that the plague reached this country from Europe, yet I do not think it has been proved that it came to us from any particular country. As has been already explained by the noble Earl (the President of the Council), before the disease was brought to the knowledge of the Government it had broken out in four or five distinct counties; and, although it may have been truly said that the infection was traced to the Metropolitan Market, yet no trace whatever exists to show how it was brought to London. With reference to "killing," instead of "curing," the noble Duke said that all attempts to cure the disease had failed, and that we must look to uniform and universal slaughter as the only remedy. But does the noble Duke mean to say that this was the opinion of the majority of the country in the earlier stages of the disease? Does the noble Duke not know that even last week propositions were made to cure infected animals? Does he not know that up to last week many people thought that a prevention of the disease was to be found in vaccination? Well, the Privy Council had issued an Order which gave to inspectors a compulsory power of slaughtering all infected animals—which was a very near approach to uniformity of action. The Order enabled every county which chose to adopt it to enter compulsorily any farmstead and do the work of slaughter. How was that measure received by the country? Why, I have no hesitation in saying that it was received in many parts of Scotland and England with positive indignation. At a meeting called in my own county several gentlemen expressed the greatest indignation at the power thus given to inspectors, and one gentleman, half in joke no doubt, but also half in earnest, said that if any inspector armed with such powers went into certain parts of the county it was a question whether he would ever come away again. This is the way in which any approach to uniformity of action was received, and even the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Winchilsea) himself has expressed great indignation at such a power having been given to inspectors. Well, but that was the earliest act of Government, and that was the way in which it was received. It was clear, therefore, that at that time the action of the Government was far ahead of the opinion of the public, as the latter were not aware of the extreme danger to be apprehended from the disease. The next step taken by Government was to appoint the Royal Commission, which recommended the stringent step of prohibiting the removal of cattle entirely, even from field to field, where they would have to traverse the public roads. The Government deliberated very seriously upon this matter; it was carefully discussed at three or four meetings of the Council; and all things considered, we came to the conclusion that the minority of the Commission, who did not agree in this recommendation, were in the right—that such a step at that time would not have been tolerated by public opinion, and that even if Government wished to adopt it we had not the machinery to carry it into effect. The county police are under the local authorities, and therefore, without the co-operation of the local authorities, the recommendation could not effectually be enforced. The truth is that even the majority of the Royal Commission who made the recommendation were not really unanimous among themselves, for a distinguished member of that majority (Dr. Lyon Playfair) subsequently informed the Government that, although he had concurred in the recommendation of the majority, yet he was bound to warn the Government that the mere stopping of the traffic would not be effectual of itself; that a mere localization of the cattle would not stamp out the disease unless every homestead were visited, all infected cattle were destroyed, and every cattle shed was carefully cleaned and ventilated, as otherwise, when the farmers commenced to turn their cattle out a few months after, the plague would break out again with equal violence. As to the system of killing the cattle on the farms and having no live markets, I may say that one of the earliest measures of Government was to enable local authorities to put a stop to fairs and markets; but it was found that irregular markets were still held, and these were also made subject to prohibition. But was it possible for the Government to stop absolutely all markets, and was the butcher always to go to the ox, instead of the ox to the butcher? This might answer in some instances; but for the supply of great cities it was utterly impossible to carry out such a system. In Liverpool, for instance, the other day the county magistrates attempted to put into effect an order stopping the market of that town, which is in a district outside the borough, and therefore subject to the jurisdiction of the county magistrates. What was the result? Why, that the town was in arms about it; the borough magistrates remonstrated strongly, and I believe some compromise has been come to on the subject. Now, only imagine the mischief which might result from the Government attempting a general prohibition of this kind over the whole country! Among other communications from different parts of the country, we have received a letter from the chairman of the board of quarter sessions of the West Riding of Yorkshire, in which he says that such a system would be most mischievous, as it would be absolutely impossible to distinguish whether the meat was infected or not after it was killed and dressed for the market. Therefore, as you must have great markets for large towns, the only protection is to direct that the cattle shall not leave the markets alive, but shall be killed at once. Again, it has been suggested by my noble Friend who spoke on the cross-bench (Earl Grey) that we should have adopted the particular system he found it convenient to establish in Northumberland. This is precisely what noble Lords seem to think who have objected to the course taken by the Government. They all appear to think that what suits their own county would suit the whole country. It is only those who know, as the Government must know, the enormously varying interests of different parts of the country, who can appreciate the absolute impossibility of an Order that shall prevail over the whole kingdom. Does my noble Friend think that the system which he introduced in Northumberland, and which he has been obliged to vary more than once, could have been imposed in Devonshire and Somersetshire which have had no disease at all? We have had some very hard words applied to us to-night. Ignorance and want of energy have been imputed to us. I do not wish to throw back those imputations on those who have used them against us; but I must say that noble Lords who indulge in such expressions can have very little appreciation of the difficulties with which the Government have had to deal. It is no light matter for the Government to interfere with the feeding of millions of the people. No man knows how it is done—and any man may well be cautious as to interfering with it. It is only done through the thousand channels which are formed by private interest and private enterprize. It is a vast organic system. It is not the Government that feeds the people, but the people who feed themselves; and you never know the effect that may be produced by shutting one single avenue of trade. Already, for example, it is very much to be feared that considerable injury has been done to the tanning and leather trade. I have no doubt that when the question comes to be fully discussed, which it cannot be when raised incidentally on the Address, noble Lords will be satisfied that, whether the Government might have done more or less, it was absolutely impossible to adopt any system of general prohibition over the whole country. A large part of England is still free from the disease; a still larger part of Scotland is free from it; and I was very glad to learn from my noble Friend the Earl of Dalhousie that in the county of Forfar the disease has become so much less virulent that, by the local treatment adopted, they are enabled to save 50 per cent of the cattle attacked. It was not by its geographical position alone that the county of Aberdeen was enabled to do what it has done. It was by the financial system adopted, which disclosed one of the most remarkable cases of skill and energy grappling successfully with evils of this kind. The system consists in this—they agreed to assess themselves voluntarily to the extent of 2*d.* in the pound, equally dividing the amount between the landlord and the tenant. The fund so raised was spent in paying two-thirds value for every infected beast killed by the committee; and three-fourths value for every clean beast killed by way of precaution. I do not see why similar measures should not be taken in every county in England, although, undoubtedly, there may be local difficulties. I repeat, my Lords, that I believe when the measure which will be proposed by the Government comes before you for consideration, your Lordships will be satisfied with it.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I can scarcely hope to see the practice adopted here which prevails in some neighbouring countries, of considering an Address in answer to a Speech from the Throne paragraph by paragraph; but it must be admitted that, according to the practice we pursue, it is extremely difficult to enter on a fair discussion of the topics introduced in the Speech. Their multitude and variety render the discussion of each almost necessarily fragmentary. One noble Lord takes up one, another discusses another, and it is impossible to do justice to any in the sort of preliminary discussion which takes place on the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne. In point of fact, one of the main objects answered by the two documents—the Speech and Address—is the opportunity they afford to Parliament and the people of hearing what has been done by the Government during the Parliamentary recess—although I must say that in that respect I do not think we have received much information from the Speech delivered on the present occasion. These discussions also offer to the advisers of the Crown an opportunity of intimating what are the measures they intend to propose to Parliament during the Session; and, on the other hand, the Government have an opportunity of hearing from various sides of the House what portions of their past conduct are likely to meet with animadversion, and perhaps censure, and, of course, with regard to other portions, what are likely to be approved by the country or Parliament. There is one other object answered by the Speech and the Address in answer to it, and that is, it affords an opportunity for the younger Members of your Lordships' House to make a trial of their strength, to make their first Parliamentary effort, and to hold out to the House the promise of future success or failure. I have now, my Lords, been a Member of your Lordships' House for more than twenty-two years, and I must say, without the slightest flattery to the two noble Lords who moved and seconded the Address, that I never heard an Address moved and seconded with greater ability and greater promise of future excellence than by the noble Marquess and the noble Earl who have performed that duty this evening. If I may make a distinction between them, I may be permitted more especially to congratulate the noble Earl (the Earl of Morley) on the singularly clear, lucid, straightforward manner in which he dealt with every topic to which he had to refer, upon the good taste by which all his observations were characterized, and more especially the becoming modesty with which they were delivered. These qualities must lead us to hope that we may often have the opportunity of hearing him express his sentiments as one of the most promising young Members of your Lordships' House. At an earlier period of the evening, and if your Lordships' attention had been less occupied, I might, perhaps, have commented at some length on the various paragraphs of Her Majesty's Speech—a Speech of more than usual length, and dealing with more than the usual number of subjects; but with respect to many of them we are promised papers which will supply us with more information than we now possess, and any attempt to discuss them in the absence of those papers would be necessarily very imperfect. There are topics again on which there will be no difference of opinion. There will be no difference of opinion as to the sincere congratulations we offer to Her Majesty on the approaching marriage of the Princess Helena, or on any matter which nearly concerns and interests Her Majesty. I am quite sure your Lordships will all be prepared to join in the hope expressed by Her Majesty that this union may tend to promote the happiness of Her Royal Highness. Again, we shall all sympathize with Her Majesty in the expression of Her regret at the loss which She and Her family and the whole of Europe have sustained in the recent death of the sagacious monarch who reigned for so many years over Belgium, who by his wisdom and his firmness held united in a feeling of common patriotism rival parties in that little kingdom, determined to protect and preserve its independence, and the influence of whose ability and prudence extended far beyond the limits of his own dominions, and produced no inconsiderable effect on the whole general policy of Europe. The loss of such a man as the late King of the Belgians is a general loss to Europe, and I only hope that his successor, animated by his example, may exhibit the same firmness, the same prudence, and the same discretion in dealing with conflicting elements, subjected to his sway, as his venerable father exhibited for so many years before him. I am glad to learn that our relations with all Foreign Powers continue to be friendly and satisfactory; and I am bound to believe the statement, when we are informed both by Her Majesty and the Government of France that the reciprocal visits of the French and English fleets to Cherbourg and Portsmouth have tended to establish permanent and friendly feelings between the two peoples. It is very probable that friendly relations may have been established amongst the officers of the two fleets; but I am at a loss to know how complimentary visits to Portsmouth and Cherbourg can prove that the two countries are "acting in friendly concert in the promotion of peace" which we have just been told has not been in the slightest degree ruffled. We all must concur in rejoicing that after four years of bloody warfare that sanguinary war has been put an end to in the now re-United States of America. I fully concur in that paragraph of the Answer to the Speech, which commends the wise and prudent manner in which, after the war had terminated, the ravages of civil war are sought to be repaired. That paragraph must more particularly apply to the conduct individually pursued by the President, who appears to be honestly seeking after the best mode of restoring the union of his country by a conciliatory and forbearing policy, and it is to the interest of the United States and of the world that in the wise and benevolent exercise of his authority he may not find himself swamped and overborne by violent passions not yet subsided, and by the tyranny of a majority which appears to exercise a baneful influence in the Congress. The termination of the slave trade must undoubtedly be a subject of congratulation; but I fear the abolition may be attended with very severe sufferings in consequence of the idleness and privations of the emancipated negroes, who have little knowledge as yet of the duties imposed upon them as free men, who take exaggerated views of the rights acquired by freedom, and who are likely to prove a source of considerable danger both to the States to which they belong and to the Government of the United States. I hope these feelings will subside, and that better knowledge will lead to more favourable results. At present, though the great object of the extinction of slavery is attained, yet it is attained through the medium of severe suffering and at the risk of no inconsiderable danger. I shall not offer any comment on the correspondence, not yet officially before the House, between the English Government and the United States with respect to injuries inflicted on American commerce by cruisers under the Confederate flag; but I must say that as far as I have seen the correspondence it has been conducted in a courteous, liberal, and honourable spirit, and I concur in the arguments by which the noble Earl opposite (Earl Russell) has supported the cause of this country, and the course pursued by the Government. I will not say a word on the subject of Brazil, the war between Spain and Chili, or the transactions in Japan. I shall rejoice to find that the treaties entered into will be productive of the very great commercial advantages which the noble Earl seems to anticipate. It is singular, however, that those persons who are now so ready to invite commercial treaties with France and also with Austria are the very men who for years and years were denouncing the whole system of commercial treaties, and proclaiming that we had only to consult what was best for our interests without considering what other countries could give us in return. That system is abandoned, but rather late, and only when our free trade measures had left us nothing to offer to other countries in return. Certainly there must be a very moderate appreciation of the benefits of free trade, if this country is to receive Austrian goods at a very low or nominal duty, while our goods are to pay in Austria 25 per cent, and, after a period, 20 per cent. However, the step is in the right direction, and though we do not get on so far as we wish, I suppose we must be thankful for small mercies. I now come, however, to a question upon the merits of which I shall not express any opinion whatever, because I agree with the noble Earl who seconded the Address (the Earl of Morley) that any such expression of opinion would, at the present moment, be premature. I refer to the deplorable events of which we have all heard with so much concern as occurring in the island of Jamaica. Unfortunately, a portion of the press of this country has taken upon itself to prejudge the question in the absence of all information, or with very imperfect and inadequate information. I am not pretending to say whether Mr. Eyre was justified in the measures of severity—undoubtedly, of great severity—which he felt called on to carry into effect; but this I will say—that Mr. Eyre's previous character does not lead one to suppose that he would lose his head from sudden infirmity, and if there is one point more prominent in his character than another it is, that in all cases where there was a mixture of races he stood forward as the advocate and protector of the inferior race. It is unlikely that a man of this description and character, who has had experience of colonial life, should have been so entirely misled as, without foundation, to believe that a dangerous rebellion was organized over the whole of the colony, which broke out prematurely in one district, and which, by the admission of the Colonial Secretary, was put a stop to by the vigour with which the authorities acted in Jamaica, while no such rebellion in reality existed. The whole question of Governor Eyre's conduct will turn on what was really the state of the colony. Was there in reality fair ground for the belief that a rebellion was about to break out, when rigorous measures would be measures of real mercy, though attended with loss of life? But, my Lords, I pronounce no opinion on this subject. The Government ought to have received despatches from Mr. Eyre, from time to time, with respect to the state of the island—he must have told them what he apprehended, and what was the opinion of the whole white population. We know, indeed, that the whole white population—they might have been under a delusion—but we know that they were unanimous in the belief that by his measures Mr. Eyre saved the colony of Jamaica. They may have been all wrong. I do not say they were not, and I want to receive the fullest information. But, with respect to the course pursued by the Government, I must say that that is a matter on which I am fully competent to form and express an opinion, and I must say that I do not think it has been either just or generous to the Governor of Jamaica. The position of the Governor has been one of serious responsibility and great danger; and at the moment when he believed that he had rendered great services to the country he has been suspended from his functions without reasons assigned. The course pursued towards him makes it but too painfully evident that the Government have lost their best head. Such a course—a course which prejudged and degraded a public servant without trial—would never have been adopted had Lord Palmerston still lived. We have his own recorded sentiments as to the duty of the Government towards their subordinates; and if Lord Palmerston committed any error at all it was that of going into the opposite extreme, and, rightly or wrongly, feeling it his duty to defend the conduct of those who acted under him. I saw the other day in a newspaper which was sent to me a quotation from a speech delivered by Lord Palmerston when the question was under discussion whether or not Sir John

Bowring had precipitated us into an unjust war with China; and I recommend the noble Lord's words to the serious consideration of the Government—

"It is not enough," said Lord Palmerston, "to support the representative of the Crown when we are satisfied that he is right. Even if we believe that he took an unwise course we will not desert him so long as we are satisfied that he acted honestly, and with a conscientious desire to do his duty to the country." Now mark, my Lords. "The moment your policy takes a different direction you cease to deserve the confidence of honourable men. You may get people to serve you, and doubtless you will, but they will not be high-minded English gentlemen, such as it is necessary to have at the head of affairs in the great colonies and dependencies of this country."

I am far from denying that the statements which were received, imperfect though they were, did render it the duty of the Government to call on Governor Eyre for an explanation on those points in respect to which he appeared to have exceeded the law; but I do think that to send for a Governor from another colony—I am sorry to say I am afraid contrary to the original intention of the Government, whatever the reasons may be which led to the alteration of that intention—to supersede Mr. Eyre, who was to remain within the island—subject to the examination and control of that Governor and two of his colleagues, degraded in the eyes of the blacks, who would naturally be led to believe that they had obtained a signal triumph over a man whom they looked upon as an oppressor; while the whites would be under the impression that everything was being done in favour of the negro, the relative position of the two races being thus as it were changed—was a step neither just to Governor Eyre nor likely to be otherwise than most unfortunate in its effect upon the minds of both populations. I presume the noble Earl at the head of the Government has taken the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown as to the legality of the Commission which has been sent out to Jamaica; for, unless I have their opinion against mine, I should have great doubt as to that legality. I do not, of course, question the power of the Government to make any inquiries they may please in the colony, and to order rumours to be picked up here and there for their information; but I believe this Commission which has been sent out to try, as it were, Governor Eyre for high crimes and misdemeanors has not the power to compel a single witness to give evidence before it on oath; that Mr. Eyre might refuse to appear before it if he pleased, or recognize its authority in the slightest degree. What, therefore, have you done? Have you not been sending out on the authority of the Government a roving Commission to pick up evidence against him which might be used when, if that which is urged against him by those who take a fanatical view of his conduct in this country be true, he came to be placed upon his trial on a capital charge? I will only add upon this point that the Government have, in my opinion, taken a grave responsibility upon themselves in the course which they have adopted. My Lords, I next come to that serious calamity, the cattle plague; but I will not follow into any detail the various speakers who, with the exception of the President of the Council and the noble Duke opposite, have with so much unanimity expressed their dissatisfaction at the course which the Government have thought proper to pursue in reference to that subject. Even the language—the apologetic language—of Her Majesty's Ministers themselves has been, "We did not know how far public opinion or feeling would go along with us in dealing with the matter. We therefore fluctuated from one side to the other, and issued a series of contradictory enactments."

EARL GRANVILLE: I did not use that language.

THE EARL OF DERBY: Perhaps the noble Earl will tell me which are the precise words to which he objects.

EARL GRANVILLE: I did not say, speaking on behalf of the Government, as the noble Earl would seem to impute to me, that "we fluctuated from one side to the other, and issued a series of contradictory enactments."

THE EARL OF DERBY: I did not for a moment suppose that the noble Earl would give that character of himself and his Colleagues. What I intended to say was that, with the single exception of the noble Earl himself and the noble Duke beside him, there was an universal chorus of voices from both sides of the House, complaining that the course pursued by the Government with regard to the cattle plague was vacillating and unsatisfactory; that they were from first to last insensible of the magnitude of the evil; that they lagged behind the exigencies of the case; that they were endeavouring to see before acting how far public opinion would go along with them, and that they were throughout shirking the responsibility which belongs to the executive Government, and seeking to throw it on the shoulders of other persons, thus producing no uniformity of proceeding; but, on the contrary, every variety of system. [Earl GRANVILLE interposed an observation which was not audible.] All I can say is, that the language which the noble Earl imputes to me is absolute nonsense; but I do state that it appears to me that the Government have failed to realize, with regard to two questions, the important fact that, both as regards moral and physical evil, if prompt and vigorous measures be not applied at an early period, before evil had time to mature itself, it will spread abroad and gain force, until it will require great exertion to check and extinguish it. This observation I would apply not only to the cattle plague, but also to that which is known under the name of Fenianism in Ireland. For the way in which the latter evil has been dealt with I make no charge against any individual, still less against the present Irish Government. My noble Friend behind me (the Marquess of Abercorn) has told your Lordships, with great truth, that in 1859 the Government, of which I had then the honour to be the head, succeeded in convicting one prisoner on a charge of treason-felony, and in establishing beyond a doubt the existence of a treasonable conspiracy in Ireland; and I may add that that excellent Judge, Baron Greene, in passing sentence of ten years' penal servitude on the person who had been convicted, informed him that had not the Crown taken a merciful view of the case and indicted him for treason-felony his duty would be to pass upon him sentence of death, inasmuch as his offence absolutely amounted to treason itself. We succeeded in establishing the fact of a conspiracy, and there were several other prisoners at the same time against whom indictments had been found; but it was thought expedient by the Crown to postpone the consideration of those indictments until the following assizes. The question was accordingly brought before the Court of Queen's Bench as to whether the prisoners should be admitted to bail. No rule was, however, made on the subject, inasmuch as the Court was equally divided; but the Judges who were in favour of admitting the prisoners to bail just as strongly condemned the offence with which they were charged, and as fully admitted the clearness of the case against them, as those who took a contrary view upon the point immediately at issue. Well, what afterwards happened? The Government went out of office between the time of which I am speaking and the next assizes, and the first act of the new Government was to discharge every one of those indicted traitors on the simple condition that they should come up for judgment when called upon to do so. Nor was this all. The Crown entered into a bargain with the prisoners who pleaded guilty not only that they should not be visited with the consequences of their crime, but that the prisoner who had been actually convicted and sentenced to ten years' penal servitude should be released, and he was released without even application having been made to the Judge who tried him to ascertain whether there were any circumstances which in his opinion would justify his pardon. Well, my Lords, and who are the persons who were thus dealt with? Why, the very same who were brought up again for the same crime within the last few months, and who were from 1859 to 1865 allowed to mature their traitorous designs both at home and in America. They were the very same men! There is, again, the notorious Mr. Stephens, who was associated with Mr. Smith O'Brien in that foolish and paltry attempt at revolt in 1848, and who has ever since been carrying on the game of treason. This gentleman was in 1848 a principal agent; but, acting upon that instinct of self-preservation which seems never to have forsaken him, he left his comrades in the lurch and went abroad. He afterwards, however, returned to Ireland at the peril of being indicted for high treason. Then there is the notorious offender called Donovan, who has remained in Ireland plotting treason from 1863 to 1865, and who, as the registered proprietor of The Irish People, circulated under the very nose of the Castle 8,000 copies per week of a paper containing articles so detestably treasonable that Justice Keogh, in sentencing one of the prisoners brought before the late Commission, requested the reporters not to take any notice of the extracts from that paper he read in his defence. There were, I believe, no less than forty copies of The Irish People which were relied upon as overt acts of conspiracy, yet though its circulation extended from 1863 to 1865, it was not until after the late general election that a single step was taken to prose-measures ought to be taken for extending education, for checking pauperism, and saving a large part of our population from their present degraded condition, is one of the deepest interest, since no man can look at the evils physical as well as moral, of which the existence in our large cities has of late years been revealed, without feelings both of alarm and of shame. Then, too, the abuses in the employment of children, and the difficult questions as to the mutual relations of labourers and their employers, urgently demand the attention of Parliament. The subjects I have mentioned—and I might have increased the list—urgently require the intervention of Parliament, in order to correct evils which have arisen, and to ward off dangers that threaten us from the growth of the nation, and from that very increase of its wealth and population which we are apt to regard with such pride and satisfaction. The progress of legislation has not been in proportion to the growing wants of a country so rapidly advancing. In the last Parliament especially, legislation on these questions has been nearly a blank, and little has been done to meet the new wants of our fast changing social condition. Not that I believe the last Parliament under proper guidance would have been either unable or unwilling to deal with the great social questions I have mentioned—it was the Ministers of the Crown who were unable or unwilling to assume the lead which properly belongs to the position they hold. I trust that now with a new Administration, and a new Parliament, these questions will be more vigorously dealt with. I am sure that their neglect would be ill compensated by throwing on the table of the House of Commons a crude and undigested measure of Parliamentary Reform. In conclusion, let me assure my noble Friend that, though I may have spoken strongly, I have made these remarks in no spirit of hostility to his Administration. It is, on the contrary, my earnest desire to see that Administration succeed, and to be enabled to give it my humble support; but I am convinced that neither the present nor any other Ministers of the Crown can long continue to hold office, either with advantage to the country or with credit to themselves, unless they apply themselves with earnestness and vigour to the great social problems which now agitate the public mind. This opinion is entertained not only by myself but is shared by many others. I feel,

therefore, that I am really acting a friendly part towards my noble Friend in warning him of the necessity of deeply considering these matters before he has yet finally pledged his Government to any definite course of action.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, I am very sorry to be obliged to recall the attention of the House to the question of the cattle plague. Her Majesty's Government having announced their intention of bringing forward a measure on that subject—and as there is nothing in the Address to commit noble Lords to any opinion on the conduct of the Government—I must express my regret that the unanimity which is usually thought desirable in voting the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne has not been preserved on the present occasion, and that the subject of the cattle plague has not been reserved for discussion on some future day. At the same time, it would be scarcely respectful to those noble Lords who have in succession and with some violence attacked the conduct of the Government were I not to say a few words upon the subject. The main charge against the Government is that they have not adopted an uniform system for the whole of the country. I do not believe that the noble Lord (Lord Feversham) will push his Amendment to a division; but I would urge upon noble Lords who have supported the Amendment by their remarks that they ought at least to be at one among themselves respecting the course which the Government should have adopted. I have listened attentively to all the speeches which have been made upon the subject by noble Lords this evening, and, as far as I can make out, each one advocates a different course of action. The noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Rutland) applied to this side of the House the word "ignorant." I do not complain of the use of the word, but I will say that the speech of the noble Duke shows a singular want of information. He was, however, loudly cheered by those around him. He said—what was perfectly true—that the Government did take one or two energetic measures; and he indicated what they were. He said they prohibited the importation of cattle to Ireland and to the West of Scotland, the Highlands being particularly mentioned. He seemed to think that it was due to some personal influence of mine that importation had been prohibited in casien. He accordingly delivered himself of the witticism which I am about to submit for your Lordships' consideration. He said—

"Sir, there is another subject which the right hon. Gentleman touched upon somewhat tenderly, and which appeared just at the end of the Speech from the Throne."

This was the gravamen of the charge against us—

"It certainly appears to me as if Her Majesty's Ministers had gone through all the topics upon which they thought Parliament would expect to be addressed, and that then some Member of the Cabinet said, 'Is there nothing forgotten? We have not left out Mexico, have we? No, there it is. There is also a passage about China and Japan. I cannot think of anything that is omitted.' But at last some ingenious Member of the Cabinet perhaps said, 'There is one subject forgotten—there is the Reform of Parliament; we must put that in.'"—[3 Hansard, clii. 100.]

Now, my Lords, all this was founded on the circumstance of Reform being the last paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech, and that occurring on the 3rd of February, our Bill was laid on the table on the 28th of the same month, and was then ready for discussion, the House having disposed of the question with regard to the navy. But the noble Earl said, with his usual humour—

"The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), 'Now fitted the halter, now traversed the cart, And often took leave, but deemed loth to depart.'"

But earlier in his remarks, the noble Earl said—

"The right hon. Gentleman seemed as unwilling to touch on that subject (Reform) here as the Cabinet were in putting it into the Speech. Heaven knows how it has fallen into their charge!"

Well, be that as it may, we know at least how it was taken out of what a Member of the other House the other day, with great courtesy of expression, called our "dirty and unhallowed fingers." But I will tell the noble Earl how it was that it fell into our hands. Our predecessors had on more than four separate occasions pledged the faith of the Crown that such a measure should be submitted to Parliament; and because in endeavouring to carry that pledge into effect they had so completely bungled and mismanaged the whole question that they could come to no conclusion at all, that they left everything in confusion and the whole country in an agitation on the subject of Reform, we sought to put an end to that state of things by a fair, an honest, and a conscientiously-framed measure, proposed with an earnest intention to fulfil

the solemn and repeated declarations made from the Throne. How that Bill was encountered, defeated, and got rid of perhaps the noble Earl has now forgotten;—I can assure him I have not. But in those remarks of his in 1859 which I have been quoting the noble Lord, addressing the House of Commons, went on to say—

"I do not see that there is any subject which the Government intend to bring forward that will furnish them with any excuse for delay in this matter. . . . If the Government have made up their minds to introduce a Reform Bill, let them lay it on the table. I will give no opinion on a measure of that kind until I see what it proposes to do. . . . There is every disposition in this House to wait their time; but they must not be putting off the subject. My hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Bright) I am afraid, will hardly be able to restrain his impatience. . . . They have given a pledge in this matter, and they are bound to perform it."—[3 Hansard, clii. 102.]

That was the language of the noble Earl in 1859, in breathless haste calling for the introduction of a finished Reform Bill ready for discussion by Parliament. A month—one little month—was too much to give after the opening of the Session. It was the bounden duty, so he urged, of the Government to have their scheme ready, and, having it ready, to lay it before the Legislature at once. Well, the noble Earl is now at the head of the Government, and I do not gather that they have their measure ready. I infer from this speech that they have not yet made up their minds what their measure shall be. If the fact be otherwise, they certainly have done themselves great injustice, because they say that "inquiries are now going forward with reference to the right of voting in the election of Members to serve in Parliament," and that "when that information is complete the attention of Parliament will be called to the result thus obtained," &c. Now, my Lords, the Government are proceeding either without information, or with the intention of making the information they may procure square with their foregone conclusions; or, again, they may be gifted with a superhuman prescience which enables them to know infallibly beforehand what will be the precise result of these inquiries; whereas we poor ordinary mortals must be content to wait until all those promised statistics are laid before us which are to prove the wonderful skill and dexterity of the Government in framing a measure in anticipation of the information on which it is to be founded. Well, my Lords, extreme danger to be apprehended from the disease. The next step taken by Government was to appoint the Royal Commission, which recommended the stringent step of prohibiting the removal of cattle entirely, even from field to field, where they would have to traverse the public roads. The Government deliberated very seriously upon this matter; it was carefully discussed at three or four meetings of the Council; and all things considered, we came to the conclusion that the minority of the Commission, who did not agree in this recommendation, were in the right—that such a step at that time would not have been tolerated by public opinion, and that even if Government wished to adopt it we had not the machinery to carry it into effect. The county police are under the local authorities, and therefore, without the co-operation of the local authorities, the recommendation could not effectually be enforced. The truth is that even the majority of the Royal Commission who made the recommendation were not really unanimous among themselves, for a distinguished member of that majority (Dr. Lyon Playfair) subsequently informed the Government that, although he had concurred in the recommendation of the majority, yet he was bound to warn the Government that the mere stopping of the traffic would not be effectual of itself; that a mere localization of the cattle would not stamp out the disease unless every homestead were visited, all infected cattle were destroyed, and every cattle shed was carefully cleaned and ventilated, as otherwise, when the farmers commenced to turn their cattle out a few months after, the plague would break out again with equal violence. As to the system of killing the cattle on the farms and having no live markets, I may say that one of the earliest measures of Government was to enable local authorities to put a stop to fairs and markets; but it was found that irregular markets were still held, and these were also made subject to prohibition. But was it possible for the Government to stop absolutely all markets, and was the butcher always to go to the ox, instead of the ox to the butcher? This might answer in some instances; but for the supply of great cities it was utterly impossible to carry out such a system. In Liverpool, for instance, the other day the county magistrates attempted to put into effect an order stopping the market of that town, which is in a district outside the borough, and therefore subject to the jurisdiction of the county magistrates. What was the result? Why, that the town was in arms about it; the borough magistrates remonstrated strongly, and I believe some compromise has been come to on the subject. Now, only imagine the mischief which might result from the Government attempting a general prohibition of this kind over the whole country! Among other communications from different parts of the country, we have received a letter from the chairman of the board of quarter sessions of the West Riding of Yorkshire, in which he says that such a system would be most mischievous, as it would be absolutely impossible to distinguish whether the meat was infected or not after it was killed and dressed for the market. Therefore, as you must have great markets for large towns, the only protection is to direct that the cattle shall not leave the markets alive, but shall be killed at once. Again, it has been suggested by my noble Friend who spoke on the cross-bench (Earl Grey) that we should have adopted the particular system he found it convenient to establish in Northumberland. This is precisely what noble Lords seem to think who have objected to the course taken by the Government. They all appear to think that what suits their own county would suit the whole country. It is only those who know, as the Government must know, the enormously varying interests of different parts of the country, who can appreciate the absolute impossibility of an Order that shall prevail over the whole kingdom. Does my noble Friend think that the system which he introduced in Northumberland, and which he has been obliged to vary more than once, could have been imposed in Devonshire and Somersetshire which have had no disease at all? We have had some very hard words applied to us to-night. Ignorance and want of energy have been imputed to us. I do not wish to throw back those imputations on those who have used them against us; but I must say that noble Lords who indulge in such expressions can have very little appreciation of the difficulties with which the Government have had to deal. It is no light matter for the Government to interfere with the feeding of millions of the people. No man knows how it is done—and any man may well be cautious as to interfering with it. It is only done ner in which his own Bill was met, and that makes it necessary for me—though I should otherwise have postponed my remarks on this subject—to state that I entertained very grave and solid objections to the Bill, which made it impossible for me to agree to the second reading. My first objection to the noble Earl's Bill was that it took away a right that had been enjoyed, not only from the time of Henry VI., but from the very earliest time of our Parliamentary history—namely, the right of freeholders in cities and boroughs to vote for the counties in which they have their freeholds. That right was an essential part of the Constitution—so essential, in my opinion, that when the late Earl Grey told me it was very likely that a provision would be introduced in the House of Lords into the great Reform Bill, taking away from freeholders the right of voting for the counties they resided in and confining them to vote in boroughs, I told Earl Grey that if the Bill came down with that alteration I should consider it so vitiated that I would myself move in the House of Commons that the Reform Bill, with all its good and great provisions, should be rejected.

THE EARL OF DERBY: May I ask the noble Earl was this always his view as to the value and importance of retaining that provision?

EARL RUSSELL: There was another provision in the noble Earl's Bill which proposed to restore nomination boroughs. According to the Reform Act many of the smaller boroughs, in which there were ten or twelve voters, were enlarged by £10 voters, so that they contained 300, 400, or 500 electors, whereby a certain independence was introduced which enabled the constituencies to send men of their own opinions to Parliament. Now, the noble Earl's Bill had a provision by which freeholders of counties would have voted for those boroughs. Besides this, there was a further provision, which would have operated in some degree as a revival of the old nomination boroughs—the provision that these votes might be sent by post, so that any noble Lord or right hon. Gentleman in some distant country might send by post the votes of 300 or 400 tenants, who never went near the place, and thus carry the election. That struck me so much that I stated my objection to a Gentleman who sat near me when the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed his measure to the House of Commons, that these provisions, with the absence of any adequate extension of the franchise to persons occupying houses under £10 a year, made the Bill so bad that it was impossible to support it. The noble Earl, when first Minister of the Crown, introduced two measures—one a Budget imposing a very large tax upon houses, and another a measure for the Government of India. I consider they were both exceedingly bad measures, and both were rejected by Parliament. But much worse was the measure which the noble Earl introduced under the name of a Reform of Parliament. I objected to that Bill, and I stated my objections fully and fairly. That Bill was defeated by no underhand proceeding, but by open and fair opposition. As to the objections raised by the noble Earl to a measure of Reform, because it might be regarded in the light of a stepping-stone to other more extensive reforms, I have only to say that the late Mr. Hume said the same of the Bill of 1832, and voted for it on that ground. But though Mr. Hume said he intended to go much further than the Bill of 1832, that did not prevent the late Lord Grey and his Colleagues from carrying that important measure; nor should the fact of the same being said now prevent the present Parliament from carrying a measure commensurate with the requirements of the time.

VISCOUNT MELVILLE expressed an opinion that the Government had treated Governor Eyre most harshly and ungraciously. By his energy and firmness Governor Eyre had saved the colony. The Secretary for the Colonies, it was true, had written a most proper letter to Jamaica, promising that the names of those who had so ably assisted Governor Eyre in suppressing the rebellion should be brought under the favourable notice of the Horse Guards. But what followed? The Governor had actually been rebuked for having adopted severe measures in the exercise of his duty. It was impossible to say what would be the result of this unworthy conduct on the part of the Government. It really seemed as if the noble Lord had turned to the right and left to see in what direction the several parties set their faces, and then to have acted as the policy for the moment dictated. It had been well said by a noble Lord who had preceded him, that if a late noble Lord had still been at the head of the Government the idea of censuring Governor Eyre would not have been entertained for a moment.

promising young Members of your Lordships' House. At an earlier period of the evening, and if your Lordships' attention had been less occupied, I might, perhaps, have commented at some length on the various paragraphs of Her Majesty's Speech—a Speech of more than usual length, and dealing with more than the usual number of subjects; but with respect to many of them we are promised papers which will supply us with more information than we now possess, and any attempt to discuss them in the absence of those papers would be necessarily very imperfect. There are topics again on which there will be no difference of opinion. There will be no difference of opinion as to the sincere congratulations we offer to Her Majesty on the approaching marriage of the Princess Helena, or on any matter which nearly concerns and interests Her Majesty. I am quite sure your Lordships will all be prepared to join in the hope expressed by Her Majesty that this union may tend to promote the happiness of Her Royal Highness. Again, we shall all sympathize with Her Majesty in the expression of Her regret at the loss which She and Her family and the whole of Europe have sustained in the recent death of the sagacious monarch who reigned for so many years over Belgium, who by his wisdom and his firmness held united in a feeling of common patriotism rival parties in that little kingdom, determined to protect and preserve its independence, and the influence of whose ability and prudence extended far beyond the limits of his own dominions, and produced no inconsiderable effect on the whole general policy of Europe. The loss of such a man as the late King of the Belgians is a general loss to Europe, and I only hope that his successor, animated by his example, may exhibit the same firmness, the same prudence, and the same discretion in dealing with conflicting elements, subjected to his sway, as his venerable father exhibited for so many years before him. I am glad to learn that our relations with all Foreign Powers continue to be friendly and satisfactory; and I am bound to believe the statement, when we are informed both by Her Majesty and the Government of France that the reciprocal visits of the French and English fleets to Cherbourg and Portsmouth have tended to establish permanent and friendly feelings between the two peoples. It is very probable that friendly relations may have been established amongst the officers of the two fleets; but I am at a loss to know how complimentary visits to Portsmouth and Cherbourg can prove that the two countries are "acting in friendly concert in the promotion of peace" which we have just been told has not been in the slightest degree ruffled. We all must concur in rejoicing that after four years of bloody warfare that sanguinary war has been put an end to in the now re-United States of America. I fully concur in that paragraph of the Answer to the Speech, which commends the wise and prudent manner in which, after the war had terminated, the ravages of civil war are sought to be repaired. That paragraph must more particularly apply to the conduct individually pursued by the President, who appears to be honestly seeking after the best mode of restoring the union of his country by a conciliatory and forbearing policy, and it is to the interest of the United States and of the world that in the wise and benevolent exercise of his authority he may not find himself swamped and overborne by violent passions not yet subsided, and by the tyranny of a majority which appears to exercise a baneful influence in the Congress. The termination of the slave trade must undoubtedly be a subject of congratulation; but I fear the abolition may be attended with very severe sufferings in consequence of the idleness and privations of the emancipated negroes, who have little knowledge as yet of the duties imposed upon them as free men, who take exaggerated views of the rights acquired by freedom, and who are likely to prove a source of considerable danger both to the States to which they belong and to the Government of the United States. I hope these feelings will subside, and that better knowledge will lead to more favourable results. At present, though the great object of the extinction of slavery is attained, yet it is attained through the medium of severe suffering and at the risk of no inconsiderable danger. I shall not offer any comment on the correspondence, not yet officially before the House, between the English Government and the United States with respect to injuries inflicted on American commerce by cruisers under the Confederate flag; but I must say that as far as I have seen the correspondence it has been conducted in a courteous, liberal, and honourable spirit, and I concur in the arguments by which the noble Earl opposite (Earl Russell) has supported the cause of

MR. WALPOLE said, that the matter was one quite within the discretion of the Speaker. If it were thought convenient that the days of the week should be printed in English instead of Latin, he did not think any one would raise an objection to the hon. Baronet's suggestion.

MR. SPEAKER said, that in early days the Votes were printed solely for the use of Members; but now they were published and circulated for the information of the public also. Perhaps, therefore, the use of one language throughout would be more convenient. With the concurrence of the House he should be happy to give directions to that effect.

[And the proposed alteration was made from the commencement of the Session.]

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

MR. SPEAKER reported, That this House has, this day, attended Her Majesty in the House of Peers, when Her Majesty was pleased to make, by Her Chancellor, a most gracious Speech from the Throne to both Houses of Parliament; of which, Mr. Speaker said, he had, for greater accuracy, obtained a Copy:—

And Mr. SPEAKER read it to the House.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY ON HER MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said: Sir, I rise to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, in reply to the gracious Speech we have just heard read. Seldom, if ever, has there been a Speech from the Throne which has been delivered under circumstances so impressive, or which has dealt with topics of so grave an import, as that with which Her Majesty has just opened this the seventh Parliament of her reign. Her Majesty has this day, once more, disregarding the painful effort to herself, and at the cost of re-awakened memories too deep for me to touch upon, re-appeared amongst her people, and met them through their representatives in Parliament assembled. In the short interval since Her Majesty summoned this Parliament she had lost the counsels of that old and experienced statesman whom the country has mourned as one man. In her Speech, Her Majesty has had to call the attention of her Parliament to topics of so painful a nature as the recent events in Jamaica, the conspiracy in Ireland, and the disease amongst the cattle in England; and, finally, she has again informed us that a measure will be introduced for the important object of an extension of the franchise. Under these circumstances, I feel that I need not trouble the House by an appeal for a large measure of that kind indulgence which it is ever ready to extend to those in circumstances similar to mine. I can only state that if I had not felt that the position I now hold was conferred upon me on account of the importance of the great constituency which I have the honour to represent, I should not have been emboldened to undertake my present task.

Sir Colman O'Loghlen

Her Majesty has informed us that she has recently declared her consent to a marriage between her daughter the Princess Helena and the Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein Sonderbourg-Angstenburg. An event so closely touching Her Majesty's own personal happiness cannot but excite the deepest feelings of the House. I am sure the words of the Address I have to move will, in this respect at least, not only be passed with unanimity, but will express the heartfelt wishes of the House in assuring Her Majesty that the House joins with her in the hope that the union may be prosperous and happy. In like manner the Address will express the feelings of the House in assuring Her Majesty that they join with her in profound grief at the death of Her Majesty's beloved uncle, King Leopold, that old and experienced King whose death has left so great a blank amongst the rulers of Europe. The House will also share the confidence which Her Majesty states she entertains that the wisdom evinced by the late King of the Belgians during his long reign will "animate his successor, and preserve for Belgium her independence and prosperity." Her Majesty has given us the gratifying assurance that our foreign relations are friendly and satisfactory. Inasmuch as the noble Lord, to whom the Queen has intrusted the first place in her Councils upon the death of Lord Palmerston, has been during the late Government primarily responsible for the conduct of foreign matters, it is but natural that the foreign policy of the present Government should resemble that of the late one—that policy of which the country expressed so distinct and emphatic an approval at the late elections. That it is identically the same credit. Till I read the significant words of Her Majesty's Speech I could not believe, even now I can hardly believe, that my noble Friend opposite (Earl Russell), who was the organ of the Government of 1831, in bringing the great Reform Act before Parliament can have determined so utterly to repudiate the principles of their policy, and to act so diametrically in opposition to all that was then done as these words imply. Let me remind your Lordships that the extent of the changes proposed in the Reform Bill of 1831 surprised both its opponents and its friends. One of those who supported it declared that when he first heard the plan described in the House of Commons it "took away his breath." What was alleged to be the dangerous and needless extent of the changes proposed was the constant topic of the opponents of the measures. Against these attacks the Members of the Government defended themselves by contending that if Parliamentary Reform were dealt with at all it ought to be in such a manner as to settle the question. I can, at all events, speak for one with whom I was very nearly connected, and of whose part in that great transaction I have no small reason to be proud. I have been reading over his correspondence with the late King on this subject, and his remarks upon all the difficulties which beset the question, as well as the grounds upon which the Government recommended the measure, and I find the point upon which he most insisted, and the argument to which he continually returned were that it would have been in the highest degree dangerous to propose any plan of Reform not calculated to settle the question. The Members of his Government all concurred with him in the opinion that repeated meddling with the Constitution of the country was what was most to be guarded against, and that the predictions of the opponents of Reform that these changes would be but the stepping-stones to future innovations, could only be falsified by bringing forward a measure so complete that it would secure the good government of the country, and give such satisfaction to the great majority of the nation that no one would wish to disturb it. My noble Friend himself (Earl Russell), in that memorable debate in the other House of Parliament during the crisis that immediately preceded the passing of the Reform Bill, declared that he had found it to be the opinion of the highest authorities both among the opponents and the advocates of Reform, and in which he himself concurred—

"That if Reform was to be carried it ought to be founded on principle, and to be so framed if possible as to be as final a measure as legislation could carry into effect."

This was the great and fundamental principle of the policy of the Government of 1831, and the event has proved that it was a wise policy. It is now nearly thirty-four years since their great measure was carried, and in all its main provisions it remains unaltered to this day, and it has proved for a whole generation to be a settlement of the question. It has proved also to have been the means of promoting the good government of the country. I could not believe, till I was compelled to do so by the terms of the Speech, that my noble Friend, having this experience of its result, would abandon the wise and successful policy of which in 1831 and 1832 he was so distinguished an advocate, and adopt the very opposite policy of bringing forward a measure so obviously incomplete and imperfect that it is impossible it can be a settlement of the question, and must lead to further changes. My Lords, I had found it difficult to believe this, although I confess I had been alarmed, even before I knew the terms Her Majesty had been advised to use in her Speech, by the rumours which were current that my noble Friend meant to follow the advice publicly pressed upon him by a Member of the other House of Parliament, for whose judgment in this matter I confess I have by no means the same high respect that I feel for his character and for his ability. Your Lordships will doubtless recollect that some weeks ago Mr. Bright, in a speech at Rochdale, expressed a very strong opinion that the Government ought to bring in a Bill to deal with the question of the franchise only, and with the most remarkable candour he explained his reasons for recommending this course. He told his hearers that it was not to be thought this change would be sufficient. On the contrary, on this as on other occasions he has expressed his conviction that far more extensive changes in the constitution of the House of Commons are necessary—changes so extensive that they would go the full length of altering the whole existing character of the House of Commons, and make it a mere representation of the numerical majority of the population, assimilating it to it to be desirable that all these colonies, which are destined on a future day to be one great empire, should be gathered together into one great confederation. I must now say a few words respecting the plague amongst the cattle which has caused such fearful ravages in many counties. I am sure that the expression of Her Majesty's sympathy, which has been so kindly expressed in the Speech, will be a great comfort to those persons who have suffered so severely from the loss of cattle through means of this disease. When the disease first broke out Her Majesty's Government issued a Commission of Inquiry into the remedies that could be adopted for the suppression of the disease and the measures that might be calculated for its prevention; various orders also were issued giving powers to local authorities to adopt measures for its repression. I have seen that the Government has been very generally taken to task for not having dealt with this evil in another form—by assuming the responsibility of issuing some general Order to prohibit totally the removal of cattle throughout the country. Even now at the present moment, when we all know how serious the evil is, there is great doubt in the minds of some, who know much more about the cattle disease than I can pretend to know, whether such prohibition would not tend rather to the spread of the disease than otherwise. It is necessary that cattle should be killed in order that meat should be obtained. For that purpose cattle must be either sent to market or killed at the farmstead. Now, I think it is a question whether the butcher, going from farm to farm and slaughtering cattle, would not do more to spread the disease than would be done by sending the cattle to market to be killed there. However that may be, we must all recollect that when the cattle disease first broke out we were not only without experience as to what were the wisest steps to be taken, but also the public were not at that time prepared for them. Even supposing the best measures could have been discovered by the Government, and could have been ordered by it, it would have been impossible to have carried them out. At the time there was not sufficient alarm or panic in the country for the purpose. By giving the necessary powers to various local authorities different experiments have been tried. In the county of Aberdeen the experiments have been followed, I believe, by the most successful results; and I believe that that, or some such plan, may be generally adopted throughout the country. Her Majesty has given the House the pleasing assurance that the state of trade is satisfactory. In spite of the cattle disease, there never have been such general signs of prosperity throughout the country. And, Sir, our satisfaction is increased by the consideration that that satisfactory state of trade means not only wealth to the great manufacturer and capitalist, but that the advantages resulting from it are also fully participated in by the labouring classes. In former days the great problem was what to do with the superfluous population of the country; but the difficulty now in many parts of England is to find labourers for the work to be done. A few months ago we in England might have said that this prosperous state of things extended to Ireland, and that the condition of that country was materially improving—that she was recovering from the series of bad harvests from which she had suffered for the three or four years previous. But a severe blow against that reviving condition has been struck by that conspiracy, which Her Majesty has characterized in her Speech as “dangerous alike to authority, property, and religion,” and as “disapproved and condemned alike by all who are interested in their maintenance without distinction of creed or class.” A panic and alarm had been thus caused in Ireland which we can scarcely realize in England. The price of land has gone down; no new engagements for the expenditure of capital are entered into. The measures adopted by Her Majesty's Government have met with the unanimous approval of the country. They waited until they had sufficient evidence to act decisively, and when the moment came they struck a decisive blow by the arrest of nearly all the leaders of the conspiracy. Convictions have attended nearly the whole of the prosecutions which have been instituted, and this fact has shown unmistakably the loyalty of that class of men of whom the juries are composed, and the general satisfaction of the people of Ireland at the conduct of Her Majesty's Government has been shown by the holding of such a meeting at Dublin as has seldom been seen in the country before. Persons of all politics and all religions met together and approved of the conduct of the Government. The first most important object is, no doubt, to restore confidence, and whatever further measures may be required to accomplish this I trust they will be taken by the Government. But though the restoration of confidence is the first, I cannot think it to be the only duty of the Government. A conspiracy which has been disapproved of by all the influential classes of the country, and which has been deprived of nearly all its leaders, and which still remains, must have some strength in it. This strength lies, I fear, in the wide-spread disaffection amongst the lower orders of the people. For this disaffection there must be some cause. It may be the traditional hatred of Celt against Saxon. It may be the recollection of former misgovernment and of former suffering, or it may be that there still exist causes which keep it alive. Whatever be the cause, I trust inquiry will be made—and, if causes do exist, that Her Majesty's Government will deal with them with a prudent, but bold and decided hand. It is no use shutting our eyes to the facts of the case. Not only is there great disaffection amongst the lower classes of the people still in Ireland, but hundreds of thousands of Irishmen yearly leave our shores with feelings of permanent hostility to England.

After the length at which I have already troubled the House, I will not refer at any length to the various measure which are to be laid before the House, and to which allusion has been made in the Royal Speech. In the debates of the last Parliament upon the subject of Roman Catholics there was a general unanimity of opinion that at any rate some parts of the oath required to be taken by them ought to be amended—that when it was so amended that all the oaths should be made uniform—and that a measure for accomplishing such an object ought to be introduced under the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government. In accordance with that general opinion, Her Majesty has announced that a measure will be introduced during the present Session. Her Majesty also informs us that she has directed information to be procured in reference to the rights of voting in the election of Members to serve in Parliament, and that when the information is completed

"the attention of Parliament will be called to the result, with a view to such improvements in those laws as may tend to strengthen our free institutions and conduce to the public welfare."

I rejoice to see that the noble Lord at the head of the Government (Earl Russell) has recently announced that by the measure of Reform to be introduced that Government had decided to stand or fall. At this present moment the attention of the country is not diverted by fear of war or by the existence of any war, as was the case at the time of Lord Aberdeen's Government and Lord Palmerston's Government, who were in power when the Italian war occurred. The Reform question is one of such importance, and it has been so long before Parliament, that there is a general unanimity of opinion that it is time it should be settled. There are many who think that, considering the present prosperous state of the country, considering the general contentment and loyalty of the people, there is no reason for a change; yet I venture to think that it is prudent, just, and wise now to legislate upon the question. Prudent, because since the time of the last Reform Act, when the middle classes obtained power by the assistance of the working classes, great progress had been made in the power of the working classes themselves, by the increase of their intelligence and power of combination. It is not prudent that such a power should be without the legitimate means of exercise through and in support of the institutions of the country. It is just, because considering how vitally affected are the interests of these classes by the legislation of this House, by questions of taxation, and, above all, by the great questions of peace or war—considering these things, it is only just that—consistently with the rights of others—the voice of the working classes should be heard in the deliberations of Parliament. It is wise, because I think it is the part of high statesmanship to call forth the whole power of the State, and that can alone be done by extending, as widely as can with safety be done, political rights and responsibilities. Such are the questions which Her Majesty has recommended to our attention, and upon which we shall have to deliberate and decide. Upon these deliberations and upon these decisions will in a great measure depend the future state of our country; and this being the case, I feel the House will gladly join in the prayer of Her Majesty that "In these and all other deliberations the blessing of Almighty God may guide our counsels to the promotion of the happiness of her people." In conclusion, he begged to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as follows:—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to convey the thanks of this House for Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech from the Throne :

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that She has recently declared Her consent to a Marriage between Her Majesty's Daughter the Princess Helena and Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein Sonderbourg-Angustenburg, and to assure Her Majesty that with Her we trust that this union may be prosperous and happy :

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty that we participate in the profound grief felt by Her Majesty at the death of Her Majesty's beloved Uncle, the King of the Belgians ; but that we feel confident that the wisdom which he evinced during his Reign will animate his Successor, and preserve for Belgium her Independence and Prosperity :

"Humbly to express our gratification at learning that Her Majesty's relations with Foreign Powers are friendly and satisfactory, and that Her Majesty sees no cause to fear any disturbance of the General Peace :

"To assure Her Majesty that we trust that the meeting of the Fleets of France and England in the Ports of the respective Countries has tended to cement the amity of the two Nations, and to prove to the World their friendly concert in the promotion of Peace :

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty that we learn with satisfaction that the United States, after terminating successfully the severe struggle in which they were so long engaged, are wisely repairing the ravages of Civil War ; and that, with Her Majesty, we regard the abolition of Slavery as an event calling forth the cordial sympathies and congratulations of this Country, which has always been foremost in showing its abhorrence of an institution repugnant to every feeling of justice and humanity :

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that the exertions and perseverance of Her Majesty's Naval Squadron have reduced the Slave Trade on the West Coast of Africa within very narrow limits :

"To thank Her Majesty for directing Copies to be laid before us of the Correspondence which has taken place between Her Majesty's Government and that of the United States, with respect to injuries inflicted on American Commerce by Cruisers under the Confederate Flag :

"To express our thanks to Her Majesty for informing us that Diplomatic Relations with Brazil have been renewed, and that the good offices of Her Majesty's Ally the King of Portugal have contributed essentially to that happy result :

Lord Frederick Cavendish

"To assure Her Majesty that, with Her Majesty, we regret the interruption of Peace between Spain and Chili, and that we earnestly trust, that through the good offices of Her Majesty's Government, in conjunction with those of the Emperor of the French, the causes of disagreement may be removed in a manner honourable and satisfactory to both Countries :

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that the Negotiations, which have long been pending in Japan, have been brought to a conclusion in such a manner as to receive Her Majesty's entire approbation ; that the existing Treaties have been ratified by the Mikado ; and that stipulations have been made for the revision of the Tariff in a manner favourable to Commerce, and for the punctual discharge of the Indemnity due under the terms of the Convention of October 1864 :

"Humbly to express our thanks to Her Majesty for informing us that Her Majesty has concluded a Treaty of Commerce with the Emperor of Austria, which Her Majesty trusts will open to that Empire the blessings of extended Commerce, and be productive of important benefits to both Countries :

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for informing us that in consequence of the deplorable events which have occurred in the Island of Jamaica, Her Majesty has been induced to provide at once for an impartial Inquiry, by appointing a distinguished Military Officer as Governor and Commander of the Forces ; that Her Majesty has given him the assistance of two able and learned Commissioners, who will aid him in examining into the origin, nature, and circumstances of the recent Outbreak, and the measures adopted in the course of its suppression ; and that the Legislature of Jamaica has proposed that the present Political Constitution of the Island should be replaced by a new form of Government :

"To assure Her Majesty that we will give our careful consideration to the Bill on this subject, which is to be submitted to us :

"To thank Her Majesty for directing Papers on these occurrences, and on the present state of New Zealand, to be laid before us :

"To convey our thanks to Her Majesty for informing us that directions have been given for the return to this Country of the greater portion of Her Majesty's Regular Forces employed in the Colony of New Zealand :

"To assure Her Majesty that, with Her, we watch with interest the proceedings which are still in progress in British North America with a view to a closer union among the Provinces, an object to which Her Majesty continues to attach great importance :

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty that we have observed with great concern the extensive prevalence, during the last few months, of a virulent Distemper among Cattle in Great Britain ; and that it is with deep regret, and with sincere sympathy for the sufferers, that we have learnt the severe losses which it has caused in many counties and districts : whilst it is satisfactory to know that Ireland and a considerable part of Scotland are as yet free from this calamity, which gives us reason to trust, with Her Majesty, that by the precautions suggested by experience, and by the Divine blessing on the means which are now being employed, its further extension may be arrested :

"To thank Her Majesty for directing the Orders which have been made by the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council by virtue of the powers vested in them by Law, with a view to prevent the spreading of this disease, to be laid before us ; and to assure Her Majesty that our best attention shall be given to the expediency of an Amendment of the Law relating to a subject so deeply affecting the interests of the People :

"Humbly to thank Her Majesty for having directed that the Estimates of the ensuing year shall be laid before us, and for having caused them to be prepared with a due regard to economy, and to the maintenance of efficiency in the Public Service :

"To thank Her Majesty for informing us that the condition of Trade is satisfactory :

"Humbly to express our thanks to Her Majesty for informing us that a Conspiracy, adverse alike to Authority, Property, and Religion, and disapproved and condemned alike by all who are interested in their maintenance, without distinction of creed or class, has unhappily appeared in Ireland, and that the Constitutional Power of the ordinary Tribunals has been exerted for its repression, and the authority of the Law firmly and impartially vindicated :

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty that our serious consideration shall be given to the Bill to be submitted to us, founded on the Report of the Royal Commission on the subject of Capital Punishment ; to the Bills for amending and consolidating the Laws relating to Bankruptcy, and for other improvements in the Law ; to the measures for extending the system of Public Audit to branches of Receipt and Expenditure, which it has not hitherto reached, and for amending the provisions of the Law with respect to certain classes of Legal Pensions ; and to the subject of the Oaths taken by Members of Parliament :

"To thank Her Majesty for directing that information should be procured in reference to the Rights of Voting in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament for Counties, Cities, and Boroughs, and to assure Her Majesty that, when that information is complete, our earnest attention will be given to the result thus obtained :

"Humbly to assure Her Majesty that, with Her, we fervently pray that the blessing of Almighty God may guide our counsels to the promotion of the happiness of Her Majesty's People."

MR. GRAHAM said : Mr. Speaker—Sir, I rise to second the Address which has now been proposed, profoundly sensible of the honour conferred on the great constituency which I represent, and on myself by my being invited to do so, and soliciting the patience and indulgence of the House, of my need of which in the discharge of that duty I am most painfully conscious, and which I am assured will not, in such circumstances, be denied me. There must be but one feeling of loyal satisfaction in all our minds in that the Queen has come down to-day in person to address us, and to inaugurate the new Parliament by her presence, and return to the more prominent engagements of public life, whose constrained absence from them has been regarded with so profound sympathy. And although in this new Parliament we miss the familiar face of one who had been so long the presiding spirit of the House of Commons—whose name had become a household word in all our homes—a watchword of our rights and liberties throughout the world, I rejoice to think that, great as is the loss we have sustained by his death, the prosperity and the progress of our country are not dependent on individual lives, however illustrious or gifted, and there is no inconsistency between the deepest and most earnest sense of that loss, and the most perfect confidence in the new leaderships for which it makes room. The Address refers to the subject of Parliamentary Reform, and promises a measure for its accomplishment ; and for this department of the work before us these new leaderships seem peculiarly adapted—adapted alike by the acknowledged confidence of those at the head of Government in the wisdom and justice of Reform, and by their proved possession of the confidence of the country. Whatever truth there may have been in the allegation of indifference in the past, it cannot be asserted that there is such indifference in the country now. True, there is none of the passionate excitement of former days, for such excitement would be altogether out of place. No radical change in our institutions is contemplated. Never were these institutions more loyally appreciated than now. No prevailing sense of wilful and persistent wrong stirs up men's passions or calls for violent protest, although it rests with those who are opposed to such Reform to awaken these passions by obstruction. Nor is there even any hesitation as to the willingness of the Legislature to grant what is desired. On the contrary, there is a calm, confident, universal persuasion that the claim will be allowed. We have all parties in the State pledged to some measure of Reform. We have no party of any weight desiring changes of a revolutionary character such as would overturn the balance of our institutions or the fair share of any class in the direction of the Government, nor is there any necessity for delay in order to a prolonged previous inquiry as to the effects of contemplated alterations, since there are already means of ascertaining, sufficiently accurate for all practical purposes by machinery in existence in connection with our Poor Law system, how, and to what extent, the various constituencies would be affected by any given changes in the qualification. And if it be so, surely it were greatly to be deplored if any personal or party considerations, or any tendency to divided counsels, should delay the settlement of a question which cannot be evaded, and which will be all the more difficult the longer its settlement is deferred.

Reference is made in the Address to those deplorable occurrences in Jamaica which have naturally excited so much attention in this country, and in regard to which opinion is still much divided. On the one hand, we have been startled by the severity of the measures employed—a severity alien to the habits and traditions of our national policy, and which has been resented by the instincts of our people. We have been startled by the limited amount of evidence furnished in official documents as to the reality of the crisis which alone could justify that severity, by the apparently unconstitutional character of some of the proceedings, and by the shameful levity of tone and feeling, and the bitter antipathies of race and creed manifested in much of the correspondence of those who have been actors in these tragedies. On the other hand, our sympathies have naturally been enlisted on behalf of our countrymen placed in circumstances of imminent danger, or believing themselves to be so—sympathies all the stronger for the too recent memories of the fierce passions of the Indian mutiny and the cruel martyrdoms of Cawnpore. We have felt that too hastily to doubt the good faith of our fellow-countrymen, and to stigmatize them rashly as the aggressors in so ferocious a conflict, were treason alike to our common blood and to our common Christianity. Nor has the tried character of the Governor of the island, for ability, integrity, and humane regard to the native races of other colonies, appealed in vain to our sense of justice in his behalf, forbidding us to condemn hastily even where his own official correspondence might seem insufficient for his acquittal. In these circumstances, Government have adopted a course which must commend itself to every unbiassed mind. The inquiry which they have appointed a Royal Commission to conduct will no doubt be prosecuted with all despatch, and it is our duty to await the result. I am persuaded that the decisions of this House thereon will be in accordance with justice—that no intemperate prejudice shall prevent the honourable acquittal of all or of any who have acted worthily in a great crisis, or a lenient interpretation of their mistakes who may have endeavoured to do so, but that, on the other hand, no partiality of rank, or race, or creed, or official position, shall determine our judgment to an unjust conclusion. But remembering that evidence as to character is no sufficient answer to the evidence of facts, if it shall unhappily prove true that in a paroxysm of panic or of passion truth and right have been trampled under foot, this House will never be their accomplices who have so abused the delegated authority of England, nor suffer her boasted humanity to become a by-word of the nations, by turning a deaf ear to the cry of innocent blood.

Whilst public opinion has been agitated by these lamentable events in a distant dependency, we have not been without causes of anxiety at home. The Fenian conspiracy, to which the Address refers, however chimerical in its aims and contemptible in the disproportion between its pretensions and its powers, however alien in its origin—and it is entirely so—however organized by men who had antecedently renounced their allegiance and severed the ties that bound them to this country, is nevertheless an indication not to be neglected that passions and prejudices hostile to peace and good government exist in the minds of some portion of the Irish people. And whilst Government have acted energetically and temperately and effectively in suppressing that conspiracy, it may be well, now that it is suppressed, to ascertain whence these passions and prejudices have arisen, that, if possible, we may remove them; whether there may not be still some impressions of injustice in the relations between landlord and tenant, some want of adaptation in the means of education to the wants of the people, or some positive wrong in the arrangements connected with the religious institutions of the country. Nor must such questions be regarded chiefly from an English or a Scottish, but rather from an Irish point of view, and in so far as we can do so, without sacrifice of principles or Imperial interests, giving all weight to the opinions of those who, as representing Irish constituencies, have the best right to be heard on Irish questions. Much, no doubt, of the feeling in Ireland is unreasoning and traditionary, but not the less is it our duty and interest to investigate and to remove every just cause of complaint.

There is good reason to congratulate the country upon the general prosperity of trade to which the Address refers. Notwithstanding a severe crisis in the spring of last year on the collapse of the Confederate cause in America, which occasioned a depreciation of not less than £12,000,000 to £15,000,000 on manufactures and raw material, the property of this country, the general results of the year's trade, have been satisfactory, and have more than retrieved the losses of the autumn of 1864 and spring of 1865, and the very crisis has contributed to our prosperity by enabling us to import our supplies of cotton at a reduced cost. The operatives in the cotton manufacturing districts who had suffered great hardships in the three preceding years are now fully employed at high wages, and there is, in fact, a dearth of hands in these districts at this moment. Our total production of cotton goods is probably 25 to 30 per cent less than it was in 1861, and it requires the full power of the available hands to produce this diminished quantity, so that it will be three to four years before we can, in the usual course, have as many employed as in that year. Meantime the enhanced value enables us to satisfy the wants of the world with this reduced quantity, and, at the same time, prevents falling off in the declared value of the trade; whilst the hands thus deficient have, for the most part, found profitable employment in other industries. The woollen trade has shared in the gains without fully participating in the losses of the trade in cotton and cotton goods, and, by a singular fortune, thrives alike by the wasteful expenditure of war and the more healthy demands of peace and the revival of the American trade. Our linen trade has experienced an extraordinary development during the continuance of the American war. The total exports, which in 1861 were about three and a half millions value, have in 1864 and 1865 more than doubled, being over seven and a half millions each year. And this increased trade has been most profitable to all concerned, and is now giving abundant employment to every available and willing worker. Our iron industries have attained to more gigantic proportions than ever before, and in some departments of them in which we have hitherto been behind the Continent, such as the manufacture of cast-steel, we are now nearly or quite on a par with any country, whilst the rapid development of the mineral fields of the Cleveland district, and the more recent discoveries of hematite ore in Cumberland, are rapidly creating great centres of industrious and prosperous populations in districts which before were poor and thinly peopled. In Scotland we have more furnaces in blast at the commencement of this year than at any corresponding period in the history of the trade, and even so the supply has not equalled the demand, and we have had to draw upon existing stocks; our total exports exceed by 10 per cent those of any previous year, whilst the prospects of demand for ship-building and railways at home and abroad is altogether unprecedented. But I believe there is in these very prosperities a voice of warning. The enormous increase in our consumption of coal in this and other great industries cannot continue in the same ratio without making alarming inroads on our resources for the future. The coal fields of this country, however vast, represent after all an ascertainable and an exhaustible supply, and the limits of that supply are being approached more rapidly than is generally realized; and, however the certainty of ultimate exhaustion and gradual enhancement of cost in the meantime may foreshadow changes in the future altogether beyond our control, it is undoubtedly a present and an urgent duty to practise a wise and thoughtful economy, instead of the somewhat improvident and spendthrift extravagance with which we have to some extent been chargeable in the past. In the Lothians of Scotland an almost entirely new industry has sprung into existence in the manufacture of mineral oil from the hitherto valueless shales which exist not only there but in the North of England and Wales—a source of unexpected wealth to the proprietors of the land, and of remunerative employment to large numbers of the people. The wages of labour are steadily advancing in all departments of industry, and with them the material conditions of our labouring people are likely to be improved, both as respects hours of labour, the character of their homes, and the education of their children—and it is probably in the experience of most of us how material a diminution there is in the number of those seeking the employment of domestic service, a sure indication of increased openings in other fields. And although the price of breadstuffs has been too low to be remunerative to our farmers, they have found in the enhanced value of all other agricultural produce compensation for that cheap bread, which, although so important an element in the prosperity of the country, is indirectly a source of loss to them. They alone, however, of all our people have been suffering under the pressure of a severe calamity.

The lamentable plague among our cattle to which the Address refers constitutes a claim upon our sympathy and help no less valid than that which was acknowledged on behalf of the Lancashire operatives three years ago. And without referring at any length to a subject which has been already so much more ably handled than I could pretend to do by the noble Lord the Mover of the Address, I may be allowed to express a hope that in so far as schemes of local help or mutual insurance or other means may be found inadequate to meet these losses, recourse may be had, as in the case of Lancashire, to the voluntary sympathy and aid of the community. I am persuaded that the response will be no less cordial and effective, and that the necessity is in many cases no less urgent in the one case than it was in the other.

The present Law of Bankruptcy has not answered the expectations of its framers; and the present system is too formal, tedious, and expensive to satisfy the mercantile community. Except in cases of dishonesty, they would prefer something with less of legal exactness and more of practical business promptitude. And they care less for extracting the uttermost farthing of possible dividend, at great cost of time and expense, than for getting what is to be got quickly, and dismissing an unpleasant subject, which a bad debt always is. The system in Scotland is simpler, and works better, and an assimilation to it in the English law is probably desirable.

The Commercial Treaty with Austria, which the Address announces, is another step in that great policy of international commerce for which we are so deeply indebted to Mr. Cobden, and no less so to the wisdom and friendship of the Emperor of the French. It is valuable as giving us access to markets representing the wants of upwards of forty million of consumers, and securing to us in return the grain, the timber, the wool, and the wines of that vast empire. But it is no less so as a means of cultivating the confidence and kindly feeling of a nation from which circumstances have somewhat estranged us, although with its subjects we have much in common. A prosperous commerce may do great things for Hungary and Poland in the future, however inadequate mere material prosperities may be to compensate for the sufferings of the past. And the practical prosperities of such a commerce may greatly contribute to the solution of questions in which the ambition and pride of Austria and the nationality and patriotism of Italy are deeply involved. Nor can the example of France and Austria be without influence on the other nations of the world. Spain and Portugal, which have hitherto repaid our past services by tariffs conceived in a spirit of the severest exclusion or the narrowest protection, and the nations of the North and West that still cling to the prejudices of the past in commercial legislation, will one by one learn the lessons of a more enlightened policy, and step by step we shall thus fulfil His designs who has so constituted the common family, and so furnished by variety of climates and products the abundant storehouse of the earth as that our necessities and wants and appetites should be, instead of occasions to bite and devour one another, means of mutual helpfulness, and messengers of peace and goodwill to men.

I have already trespassed too long upon the patience of the House, and would only be permitted, in one concluding word, to respond to those appropriate expressions of the Address commending our country and ourselves to that Divine protection and blessing whereby alone our efforts can be made successful and our properties maintained. Earnestly desiring that it may accompany us still, and that under its control we may in our day and measure contribute to that progress of truth and right towards whose consummation all histories of individuals and nations are surely tending — contribute not blindly and by the impulse of an irresistible fate, but with a willing, an intelligent, and a hopeful consciousness — I beg most gratefully to acknowledge the patient attention and indulgence of the House, and to second the Address which has now been proposed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That," &c. [See page 115.]

MR. BANKS STANHOPE: I owe an apology to the House for taking up a position which my standing does not perfectly warrant; but there is one point in Her Majesty's Speech upon which I desire to offer a few remarks, and that is the allusion to the cattle plague. But in the first place, I must venture to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair—and the House—upon the fact that he has again been placed in that position—a position the duties of which I cordially wish him health and strength to carry out. Missing one familiar face on the Benches opposite, I may also be permitted to add that, opposed as I have always been to the Government of the late noble Viscount, I not the less sincerely regret the loss of that distinguished statesman. Further, I desire to congratulate the Seconder of the Address on the exceedingly able speech which he has just delivered, in doing which I am sure I am but expressing the feelings entertained by all who sit around me. I only intend to trouble the House on the present occasion with a reference to that part of Her Majesty's Speech which speaks of the cattle plague. I need hardly remind the House that it first showed itself in this country in July last, and I fear there is no one who can inform us how or where it came from, or how it will end. In dealing with this subject I will divide it under two heads—first, the past policy of the Government, and what has occurred with regard to the disease up to this time; and, secondly, whether it is possible in any way to stop the disease. This disease commenced in July last, and before the end of the existing year, if it continue with its present virulence, I am afraid one-half of the cattle will be lost. At the commencement of the disease neither the Government nor the people were alarmed, and up to October I do not think the country would have encouraged or have permitted the adoption of stringent measures, had the Government proposed them. Still, I must point out the inexcusable blunders which the Government committed in the early stages of the disease. In August the first of the endless series of Orders came out, and inspectors were appointed, for whose payment no provision whatever was made; and no power of any sort was given to magistrates to stop the passage from one part of the United Kingdom to another of any infected animal. About that time there happened to be a great cattle fair in Lincolnshire, and the bench of magistrates with which I was connected consulted their law adviser as to the best means of stopping infected beasts from coming in. He told them that neither according to law nor under the Orders of the Privy Council had they any security in doing what they contemplated. So they determined to act contrary to law, and gave directions to the police to stop all animals having the appearance of infection, and to take them to a place provided for the purpose. In that case, supposing the magistrates had chosen to obey the law rather than to disregard it, what would have been the consequences of allowing diseased animals to circulate freely? In September there was a great fair held at Barnet. Now I do not blame the Government for not having stopped it, for I do not think that at that early period the public was sufficiently aware of its importance to stop the fairs and markets from being held. Afterwards it became obvious to all that something should be done to prevent the spread of the disease, and then the Government issued an Order giving permissive powers for the stopping of markets and fairs. Now, I think permissive legislation is erroneous. If a thing is right encourage it, but if wrong forbid it, and not put magistrates, as in this case, completely in collision with their neighbours; because the bench of magistrates which does its duty is unpopular, and the bench who chooses to pander to the prejudice of its neighbours is popular. By giving permissive powers to stop fairs and markets, the Government allowed that fairs and markets are a source of danger. Now, if they are not dangerous, you have no right to allow any person to stop them and disturb the state of the country; and if they are a source of danger they are so everywhere, and the Government should have taken upon itself the duty of stopping them. If I go to Northampton and ask persons there how they got the disease among them, the answer is, "Simply and solely because the Government, in spite of warnings, allow beasts to leave the Metropolitan Market and travel to the country." One county imports it from the next, and so the matter goes on. By allowing unlimited facilities of railway traffic the Government deprive themselves of the only excuse for authorizing these permissive Orders to stop fairs and markets, because if a cordon had been drawn round each individual county, then the magistrates and authorities within might have been allowed the option of permitting the circulation of cattle in that county; whereas, under the present system, the losses that have occurred in Lincolnshire are due to cattle imported from Yorkshire. Six beasts were brought into the county; six persons were found foolish enough to buy them, and thousands of pounds have been lost through those cattle. The Government after September got a little more alarmed, and in November a deputation from the Royal Agricultural Society waited upon the Home Secretary, and pointed out to him what measures were requisite to prevent the rapid spread of the disease. That deputation and their recommendations, I am sorry to say, did not meet with that respect it was entitled to, when it is remembered that the Royal Agricultural Society fully and clearly represent the opinions of the farmers of England. That body, to which the agriculturists gave their allegiance, made four requests—that a total stop should be put to railway traffic in live animals; that all foreign animals should be killed before entry; that infected hides should not be carried about England, and that town manure should not be suffered to spread infection broadcast. The Order which the Government brought out in the middle of December, enabling magistrates to prevent cattle going from one district to another,

did some good in a limited way; but it did not work well, and ten days later another Order came out giving the power to the quarter sessions. Again, a little later, there was another Order, and finally, a few days ago, an Order explaining all these. This last Order shows convincingly the importance of the points urged in the petition of the Royal Agricultural Society. A great deal has been said throughout the country with respect to hides and town manure. If hides are not dangerous, the Government had no business to stop an important trade. If they be dangerous, the most stringent measures ought to be adopted as regards those articles. As to town manure, if you allow it to go to the south of England, the great probability is that, even should the disease be stamped out for the present, it will be spread over every part of England in the course of next summer. It is now known that for the cattle disease medicines are of little good. I was told, on the authority of a cowkeeper who had lost 120 head of cattle, that there was no remedy but isolation, no cure but the poleaxe. But how would you deal with isolation—at what season would you carry it into operation? In summer, when every animal would be in the field, and when, therefore, the cattle would be brought into immediate contact with one another? Or ought such a measure not rather to be carried out in winter, when the cattle are in their respective buildings? The mortality has gone on gradually increasing from 8,000 to 9,000 and 10,000 head of cattle weekly, until it has suddenly leaped by an increase of 1,400 to 11,400 a week. Indeed, looking at what has taken place, I am surprised the disease has not spread more than it has done. You have forbidden hides and town manure to be carried about in the month of January. I presume it was in the belief that their being carried about was dangerous in that month. But if it were dangerous in winter, why was it that it had not been thought dangerous in September and October? Who can tell to what extent the removal of hides and town manure may not have led to the increase of the disease? You have lost three months, and thereby have omitted to avail yourselves of a golden opportunity. Even should you now enforce the most stringent measures, it would be impossible in any way to bring things to such a state by the month of April as that restrictive Orders would no longer be necessary. You will then have to deal with a double difficulty. On the 6th of April there is generally a great change of tenancy. If a man leaving a farm have a lot of stock he cannot leave them there. Again, he cannot sell them, because, according to rules in force in every county, stock could not be moved except for immediate slaughter. A man so situated would, therefore, be unable to find a purchaser. If these rules are adhered to you will inflict unmerited ruin on an industrious class of men. On the other hand, if those rules be abrogated, what danger may not arise to the entire country? There is another consideration in connection with counties in which, if animals are to be fed at all, they must be brought through intermediate plough-land to the lowlands on which there is food for them to eat, and which require cattle. If the rules of non-removal be in force, you will find those lands lying deserted, while in other places there will be thousands of cattle with nothing to eat. Again, if you permit cattle to be moved through intermediate land to the lowlands, there is no knowing how many thousand cattle may be affected by the few which, to all appearance, were in good health. I believe it is not possible to stamp this plague out, but I believe it is possible to check it. If stringent measures be not adopted the ratio of increase may rise still higher, and by the month of April we shall have a mortality of perhaps 20,000 head a week. Clearly the evil must be met by bold measures which have not been adopted before. I know it is easier to find fault than to act; but I do say that the Government ought to have acted on their own responsibility—they ought to have exercised their own authority. They ought to have issued compulsory instead of permissive Orders. They ought to have stopped every market and fair in the month of September; and they ought to have taken two other decided steps also. They ought to have stopped all railway traffic in live cattle, and they ought to have slaughtered every imported animal at the port of entry. I may be, perhaps, accused of advocating despotic measures; but I confess, that in 1866 I have not the same feeling with respect to the unmitigated evils of centralization and despotism I had in 1865. I believe that much of the happiness and national feeling of this country depend on our local self-government; but when I see confused mayors and confused magistrates trying every experiment, and in vain endeavouring to understand a succession of orders one more confused than another, I come to the conclusion that when you want to do anything well centralization is better than a policy which made "confusion worse confounded." I have some doubts as to how far our constitutional government is suited to a time when we wanted a sharp hand and a quick eye. At a time like the present, when there is a great existing evil, and when the possibility of a coming cattle famine is hanging over us, I believe there could be no greater evil for the inhabitants of a country than to live under the rule of a responsible Government which should shrink from all the consequences of direct and vigorous action. Though I am not in a position which can give any unusual weight to my words, the House will, I hope, allow me to state what in my opinion ought to be done, and what, indeed, must be done. In the first place, I maintain that it is indispensable to put an end to all traffic in live cattle. All animals coming from abroad ought to be killed at the ports they arrive at. It will be necessary to adopt a compulsory plan similar to that which has been tried at Aberdeen with considerable success, by killing every diseased animal and every healthy animal that has come into contact with a diseased one. In such cases a fair compensation must be given for the animals destroyed. By the Minute which has been issued on the subject, animals cannot be removed from one field to another, or sent to market. I might compare the conduct of Her Majesty's Government to that of a great philosopher—Sir Isaac Newton I believe it was—who made a large hole for the cat and a small one for the kitten. They have obstructed trade in every county by the regulations which they have laid down; while, at the same time, they allow the Great Northern, the Manchester and Sheffield, and other railways to carry from all parts cattle which might or might not be infected. The Order which has been made that no animal should be sent to any market if the plague has appeared within a month within a mile of the place cannot possibly be carried out. It will certainly be evaded. For my own part, I feel confident that the effect of the magistrates having made such stringent regulations has been to render live cattle very much more valuable in the market than dead meat. The consequence of this is that every man who manages his farm properly will carry its live cattle to London, Manchester, Bristol, and elsewhere rather than kill them. How can you call upon any county to stamp out the disease when railways are allowed to bring it within their boundaries? It is impossible to carry out your late orders against sending beasts to fairs or markets so long as you allow a system of traffic in such beasts by the railway. If those who object to the plan I am going to propose can suggest anything better I shall be glad to listen to them. Unless some measures of the kind I have to propose are adopted, there will be next year a fearful amount of disease. My plan is not permissive. It is very stringent and very strong, and will probably meet with considerable opposition. The English people never like anything compulsory, because everything that is compulsory in this country appears to be despotic. I will, however, suggest a plan which is short, clear, decisive, and not permissive. It is this, that the Government should at once introduce and pass as quickly as the forms of the House will permit—for there is no time to lose—a Bill compelling all the magistrates in every county at once to levy in, and for the use of their county only a rate to be called the "Rinderpest Fund." That rate, I propose, shall be of a twofold character. The first will be a rate on all property which is subject to the poor rate; while the second will be a rate on all live cattle now in England. Even without the second rate there might be considerable justice in levying one upon all descriptions of property; because, unless we are assisted by God, and assist ourselves, England will be visited by the most terrible calamities. The scarcity of meat, and the consequent increase in its price, will prevent the inhabitants of small houses in towns from eating meat at all. Now, the labouring population cannot work without having meat; and, therefore, if meat rise from 1s. 6d. to 2s. per pound, it must necessarily lead to an increased rate of wages. Therefore, it will be warrantable to levy a rate upon all kinds of property. But lest there should be the old feeling of "town against country," I propose an additional rate on every head of cattle alive, so that the owner of live cattle will pay a double rate, one on his cattle, one on his other property. If a plan such as that I have ventured to suggest be adopted, the next course will be to give orders that the magistrates of every county shall take such steps as they think fit on any day of any week to value all cattle not infected which are in their respective counties—the Rinderpest Fund to be managed by a committee of farmers, the magistrates sitting with them. Every person possessing cattle afflicted with the disease to have them slaughtered compulsorily, and any one having healthy animals in close proximity to others which are diseased to be advised or compelled to sell the healthy ones and receive the price they fetch, together with so much added as will amount to two-thirds of their value. In a small way this has been done within a mile of my estate. As an instance I would mention a person who had lost some cattle, and had one animal ill. On applying to an insurance company he received permission to slaughter those which still remain in a healthy state, and he accordingly did so. The beasts were valued at £15 each, but in the market they fetched only £6 10s., so the committee made up the difference between the last-mentioned sum and two thirds of the value—namely, £10. A tenant in this way derives the additional advantage that he has no expense, he has no risk of infection either in his manure in the yard or in the grass field. The insurance company, in the case I allude to, owed the tenant for twenty animals at £3 10s. each, or £70; by the other plan they would have to pay him £10 each, or £200; so that the society would save £130. Twenty animals were thus sent to market in a perfectly healthy condition, and were converted into food. This, however, was a small part of the advantage; there was the important relief that the twenty animals could occasion no more anxiety. On the other hand, when the animals could not be got rid of what had happened? They died one by one, until the farm became a head of corruption and a centre of contagion. The mental relief acquired by the consideration that animals on the surrounding farms were not liable to be poisoned was a real gain to the whole neighbourhood. If this plan has answered for one parish of North Lincolnshire, why might it not answer for the county? And if it answered for the county of Aberdeen, in a voluntary shape, why should it not for all the counties of England? It may be asked, why not copy the example of Aberdeen? For this reason: in most cases anything voluntary is simply spoliation, and the more a willing man gives, the more he saves the pocket of his stingy neighbour. We have a great calamity to meet, we have a hideous cloud overshadowing us, and the plague must be stopped at all risks. Knowing that there are in the House several Gentlemen who sit here for the first time, I cannot be wrong in indicating where the responsibility now rests. Before the meeting of Parliament this onerous responsibility devolved upon the Government who accepted it; but since the meeting of Parliament, every Member of the House is as individually answerable for the future as is the Government. If there be vacillation, it will be ours; if anything decisive be done, it will be owing to our energy. The country has justifiably given up all hope of much display of energy on the part of the Government; but it does expect that they who know the sufferings of their neighbours, who know the desolation that prevails through the length and breadth of the land, who know thoroughly what has happened, who know that the great evil was twofold, and embraced the killing, not only of those animals that had the rinderpest, but of store cattle and of calves, so that the future stock was endangered, should recognize the responsibility which has now fallen upon them. We are a new Parliament entering upon our duties, and we shall grossly neglect them and abuse the confidence placed in us if we do not devote all our energies to this important subject, and to this subject alone, first, making all other matter subsidiary. Let the question of the reform of the representation wait; let the consideration of what has been done in Jamaica wait; and let other interesting questions wait; but the cattle plague will not wait; it is a question of months, of weeks, of days, and of hours. The loss—11,000 head of cattle a week—is nearly 2,000 a day, and as the victims of the plague increase in number so will the difficulty of stopping it increase. The longer we delay our measures the longer those measures must remain in operation. If stringent measures are not taken now, they must be taken shortly. If we do not stop the railway traffic in live animals now, we must do so by-and-by. If we postpone that measure until April, we shall not stop the plague this year; and if we do not stamp out the disease before July, we shall not put a stop to it by 1869. If we are to go on as we have done hitherto, I fear that, unless this Parliament be more long-lived than it is generally expected to be, we shall leave the duty of stopping the plague to our successors. I have spoken warmly of the past because golden moments have been lost. In the light of the past the very idea of the future appals me. Therefore, in my humble position as a Member of Parliament, but representing a large agricultural constituency, I have thought it my duty to place my plan before Parliament, and to leave it to others to carry it out. Humble though I am, I would not willingly submit to the humiliation, at such a crisis, of being a consenting party to the continuation of a wilfully weak, vacillating, doing nothing policy.

MR. DENT said, he concurred in the belief that much valuable time had been lost, and that the disease had made such inroads that those brought into contact with it were perplexed to know how to stop it. He could not acquit the Government of blame for this delay. The disease appeared in the month of June, a Royal Commission was appointed, and reported to the Government on the 30th of October. It stated the reasons on which it recommended the total suspension of the conveyance of cattle; but neither the country nor the agriculturists were at that time prepared for so strong a step. But the Government might have boldly carried out the recommendation of the minority of the Commission, especially when they were urged in December by deputations representing the Royal Agricultural Society, the Farmers' Club, and the Smithfield Club; and, through them, the bulk of the agriculturists of the country. These important bodies wished, above all things, to secure general action throughout the country, so that the matter should not be left to local authorities of different opinions. The result of these deputations was the giving of additional powers to magistrates in petty sessions, but so conflicting were the powers thus exercised that farmers were fairly perplexed and at a loss to know how to conduct their business. As a consequence, in districts he could name, the numbers of cattle had been reduced from thousands to hundreds. In a district where there should be nearly 2,000 head of cattle there were not fifty, and in three villages where there usually were 600 head of cattle not more than fifty were left, not because the cattle had perished from the disease, but because the farmers knew not what to do, and sent all kinds of cattle to market, selling them at serious loss—some, in fact, not being fit for market at all. In January powers were given to courts of quarter sessions, on the supposition, which had not been realized, that they would cause greater uniformity of action. From what had fallen from the hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. Banks Stanhope) it appeared that the practice was different in North Lincolnshire to what it was in the West Riding, and it was different again in the North Riding and in the East Riding. What he complained of in the conduct of Government was the want of a due sense of responsibility in the non-issue of orders which should have been uniform in their operation throughout the country. The Government were bound at once to bring in a measure to authorize the slaughtering on the premises of all cattle attacked—in fact, the carrying out of the system adopted with success in Aberdeenshire. Voluntary effort failed in matters of this kind; what was done must be done compulsorily and with uniformity throughout the country. He doubted whether it was possible now, when farmers must purchase grazing cattle to stock pastures, to stop altogether the removal of cattle; but, wherever cattle were attacked, isolation and destruction must be resorted to. Of course, those whose cattle were destroyed must be compensated, and they might be compensated at a less cost than was ordinarily supposed, for the cost was found a trifling matter in Aberdeenshire compared with the value of the animals saved. It would not be an unfair thing if the burden were thrown upon the county rate. If it were thought that some descriptions of property should not bear it he could say that such a rate levied upon landowners and tenants would be cheerfully paid. Although farmers were considered by some to be a grumbling and complaining race, in his own locality they had evinced a ready cheerfulness to meet their losses, and to submit themselves to the law if they only knew what the law was. He never saw losses so bravely borne as these losses by the cattle plague had been borne. What the farmers complained of was that there was one order in one district and another in another, and that they were fairly puzzled to know what to do. In the West Riding, besides the quarter sessions, there were ten corporate towns; and the Leeds Mercury contained an advertisement relating to Wakefield, to the effect that every facility would be given for the removal of cattle and sheep. The advertisement completely overturned all the orders that had been made for the West Riding. His object in speaking was to enforce the advice given to the Government to take up the question themselves, and bring in a Bill, if it were necessary, taking power to deal with the matter thoroughly throughout Great Britain and Ireland, and to establish a system of isolation and destruction. If they were to avert the disease before the early months of summer that was the only way it could be done.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, there were two important matters which had to be considered with regard to the cattle plague—our future course of action, and the feebleness and incompetency which the Home Office had shown in attempting to deal with the calamity. Certainly, the former subject had received a great deal of elucidation in the able discussion of it by the hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. Banks Stanhope). But there was the other point which had not yet been touched on in the discussion of the subject and which he trusted the House and the country in general would bear in mind, and that was the action taken by the Government to meet the emergency and restrain the plague. It should be remembered that the attack of the disease had not been so sudden that the Home Office was destitute of all knowledge of its nature, and could not have foreseen the necessity of initiating measures of prevention. It should be recollected that it had for many years been generally known in this country that the cattle plague always extended itself from Russia in the direction of every line of communication established by trade. It was known that as soon as trade was opened with Russia the disease would invade the shores of England. Acting upon that knowledge, the Government of the day sent Professor Symonds abroad to study and investigate the nature of the cattle plague. The result of his investigations and Report was that the Government—on the 7th of April, 1857—when Parliament was not sitting, passed an Order in Council to prevent the introduction of the rinderpest to this country, thereby showing that the Government had full power to pass such Order in Council. Now, bearing that in mind, let the House consider what has been the action of the present Government? The cattle plague was introduced into this country on the 19th of June. The first cargo sent from Russia to this country was shipped at Revel; and it could be stated, on the authority of Professor Gamgee (who made a statement with respect to the matter at a meeting of the Social Science Association), that three of the cattle intended for shipment died on their way from the interior, and one took so ill that it had to be killed in the shipper's yard. For the value of this beast an action was brought. But the action was lost, from its being proved that the beast had the rinderpest. Another beast fell ill upon the passage to England. The vessel ultimately reached England, and the cattle were landed at Hull and were sent up to the Metropolitan Market. It would thus be seen that a whole cargo of cattle, amongst which the infection was known to have broken out, was not only landed at an important seaport, but actually conveyed without hindrance to London, at the great risk of spreading the plague. As early as 1857 there had been a very strong feeling that cattle imported from abroad, and especially from diseased localities, should be subject to quarantine. The Government of the day replied that the people of England were not yet aware of the danger, or, as the hon. Member who moved the Address had said, there was not panic enough in the country to warrant it. That was the Whig notion—that the Government could not do what was best for the country without being pushed and driven into it by an agitated people. No restriction was therefore, at the time, put upon the importation of animals, and the country was now suffering in consequence. If a quarantine had been ordered much evil would have been avoided, and the case he had referred to could not have occurred. On the 10th of July Professor Symonds attended a meeting of the Privy Council, whence he proceeded to the Home Office, to inform the Home Secretary of the great danger that threatened the country, and urged—nay, implored—him to lose no time in taking up and dealing with the question, for it was most urgent and the peril most imminent. Now, what did the Home Secretary do? He took a fortnight to consider; after that fortnight had elapsed he produced the Order in Council of the 24th of July. That Order was confined to the area of the metropolis; but on the 11th of August it was extended to the whole of England, and on the 18th of August to Scotland. If they contrasted such a delay on the part of our Government on a matter of so great importance with the prompt and decisive measures adopted in foreign countries, they would find a remarkable difference. All foreign Governments made it to be the interest of persons to declare to the proper authorities the presence of disease when it broke out among their stock—that is to say, full compensation was given for all animals which were killed, in order to prevent the spread of the disease. The English Government, on the other hand, made it the interest of every one to hide the existence of the disease; and not only this, but the Government induced those persons to sow it broadcast over the land. In fact, for a considerable time the Metropolitan Market had thus become a centre and focus whence the disease was radiated throughout the country. But what was the effect of the Order? Inspectors were appointed, who had the most despotic powers over the life and death of all cattle, and these very inspectors went about to slaughter and slash, and received a benefit for the beasts which they killed, while the farmers were not recouped for their loss. The consequence was that the farmers, instead of informing the inspectors whenever the disease first showed itself, sent their cattle away as soon as they could, and, having brought them where they obtained the full price, the metropolitan and other cattle markets became the foci of disease. The Home Office had not stopped there. It was well known that a labourer, or even a dog, might carry the infection. Well, what did the Government do? They sent the inspector to the farmyards where there was disease, and the inspector dabbled in the blood of the diseased animals, and brought the disease away with him to all the healthy farmsteads around which he had to inspect. So that this Order in Council, and the appointment of the inspectors, spread the evil instead of restraining it. The disease had been produced by importation, and the Home Office might (without taking a fortnight to consider) have issued an Order in Council to put some restrictions on importations; although not such a one, perhaps, as the hon. Member for North Lincolnshire suggested. The Home Office might have established a quarantine for ships carrying animals from countries where the disease existed. But they have not done so as yet. What was the next occurrence which showed just as much the apathy of the Government in this matter? The Irish Members went to the Home Office, and requested the Home Secretary to put some restriction upon the importation of animals into Ireland. This the Home Secretary refused to do, saying that he feared and could not venture on such a decisive step. The Irish Members then drew up a memorial, promising that they would take upon themselves the full responsibility attaching to such a measure, and the result had been that Ireland was free from the cattle plague to the present day. He begged to thank the Irish Members for a lesson in energy, and showing them how they should deal with a timid and apathetic Home Secretary. There next came the Petty Sessions' Order in Council. By this document the Government said to the magistrates and mayors of the whole country, "Do for yourselves whatever you think best; you must defend yourselves; the paternal Government will do nothing for you." Sir, if an enemy landed on the shores, would the petty sessions have to provide defence for our homesteads? Would the Government still do nothing? And what greater enemy could invade the country than this dire calamity? If a fire raged in London, is the householder permitted to deal with the flames? No! the recognized Government interfere. And what worse fire than this cattle fever? "Oh! but," says the Home Secretary, "the people are not yet conscious of the amount of the danger, they are not 'panic-stricken' as yet." But if you saw a man lying wounded and insensible, would you forbear to staunch the flow of blood because the poor wretch was unconscious of his position? Here, again, therefore, we see to what apathy, to what loss, the Whig doctrine leads—for what timidity and hesitation it is the excuse. Then, a metropolitan committee went to the Home Secretary and urged him to take some steps, after three months' ravages of the plague, to stop it. He said, in reply, "We are thinking of issuing a Commission to inquire into the nature and origin of this disease, and we shall do so presently." Well, a Commission was issued; but, when they reported, the Government were afraid to follow their advice, yet the disease was so tremendous an evil that the country would submit to any amount of vexation; nay, any restraint would be received as an absolute boon which succeeded in stopping the plague, and Parliament had already given all the necessary powers. But the Home Secretary was apathetic, timorous, and hesitating. On the 8th of December the Council of the Agricultural Society waited upon the Home Secretary; and what was his answer? It was, "Wait and see whether the disease will become more general." Wait! Why, the very thing that was complained of was this waiting, this hesitation, this dread of responsibility, this dilatory inaction and pusillanimous apathy. "More general!" Why, 4,000 beasts were then dying per week, and now it was nearly 12,000. Perhaps hon. Gentlemen could hardly picture to themselves what that really meant. When coming down to the House he was informed by a butcher of whom he had inquired, a man of great respectability and knowledge, that the carcass of an ox of moderate proportions weighed 100 stone of 8lbs. per stone; and that, after making an allowance of 20 stone for bone, hide, and offal, there would remain about 640lb. of good meat; and Mr. Lucas, who supplied the dinners for that House, told him that 640lb. would make dinners for 800 gentlemen. Well, multiply that by 12,000, and the sum total of our loss each week was no less than 9,600,000 dinners. [Laughter.] When they considered not only the farmers, but the operatives in all our towns, that were affected by this loss, it was no laughing matter. Let it be remembered that all this loss was not occasioned by the fault of the farmer, and not even secondarily by the judgment of Heaven, but by the apathy, and want of decision, and incompetence of the Home Office. Then came the Order in Council of December 16th. But that merely changed "Petty Sessions" into "Quarter Sessions." This was intended as an enlargement of the area; but it did not interfere with the railway traffic in cattle, with the landing of cattle, nor with the jurisdiction of boroughs within counties. Boroughs might have cattle sent into them, and might lodge them, and thus spread the disease; and a man might drive his cattle through a county, and there was no power to stop the cattle. All that could be done was to summon the man before the next petty sessions; but when the day for hearing the case came round, he might be sixty miles away. Hence there was nothing in this Order to prevent the spreading of the pest to every corner of the kingdom; and no restriction on importation. In fact, he knew of instances where infected cattle had been sent off to distant markets, and had brought the plague to those towns. He had been in Northumberland when it was free from disease, and he knew that cattle were sent into it from the south in an infected state. He had also been told by a large landowner of Northumberland that the shore was strewn with the carcasses of beasts. Why was that? He said they were sending over beasts from Holland and other infected places, and when they arrived near our shores they threw the diseased Jonas overboard, and sold the remainder of the infected cargo at full price. In this way the disease was not only spread in the country, but was actually imported into it. Moreover, in local authorities there was no promptitude, where despatch was essential; there was no uniformity, where variation was destruction. Therefore, replacing "Petty Sessions" by "Quarter Sessions" was doing nothing but sewing new cloth upon an old garment which had been proved to be rotten. But there was another fault. This Order in Council was not to come into operation until the 3rd of January, and the acts of quarter sessions date from the 1st, and consequently the quarter sessions, unless they set themselves against the law, as they might very safely do in these days, could not even take advantage of the Order in Council, or come under those powers which the Government pretended to have given. But, what was done in other countries? In France, the moment this rinderpest was heard of a report was presented to the Emperor, and a decree was issued on the 5th of September to prevent importation without a previous quarantine, and to give compensation for all animals which were killed. In a short time there was a diseased animal found near the Belgian frontier, but they destroyed all animals which had thus become infected, and thus stamped out the plague, and the whole disease was annihilated in that country with the loss of only forty-three beasts. The same was done in Belgium, where the distemper was stamped out with the loss of from 500 to 600 beasts. Similar precautions were always adopted in Galicia, where also they gave full compensation. We also were no strangers to the proper remedy for a calamity of this kind. The great plague in England occurred in 1745; it was met by Orders in Council, and it lasted twelve years; until we learned the necessity of isolation, slaughter, and compensation.

It appeared three times afterwards—first in Suffolk, in 1769, next in Hampshire, in 1774, and again in Suffolk, in 1781, and each time it was instantly stamped out by the same means—namely, by offering compensation to the full value for every infected beast which was killed. So now also, if a cordon had at first been drawn round the infected districts the plague could not have spread. But what had been done by the Home Office? Why, in the first place everything was done too late, and in the next, it was done in such a manner that it was certain to be inoperative. The Home Secretary began first by slaughtering "the suspects." He slaughtered them without giving any remuneration. What more arbitrary proceeding could be perpetrated? And yet the Home Secretary was afraid of taking on himself the smallest responsibility, or doing anything to check the spread of the disease, lest "he might be accused of centralization." He then allowed the local authorities to make a sort of patch-work and variegated quilt of legislation, which proves heterogeneity was useless, and proves tardiness was destructive. The fact was that the Home Secretary was afraid of responsibility. He was not ignorant of the danger, but he could not bring himself to act; and yet he was supported by his own Commission, by the Agricultural Society, by the Smithfield Cattle Club, and by public opinion. He (Lord Robert Montagu) would venture to say that any amount of vexation which the Home Secretary might have chosen to impose, provided he had stamped out the plague, would have been received as an actual boon. The Government could have stopped the plague, and yet did that only which tended to spread it. It was only fair, therefore, that the farmers should not bear the loss, but that they should be recompensed for that which they had sustained. It might be said that the Government had been taken by surprise. But how could that be the case when we had the annals of this country and the example of other countries before us to tell how to act? How could it be when we had the instances of Ireland and Aberdeen? The Home Secretary could not have been surprised, and he was not. He had, to use the words of Bolingbroke, the advantage of—

"This fortress framed by nature for herself Against infection and the hand of war."

That gave him a great advantage which other countries lacked. Therefore the Home Secretary cannot plead ignorance, nor surprise which proceeds from ignorance alone. It was the late Sir James Graham who first advised farmers to cease ploughing and apply themselves to feeding stock. Since that time Members at county meetings and agricultural dinners had constantly recommended the same course, and the consequence was that our system of agriculture depended now more than ever on stock feeding. That is to say, the capital of the farmer is shut up in grass land, and cow byres, and oilcake, and green crops. The public did not now feel the calamity which was impending. They did not feel the famine of cheese and butter and milk and beef which would ensue. For there was now no breeding of cattle, and no store cattle were purchased to supply the wants of other years. Nor did this condition of affairs apply to the agricultural interest alone. What would the operatives in the towns do? Would they eat beasts which had stood for ten days in their own dung in ships, and were then sold for exorbitant prices? Look at the famine which would come on. The farmer would be pinched in means, and therefore when prices were high wages would be low; we should have empty stomachs and the discontent and disturbance which always attends upon hunger. Some Gentlemen seemed to imagine that the injuries done to farmers by the plague could be entirely repaired by temporary indulgence on the part of their landlords, or that it was a question of an impoverished farmer going out, and a richer one succeeding. If the entire stock of a farmer was swept away by the plague, and the landlord forgave him his rent for that year, it must be remembered that he would still have to meet his next year's rent. And how could he do so after suffering such a loss? He had barely enough left to feed his family; none to save and employ as capital. How, then, can he battle on against want? His grass lands, his green crops bring in no return. Even if the landlord allowed the farmer to plough the grass lands, serious an injury as that would be to the interests of the former, it could not be of any permanent assistance to the latter. For how can he buy the seed to sow it? Where will he find dung to manure it? The farmer had, after the loss of his stock, no capital to carry on the operations of his farm, and therefore the rotation of crops would be impossible, and the land would be injured. The large sums which he had expended in oilcake and cow byres would, after the loss of his cattle, be therefore entirely unproductive. Among the numerous remedies that had been proposed was that of a system of county assurance, by which sufferers by the cattle plague would be recouped their losses. He was astonished that any one having the slightest knowledge of what assurance really was could make such a proposal. By the system of mutual assurance the losses of a few are divided over the great number who lose nothing. The quotas of the many who escape pay for the losses of the few who are hit; but, he asked, what possible assistance could they derive from assurance in the present case, when the cattle of an entire county may be swept away by the plague? Insurance was a very proper means of preventing individuals from suffering excessive injury from isolated accidents, but it would be quite useless when, as in the present instance, a great calamity had fallen on the entire nation. It was acknowledged that this must be unsuccessful if confined to parishes, for one parish would be crushed even if another escaped. Hence it was proposed to enlarge the area to counties. But may not a whole county be ruined? Then extend the area of your benevolence to the whole nation. The right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had recently written a letter to The Times on the subject of the cattle plague. Now, he (Lord Robert Montagu) was not about to allude to that letter in any hostile manner or in a spirit of criticism; on the contrary, judging from that letter, he claimed the support of the right hon. Gentleman himself. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that, in case the cattle plague should extend itself on a large scale, it was the duty of landlords and neighbouring proprietors to assist those who suffered, and that all rateable property should bear the burden. He contended that in that passage the Chancellor of the Exchequer had admitted that there was a special claim on all persons to assist those who have suffered from the plague. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said further, in his letter, that there was "a special claim on the landlords." But landlords do not share the gains; they do not double the rents in good years; yet he holds that they should bear a portion of the losses. And if, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, all rateable property should be taxed to assist those who suffered from the cattle plague, the burden of such an excessive and widespread calamity is not to be met by any particular class. He quite agreed that the only fair way to meet the difficulty was to indemnify the sufferers by a tax levied on the whole nation. In another document which also appeared in The Times, it was argued that, "When a particular interest suffers it is not just that the whole nation should assist," for, it continued, "the whole country does not share the gain; therefore, it should not share the losses." Now, he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, did the landlord, whom he seemed to think ought to recoup the losses which the farmers suffered from the plague—he asked him, did the landlords share in the gains of the tenant? He certainly did not; for if the tenant had a very good harvest the landlord received only the usual rent, and was in no way benefited by the increased profits of the farmer. By what reasoning, then, could he show that there was "a special claim" upon the landlord? In another portion of the letter they were asked, "Should a fisherman be indemnified for his losses at sea?" This was not a case of a fisherman losing his nets; it was not the case of an individual being injured. A great misfortune had fallen upon an important industry, and the country was bound to come forward to its assistance. This principle cannot be extended to individual cases; for these, in the first place, cannot all be investigated; and, secondly, it is impossible to separate individual shortcomings from unavoidable calamities. Moreover, individuals were essentially different from industries. For if an individual be ruined, the rest of his industry is pro tanto better off, and the nation is not injured. But if an industry be ever so little crippled, the whole nation suffers. Hence you cannot argue from the one to the other. There were now two questions before the House—the first being whether or not the nation was to pay for the cattle killed by the inspectors. He did not believe that any man would deny the national responsibility in this case. The cattle had been slaughtered for the benefit of the nation, and most certainly the nation was bound to pay for them. The second and more important question was—Are the Government bound to recompense the farmers whose stocks have suffered from the ravages of the cattle disease? It was his firm opinion that in the interests of right, justice, and even of expediency the nation should assist those who had suffered by this heavy and unexpected calamity.

MR. CARNEGIE said, with a great portion of the speech of the hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. Banks Stanhope) he fully concurred, particularly when he urged the immediate attention of the Government to this question. But he did not think that either the hon. Member or the noble Lord who had just sat down had done justice to the Government, inasmuch as they appeared to blame them for not having the gift of prophecy. ["No, no!"] It was, however, desirable that they should act upon one uniform system, because, without it, one district might be made to suffer from the conduct or negligence of the magistrates in another. It was owing, in a great measure, to the apathy of the magistrates in Stirlingshire, that the disease had been allowed to spread over the whole of Scotland. It appeared to him to be unfortunate that the measures introduced by the Government, some two years ago, for effecting certain alterations in the cattle plague of this country had fallen through from want of support in that House, and from the stringent opposition of certain bodies who now put themselves prominently forward in asking for the adoption of a measure which they had before opposed. One of those bodies was the Highland Society of Scotland, which had played fast and loose in relation to this matter. He hoped that the Government would act promptly and decisively on this subject. He thought that the proposition made by the hon. Member for North Lincolnshire for a double rate, in order to exempt those who had lost their stock, was objectionable, inasmuch as those who had already suffered by the loss of their cattle would have to pay as well as those who had not suffered any such loss. That would be manifestly unjust. If those who had had the misfortune of losing their stock were not to be compensated, they ought, at all events, to be exempted from future charges made with a view of stamping out the cattle plague.

SIR MATTHEW RIDLEY said, that in the opinion of the majority of those whom he represented, responsibility should have been assumed and action undertaken by the Government at a much earlier period. They were not accused of want of sufficient energy in the earliest period, but improved and uniform arrangements ought to have been enforced by them as soon as the Report of the Cattle Plague Commission was issued. So many different and almost conflicting Orders had been issued by the Privy Council that the justices in construing them had felt themselves exceedingly perplexed. He hoped the Government in future would follow such a line of action as would enable the bench of magistrates to act with confidence. Matters had now reached such a point that in one town with which he was acquainted milk had risen from 6d. to 8d. a quart, and the children of the poor were crying for it, and unable to get it. At any of the local farmers' meetings which he had attended there never had been any suggestion of excluding foreign cattle for the sake of protection to farmers. All that they thought of was the necessity of feeding the people; and even with the improved appliances of scientific husbandry in the present day it was impossible to produce in this country all the food required for the consumption of its inhabitants. He considered that the Government were to blame for having allowed the traffic in the railway trucks to be carried out so long. They were wrong in allowing the transit of hides and offal, and also wrong in not insisting upon the local authorities of certain ports preparing quarantine or probation sheds. The traffic by railways had been one of the most dangerous and difficult elements with which they had had to contend. They desired to see Government take upon itself the line of action which would enable the bench of magistrates to have confidence. The farmers did not regard this as a class question, but as a national one. They said that this was the case of the nation—the sustenance of the people. They did not think that the proper, required, and uniform machinery had been put in motion by the Government. One of the greatest difficulties with which magistrates had to contend was the fact that entirely different regulations prevailed in different counties. The counties of Durham and Northumberland adjoined each other. In the county in which he resided they had adopted the Order enabling sheep to be brought back from turnip pastures in the remoter districts. When these became exhausted a vis of the local magistrate in the district from which they came was required, and also a vis upon their entry into the county. But in Durham, separated from them only by the Tyne, no such Order was in existence, and consequently Lord Durham, one of the largest owners of sheep in that county, when his turnips were out was unable to bring back his sheep except by a very circuitous route. There was one point which he desired to impress very strongly upon the Government—the importance of speedy action. At present he knew of no regulations governing the dimensions of vessels, the number of cubic feet of air, the supply of water, and the supply of forage or provender in the case of animals imported into this country. He would especially call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade to this circumstance. Emigrant vessels, carrying passengers to distant countries or colonies, were closely inspected under the authority of the Board of Trade, and it was his firm conviction that results not less beneficial would follow from surveys of a similar nature imposed by the Government, and vigilantly carried out with regard to all vessels engaged, not only in conveying cattle between Ostend and the eastern coast of this country, but likewise trading between ports in Ireland and the west coast of England. There had been a case to his own knowledge where the plague was brought into this country by cattle coming from Ireland. The hold being full, and the vessel having encountered a stormy passage, the animals lay on the deck ill, and to keep them alive they were occasionally sluiced with cold water. The cattle were disembarked at Port Silloth, and shortly after their arrival two of their number were mixed with other cattle to all appearance healthy. These cattle were bought by one of his tenants, who lost them all. With proper arrangements relating to the transit there would certainly be much less probability of disease; for at present the cattle came over sick, hungry, excited, and faint, and, being driven while in that condition, were most susceptible of infection. If once landed healthy, they could either be quarantined, or, if it was thought more advisable, they could be slaughtered at once. The more rapidly and the more thoroughly the Government recognized and advanced towards the principle of dead-meat markets and dead-meat conveyance the better. Let the utmost possible supply be conveyed by railway trucks in the shape of dead meat. The railways would carry the dead meat at a very little higher rate than that at which cattle were conveyed, and there would be a greater probability of it being conveyed in clean trucks. No such difficulty now existed in the matter as would have had to be encountered some years ago, when railways did not intersect the country. In every part of the country persons might now slaughter on their own premises, and convey the meat to the nearest railway station. As soon as legislation forced the matter on their attention, salesmen would be found to sell the dead meat at a fair rate. Even now this was practised to a limited extent. In vindication of the persons who had been appointed cattle inspectors, he must say that in Newcastle and many other places those officers had taken much pains to disinfect themselves. He had not risen with the object of animadverting strongly on the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, except as regarded what he conceived to be their dereliction of duty in not putting into motion the whole of the machinery at their disposal. Referring to the point of rating suggested by the hon. Member for North Lincolnshire, he believed that, as regarded his own county and other counties, a voluntary rating of the landlord, and a voluntary rating of the tenant, would find favour with them. For himself he would not object to the landlords and the tenants paying in the proportion of each one-half, though he would prefer, perhaps, that two-thirds should be borne by the landlord. Though he could see how there might be a composite rating to include other classes of property, he was disposed to think that at first a rating of landlord and tenant would be sufficient, without including all other classes of property.

Sir Matthew Ridley

MR. HODGKINSON said, that with the light of four months' experience it was very easy to point out how Her Majesty's Government might have done better; but it would be, perhaps, more useful to suggest how they should act in future. Several points had already been suggested for their consideration. There was another which he would take the liberty of mentioning, but which he was afraid would not be very palatable to Members of that House. He alluded to the carrying the infection by foxes. A number of cases had occurred in which it was very difficult to account for the way in which the infection had reached farms. The disease had appeared on farms eight or ten miles distant from the nearest centre of infection, and, as far as could be ascertained, no person had acted as the medium of communicating it. It was his belief that the only satisfactory way of accounting for the disease having reached such farms was by supposing that it had been carried by foxes. He knew that foxes were not in the habit of eating carrion unless it was very fresh; but those acquainted with their habits said they were fond of rolling about in it. As diseased cattle were sometimes buried at no great distance from the surface, and as the blood of those animals was sometimes left about the places where they were killed, it was highly probable that foxes, after rolling themselves in these places, ran here and there spreading the disease. He would be a bold man who in that House should counsel the destruction of foxes; but, at all events, a better system of interment and disinfection than now existed was very desirable, for the reason he had stated. He should also express his earnest hope that the Government would take the earliest means of establishing some system of compulsory assurance. He thought an assessment of cattle themselves would be the most satisfactory and just mode of assessment. The Bill necessary for such an assessment would probably meet with little or no opposition, and might be passed in a few days; but a proposition for assessing all property whatever would be sure to meet with much opposition, and a considerable time must elapse before it could become law. It might be advisable, perhaps, to have three rates of assessment—one for cattle under a year old, another for cattle above a year and under two years, and the third for cattle of two years old and upwards. He thought the rate should be paid by the tenants in the first instance, but that they should be entitled to deduct one-half of it from their landlords; for this was a question which affected landlords as much as it did tenants. As for assessing land, it must be remembered that some occupiers of land—market gardeners and others—had no cattle, and such persons no more ought to be called on to pay the assessment than a man should be who only occupied a house. Certainly some mode of insurance should be adopted, or they could scarcely expect persons to destroy their animals for the public good, unless they were to receive compensation for their loss. If the Government took immediate action in this important question, he believed they would earn the gratitude not only of the agricultural classes, but of the country at large. He wished to point out that the magistrates in petty sessions had issued conflicting orders, which caused great confusion; and he would also remark that the Order of the 3rd of January was not issued till after some of the quarter sessions had been held, and that it necessitated continual adjournments. The Government had neglected one remedy that might have been adopted—namely, the calling together of the Legislature, whose aid was greatly required in such an emergency.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, he wished to point out the exceeding inconvenience to which local authorities were subjected through the Orders in Council. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had called on those authorities to perform duties which would have been more properly discharged by himself. In the first instance, the Orders in Council delegated those duties to the petty sessions. In the two Parliamentary divisions of his (Sir John Trollope's) county there were from eighteen to twenty petty sessions. Each of those sessions issued a separate order, without conference with the others, and much complexity was consequently produced. By a subsequent Order in Council the Government had thought proper to transfer these duties from the petty sessions to the quarter sessions. Great difficulty was experienced in carrying out that Order, as the quarter sessions was a body delegated for criminal and financial purposes only. Besides that, the Order in Council was dated the 3rd of January, whereas the quarter sessions had assembled in his county, and in several other counties, on the first of the same month. The consequence was that unless the sessions had been adjourned from day to day, and from time to time, all power would have ceased until the ensuing quarter. His (Sir John Trollope's) residence was fixed in a peculiar locality. He lived on the confines of three counties, and there were two other counties and a municipal borough within six miles, so that no less than six separate jurisdictions existed within six miles of one another, all issuing separate orders and acting upon different principles. The result is that the occupiers of land were put to very great inconvenience in carrying on their business, many of them holding lands in two or more of these counties. He believed the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) had given notice that he would, on an early day, bring forward some measure in reference to this subject. But he (Sir John Trollope) objected to be governed by Privy Council law. Indeed, he thought it contrary to the Constitution altogether. The Government did not think fit to assemble Parliament for six months after the general election, and during that period no less than eight separate Orders in Council had been issued. If this state of things were continued, we should in time be living under a system similar to the Council of Ten at Venice, or the Star Chamber law of a past generation. It was a neglect, on the part of the Government, not to call the House together. Did the British Parliament ever refuse to act in a moment of emergency? He believed that if they had been summoned in the autumn the country would not have been subjected to the heavy losses which it had sustained, and which had not been averted by the Orders in Council. He could say that the justices in sessions had everywhere endeavoured, to the best of their ability, to act in accordance with the rules laid down by the right hon. Gentleman and the Government, but they had not been sustained by uniformity of purpose at head-quarters, and had not up to the present time had any one to confer with in case they required advice. A number of most influential gentlemen in his (Sir John Trollope's) county asked his hon. Colleague to procure them an interview with the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, in order that they might explain to him the difficulty in which they were placed, and describe the panic in their neighbourhood. The right hon. Gentleman fixed a day on which they were to meet him in London. They accordingly selected six gentlemen of information to explain their views, and these six gentlemen proceeded to town on the day appointed. Now, what happened? The right hon. Gentleman was not to be seen, and they were referred to the permanent Under Secretary, a learned gentleman who transacted the legal business of the Home Office. All he could tell them was that he would duly report their feelings and opinions to his chief; and when they informed him that the difficulty was that cattle not fit to be slaughtered were sacrificed because the Government would not reimburse the owners for their losses, all he could reply was that he had to pay very dear for his butcher's meat in London. That was all the deputation obtained by going to the Home Office. He must assert that the Government had not sympathized with the people in their misery and distress; and now, when it was too late—for around the spot where he lived there were villages which did not contain a hoof or a horn—the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer told the people that they must look to the landlords, their neighbours, and to rateable property. Now, he believed the landlords would meet their tenants and assist them; and he also believed that the tenants would submit to a rate levied upon a principle founded in equity and justice. But they wanted the action of the Government before they could do these things, and, therefore, they came to that House too late, so far as regarded his (Sir John Trollope's) locality. They asked the right hon. Gentleman to lay down some uniformity of principle, and not to delegate powers to quarter sessions or petty sessions, or any other local authority. We had a central authority to look to; we asked those in authority to do something in this matter. A man of religious feeling had said to him that the cattle plague was a chastisement passed upon us for our boast of our unbounded prosperity and wealth. But while not neglecting to implore Divine aid we ought also to look for human assistance, and surely it was to Her Majesty's Government that we ought to look for support. He must again object to the delegation of power to the country justices, who had done the best in their power to meet the emergency, and who had only been confounded by the number of contradictions and apparent inconsistencies in the Orders in Council. In conclusion, he wished to remark that those who were suffering from this great calamity not unnaturally looked for some support from the Government of the country.

MR. BARING said, he was sure that there was no one connected with any of the measures respecting the cattle plague during the last six months, who did not cordially sympathize with that part of the speech just addressed to the House, where the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Trollope) expressed the feeling prevalent in the county which he represented on account of the great and severe losses suffered by the owners of cattle in that county. He (Mr. Baring) was sure there was no one in the House who sympathized more truly and sincerely than himself with those who had suffered, and he was sure that the feelings of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department were the same as his own in this matter. He (Mr. Baring) ought, perhaps, to explain the position of the Home Office in regard to the cattle plague, as that Department had been so particularly alluded to by the noble Lord the Member for Huntingdonshire (Lord Robert Montagu). The whole power possessed by the executive Government in respect of the cattle plague was conferred by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 107—one clause of which Act enabled the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council to make certain orders and regulations. He thought it hardly necessary for him to say in that House, which had for so long a time seen the Secretary of State exercising the functions of his Department, that he was not the man to shrink from any responsibility. When he (Mr. Baring) heard the words "shrinking from responsibility" used in that House, he could not help asking what was the responsibility from which the Government was accused of shrinking. The responsibility of a Minister was responsibility to the House of Commons, and no one could say, after the speeches which had just been delivered, that that responsibility had been evaded. It would, he thought, be seen that very great responsibilities had been accepted in several points, and that experience had shown that the policy pursued was the right one. The noble lord (Lord Robert Montagu), had gone back to the year 1857, and asked why the particular course taken in that year with respect to the importation of foreign cattle had not again been adopted. Now, it was perfectly true that in 1857 the importation of cattle from the Baltic was forbidden by an Order in Council made under the Cattle Importation Act of 1848. The reason why the course referred to could not have been taken on the present occasion was, that it was exceedingly doubtful from what part the cattle plague, if imported into this country at all, was brought. The noble Lord assumed, as a matter of fact, that the disease was introduced by a particular cargo from Revel. The Report of the Royal Commission, to which every possible publicity had been given, did not warrant this conclusion; the Commissioners said that they were unable to express any opinion with regard to the introduction of the disease; and any one who had taken the trouble to go through the evidence could not but indorse what the Commissioners said. Since the publication of the Report, he understood that one of the principal witnesses who supported the theory that the disease had been imported from Revel had contradicted the evidence that he had given. There was no evidence which could be deemed conclusive that the disease was imported from abroad at all, and certainly none that it was imported from Revel. Moreover, before it broke out here there was no evidence whatever that it was raging in the neighbourhood of the Baltic or in any adjacent countries. In order to support the Revel theory it was necessary to suppose that the animals were brought from the south of Russia through St. Petersburg to Revel, for there was no disease in Esthonia or any of the surrounding countries. No step, therefore, could have been taken by the Executive to prohibit the importation of infected cattle from any part of Europe by which this unfortunate outbreak of the cattle plague could have been prevented. Neither the attention of Parliament nor that of Government was called to any impending danger attending the importation of cattle from those countries from which our foreign supplies were drawn. The evidence given to the Commission went to show that foreign cattle had been remarkably healthy, only five animals in a state of disease having been detected in the Metropolitan Cattle Market, which animals came from Holland, a country into which it had been clearly established that the disease had been introduced from this country, so that the only foreign beasts which we knew to have come to England affected by the disease were imported from a country to which we ourselves had communicated it. With reference to other observations of the noble Lord with respect to the action taken by the Government, it might be well to remind the House that in 1864, owing to the danger that had been incurred in 1857 of the introduction of cattle plague into England, his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council on Education (Mr. Bruce) brought forward two Bills—one to amend the law with respect to the importation of diseased beasts, and the other to prevent the spreading of rinderpest and other infectious and contagious diseases. He had the honour to take charge of the two Bills, and to act as Chairman of the Select Committee to which they were referred. That Committee came unanimously to the conclusion that it was not necessary to alter the laws relating to the importation of foreign cattle, but that it was advisable in some degree to relax the precautions which were then taken by the Customs authorities. That Committee consisted almost entirely of Gentlemen representing the agricultural interest, including Sir William Miles, whose absence from the House he regretted, the hon. Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt), the noble Lord opposite the Member for Coker-mouth (Lord Naas), and Mr. Caird, than whom there could not be greater authorities. The recommendation of the Committee was that when a cargo of animals arrived of which one or two were affected with certain diseases, only those animals which were affected should be slaughtered, and the rest should be allowed to go into the market, and be there killed for consumption. In consequence of that recommendation, instructions were issued to the Customs to relax their practice accordingly. Immediately on the breaking out of the cattle plague in this country orders were issued to the Customs at once to revert to the original Order of great stringency, under which they had previously acted, and, in every case in which there was but one diseased animal, or disease of any kind in the cargo imported from abroad, orders were given that the whole was to be detained, the diseased animals killed, and the remainder disposed of in such manner as the Commissioners of Customs might direct. This was the course that was taken with regard to the importation of foreign animals; and he believed that the inspection had been made with the greatest possible vigilance, and that the spread of the disease in this country could in no way be proved to have arisen from the importation of animals from abroad, if, indeed, it was originally imported from abroad, which was by no means proved at the present time. The other Bill introduced in 1864 contained provisions which placed very considerable liability upon the owners of diseased cattle; the owner was not to do certain things which would be likely to carry the disease among the cattle of his neighbours. That Bill was opposed with very considerable vigour by Gentlemen who represented the agricultural interest, and more especially by Gentlemen from the sister island; it was, indeed, mainly owing to the vigorous opposition of the noble Lord the Member for Coker-mouth (Lord Naas) that the Bill was not passed. The Bill went through a Select Committee, and very considerable alterations were made in it. He (Mr. Baring) brought it down from the Committee as amended, but the general feeling in the House was so decidedly against it, and it was so evidently impossible to pass it, that he was obliged to withdraw it. When he said that the Bill received the opposition of the agricultural interest, he should add that some hon. Members supported the main provisions of the Bill, but the opinion of the witnesses who represented the agricultural interest was decidedly adverse. The Committee examined a gentleman deputed by the Farmers' Club, who happened to be their chairman for the year, and who said the farmers had their own remedy, and did not want the Bill at all. He therefore recommended his right hon. Friend not to re-introduce the Bill in the next Session of Parliament, and the subject was left, as it had been before, under a single clause of an Act, which was really an Act to prevent the spread of small-pox among sheep, under which Government had no power to deal with an exceptional state of circumstances. Putting the most liberal construction upon the powers given them by that clause, the Government made some most important general regulations, as to the liability of persons dealing with diseased animals; and he could not but think that in the discussion of that night, as well as in much that had been written on the subject, these general regulations had been lost sight of. They were that a person who had a diseased animal should give notice of it; that he must keep it apart from others; that he must not remove it; that when dead it must be buried in its skin and the place disinfected; and that animals likely to convey infection must not be removed without the licence of a competent authority. Power was also given to slaughter infected animals. To the extent to which these regulations were obeyed, the spread of the disorder was prevented. So far as these regulations went the action had been central, and had not been left to the local authorities; and all these liabilities which did not exist under any law were brought into force by the action of the Government through these general regulations. Other powers had been from time to time intrusted to local authorities by Orders in Council; and, speaking generally, the powers so conferred were the power of stopping public sales of animals in certain districts and the power to prevent the removal of animals from place to place. No doubt there was a very general opinion in certain parts of the country that it would have been better that the Government should have made general regulations on these two points, rather than have left the action to the local authorities; but he could not acquiesce in the statement that the feeling had arisen from the disinclination of local authorities to incur obloquy by exercising their powers. They had not shrunk from the responsibility of exercising those powers. He believed that it would have been extremely difficult, if not impossible, to have stopped markets in a general order, for there was the greatest difference of opinion as to what the order should have been. In some counties it had been considered advisable to stop markets for all animals; in others to stop markets for all cattle, allowing sheep to be sold freely; in other counties the course adopted, and that advocated by many of those who had paid most attention to the subject, was not to stop markets for all cattle, but only for lean and store cattle, so that fat cattle might be driven to market to be sold. The House had been forcibly reminded of this view by an hon. Gentleman who had pointed out that it was more likely the disease could be propagated by butchers going about the country to the beasts than by allowing fat beasts to go to them to be slaughtered. Another alternative suggested was that cattle having been brought to the market should not be allowed to leave its locality alive. Even if the most generally approved of all the alternatives put before the House had been adopted, and all markets excepting markets for fat cattle had been prohibited, and the fat beasts had not been allowed to leave the jurisdiction of the market alive, great inconvenience must have occurred. This could be proved by a single remarkable circumstance:—Liverpool was a great port of importation from Ireland, and if a general order had been given prohibiting any market except a market for fat cattle, and their slaughter within the jurisdiction of the place in which the market was situated, the effect would have been that not a beast which was sold in the Liverpool market could have been brought into that town, for the great market for Liverpool was outside the town, and in the county jurisdiction. Therefore, an order of the description referred to would have prevented any animal being brought from the Liverpool market into the town. An instance of such magnitude must satisfy the House that the Government were right not to have made a general order of this kind, the operation of which would have been so unequal. In regard to this question, it was impossible to consider Great Britain as one place. In every particular district there were different circumstances which must be considered; and if such an order as he had hinted at had been passed, the representatives of the county of Chester, in which the disease had been very virulent, might have come down to the House, and might have said, with a great deal more justice than it had been said in that debate, that the Government had shirked their responsibility, and that they had not dared to carry out the proper measures for preventing the spread of disease in the county of Chester, where no market whatever ought to be permitted. He asked any Member of the House who could do so to recommend to the Government any course which could be adopted with respect to the stoppage of markets, such as could be adopted with respect to the whole country. With respect to the removal of animals, the order which gave power to local authorities to make regulations had doubtless met with much disapproval, in consequence of the different regulations made by different local authorities, which must, in some cases, have caused considerable public inconvenience. He was not surprised, therefore, at hearing all this general outcry about conflicting orders; for people would naturally say, "Let us have a general order, and then we shall know what to do." He would, however, seriously ask the House, or some hon. Member of it, what this general order was to be with respect to the removal of cattle? A great part of Scotland and many parts of England were but slightly affected by the disorder. In Hampshire, Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, and Devonshire, there had been but few and isolated cases, and there were only two counties in Wales in which there had been any case at all; and he would ask any hon. Gentleman on the opposite side of the House to say what kind of general order the Government could have made. Could they have adopted the recommendation of the majority of the Royal Commission, and prohibited absolutely all movement of cattle? He wished to express the obligations they were all under for the great amount of attention the Royal Commissioners had given to this subject, and for the valuable Report they had presented. But he must say that that proposal would not have stopped the cattle plague and was quite impracticable; for no practical man would assert that the change from a trade in live cattle to one in dead meat could have been made all at once. But, besides, it would have broken down altogether with regard to foreign cattle. Every beast that came from abroad would have to be slaughtered at the place where it landed. ["Hear, hear!"] He quite understood that cheer. It meant that was a provision which it would be quite proper to make. He would not dispute that proposition; there was a great deal to be said in its favour, and it was one of those things which the House would have to consider when they came to the question what legislation should take place with regard to the importation of foreign stock. But he would venture to affirm that such a change as that could not take place at a moment's notice. To have passed an edict of such a kind would have forced foreign cattle to be brought to a place where they could not be slaughtered except under the greatest disadvantages and with the greatest loss. The importers suffering loss, importation would have diminished or ceased for the time. While half the supply of meat for the London market was furnished by beasts from abroad, no Government would have dared to take a step which would have thus annihilated the foreign cattle trade. He quite agreed, therefore, with the remarks made by the minority of the Commissioners, who, it might be said, without offence to the others, were the most practically acquainted with the matter, that the absolute prohibition of all movement of cattle was impracticable. He could conceive no general order with respect to removals which would receive the approbation of the House, and he should like that any hon. Gentleman should propose such an order. There was hardly a county, or extensive district in the country, which was not placed in different circumstances from others. Take Cheshire, for example, where the outbreak had been as fatal as it had been 150 years ago, and compare it with the counties which are but slightly affected. In Hampshire, the prohibition of the removal of sheep would be attended with serious difficulty, while in other counties it would be a matter of small moment. There would then be the greatest possible difference of opinion with respect to the animals to which a general order should apply. Where any outbreak of the disease had occurred it would, perhaps, be right to prohibit altogether the removal of cattle in places adjacent; but differences of opinion would prevail in proportion to the nearness or distance of the different parts of the county from the source of contagion. All the arguments which he had used with respect to markets applied with double force to removals. But it might be said, "So far we agree with you, and see that no uniform order could be issued, but that is not what we ask. We ask that the Government should do something, that they should issue an order which would do more than the present orders, and then let them allow the local authorities to enforce or relax such order, according to the different circumstances of the district." But he would say, in reply, that that was nothing more than local action under another form. ["No, no!"] In what respect did it differ? If they gave local authorities power to alter an order, it was the same as if they had local authority pure and simple. Suppose there was a general order that no animal should be removed from one place to another, and the local authorities could relax it, and allow animals to be removed, why that was nothing but local action. If a mild general order were issued, and local authorities were allowed to make it more stringent, then the whole obloquy of the transaction would be thrown on those authorities, and people would be able to say that the precautions which the Government considered to be sufficient for the whole country were, in the arbitrary opinion of certain gentlemen, representing certain interests, not deemed sufficient for the district over which they had control. For these reasons, he affirmed that it was impossible to imagine or devise any general regulations with respect, first, to the prohibition of markets, and, secondly, to the removal of cattle, which would be applicable to the whole country. He would not refer to many smaller points raised in the debate, but would notice two attacks made by the noble Lord the Member for Huntingdonshire (Lord Robert Montagu), upon the propriety of the Government's ordering the slaughter of infected animals, and of their forbidding the importation of cattle into Ireland. The best proof of the advisability of the first step was that since the power had been withdrawn the number of cases of disease had greatly increased, and it had been shown in Aberdeen and elsewhere that the power of slaughter vigorously exercised had been the only means in which, in the present state of knowledge, the spread of this grievous calamity could be checked. The principle of slaughter is now generally approved. As to the precautionary measures taken to prevent the spread of the disease into Ireland, he believed that in taking the steps they did the Government had the full approval of the Members from that country. Hon. Gentlemen talked of Irish Members waiting on the Home Secretary with reference to this subject. He denied that statement on the authority of the right hon. Gentleman himself—no Irish Member had waited on him. [Viscount CRANBOURNE: Was there any such with the Lord President?] He would pass that by; he had no knowledge upon the subject. The hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. Banks Stanhope) had made two distinct propositions: that all railway traffic should be suspended, and that every beast imported into the country should be slaughtered where it lands. He would now draw the attention of the House to the effects which would follow the carrying out of those propositions. The cattle trade between England and Ireland was principally carried on through Liverpool. Dealers from Liverpool purchased the cattle in Ireland, brought them to Liverpool, and they were then distributed among the great markets of the north of England. If the proposals of the hon. Member were carried into effect, it would entirely destroy the great cattle trade of Liverpool. Such regulations would result in seriously diminishing the supply of food for the people. Among other evil effects it would convert the London cattle trade, which was at present a trade in live cattle, into a trade in dead cattle; a change which might have the most serious results. At present, the dead-meat markets were very deficient in accommodation. But supposing that by some enchanter's wand suitable dead-meat markets for the metropolis were to arise, what would be the effect upon the public? According to the present system, beasts, though they might be brought to market, need not be slaughtered, unless there was a sufficient demand for meat. But in the case of dead meat consigned from the country to a London salesman, there would be no similar opportunity of holding over the article. It would be perishable, and must be disposed of whatever the sacrifice. All that persons in the country would know on the subfect would be the quotations from the best market prices, and if these were high, a glut of dead meat would be thrown on the market, only to be got rid of at very low prices. This would be followed by a deficient supply, and a rise in price most serious to the consumer. The fluctuation of prices entailed by these transactions would be an injury quite as serious in its way as many of the evils which were now complained of. He contended that neither the absolute prohibition of cattle traffic on railways, nor yet the slaughter of cattle at the place where they land, could be carried into effect at the present moment. Well, if they could not be carried into effect now, they clearly could not have been carried into effect at any earlier period. What, therefore, became of all the blame which had been thrown on the Government by the hon. Member for North Lincolnshire and others? The hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Dent) recommended the adoption of the system of slaughter as the only remedy within his experience likely to be efficacious, and held that the Government ought to give effect to the recommendations of the minority of the Royal Commissioners. But although among the Commissioners there were many and great differences of opinion, upon one point they were all agreed, and that was in condemning the system of slaughter. One of the recommendations of the minority of the Commission was to the effect that a greater distinction should be drawn between infected and uninfected districts. The spirit of that recommendation had been carried out by giving to the local authorities power to apply the next effectual remedy to slaughter—that of isolation. Was not the power better placed in their hands than in the hands of a central authority? How was it possible for a central authority to act with the same knowledge and effect as persons upon the spot and well acquainted with the locality? No doubt, in the present state of the law, there was great difficulty in assembling a quarter sessions for such purposes as were here contemplated; and in any legislation upon the subject it deserved consideration whether power might not be given to summon a special sessions, and also to delegate the authority of the quarter sessions to committees able to exercise this in their own particular districts, thereby combining the beneficial influences of one jurisdiction with the personal supervision of the other. In a matter of so great difficulty as this question of the cattle plague no one could be foolish enough to assert that every step taken at every moment by the Government was right, and, with the information which we now possessed, that no change could with advantage be made. But, looking broadly at the question, and taking the general attack made against the Government to be that they shrank from responsibility, and that they ought to have issued general regulations applicable to the whole country, he entirely denied the justice of it. So far from being open to that charge they had acted upon the clauses of a Bill conferring on them little real power and affording but very slight foundation for the powers which they assumed to place grave liabilities upon individuals, and heavy penalties attached to their non-observance. They took what, with our present knowledge, must be regarded as the proper step of enjoining the immediate slaughter of infected animals. In doing this they assumed grave responsibility, and took a step so much in advance of public opinion at the time that it was actually disapproved by the public, and by the Royal Commissioners. After such a step, could the House any longer allege that the Government shrank from responsibility? The Government did not feel themselves at liberty to make a General Order applicable to the whole country, because they were bound to consult the general advantage of all classes; to remember, moreover, that this question touched the supply of food; and they were even bound, among other considerations, to look to the interests of the owners of cattle themselves. By affecting to give stringent general orders, but allowing local authorities to modify them, or by affecting to pursue a very mild course themselves, leaving it to the local authorities to give to the rules a more stringent application, the Government might, indeed, have shielded themselves from responsibility. But they shrank from no responsibility, being satisfied that the course which they took was the right course, and that such orders ought to be left to local bodies acquainted with all the varying circumstances of the different parts of Great Britain. In certain portions of the country—in Ireland and parts of Scotland especially—the action of the Government had been successful. If it were contended that they had not been successful with regard to England, he replied that there were circumstances under which no Government action could be successful. Even with such centralized action as one hon. Member seemed to desire, it was difficult to discover what more could have been accomplished by the Government. If we were to act upon the principles which other countries had adopted, we must be prepared to carry out more stringent measures than anyone had yet suggested. We must be prepared to adopt an honest "stamping out" process like that resorted to in particular districts of Prussia. A cordon must be drawn round the infected district, kept by troops, and not a man, not a dog, not even a bird must be allowed to leave the district alive for a certain time. That would be the only effective mode of stamping it out. If any Government could do that it might possibly be stamped out, except, indeed, it could be carried with the air, as the Royal Commissioners say it could be, in which case even that system would not do. But he believed that, if anything short of such a measure could have any success, it was the power to slaughter combined with isolation. He hoped when the Bill of the Government was brought in—to which he refrained from alluding now, because his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary would have to do so when introducing it on another day—hon. Members would see that the Government had every determination to adopt the most effective measures in their power for the future. The Government had failed from no want of assiduity—no want of sympathy with the sufferers—no indifference to the agricultural interest now so much afflicted. No class in the country could be indifferent on a question which had so close a relation to the roast beef of old England. They would do their best, and trust to the decrees of Providence and the mutual action of all classes in the country for success.

MR. LOWE: I wish, Sir, that my hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Home Department had confined himself to a defence of the Government, and had not thought it necessary, in support of his case, to treat in the manner he has done the Report of the Cattle Plague Commission, because he has obliged me to make statements, and go into matters, which certainly I never would have dreamt of entering upon in this debate. The cattle plague made its appearance in the London market on the 19th of June. I do not know how it got there, and I do not think we have any evidence on the point; but there it was. The Government heard of it in the beginning of July, and made some Orders in Council. The first Order they made was a matter which occupied so much attention that Lord Palmerston and Lord Cranworth came up for the occasion, no other Member of the Government being here to look after it. In the beginning of October they appointed a Royal Commission, on which I had the honour to serve. But I do not think they possessed any knowledge of the real nature of the disease, at least any knowledge that could be relied on. Now, it is not difficult to show that they ought to have possessed that knowledge, and that the appointment of the Commission was therefore wholly unnecessary. The question, when we came to examine it, was found exceedingly simple. It was this—Was the disease then raging in England identical with the Steppe murrain or not? If it were once shown that they were identical, no further inquiry was needed, as no disease had been more thoroughly studied and was better known than the Steppe murrain. A Commission of Inquiry into the Steppe murrain would have been like a Commission of Inquiry into the small-pox or measles. The whole question, then, was whether the disease was identical with the Steppe murrain. Now, was it creditable to the Government that they did not take steps to ascertain whether the two diseases were identical before the disease had been for three months raging in this country? The Government had at their command all the medical ability which they might choose to employ, and they were particularly fortunate because they had in Mr. Simon, the Medical Officer of the Privy Council, a gentleman of the highest attainments, and who was the greatest authority with regard to the cattle plague, which he had made the subject of his particular study. The Cattle Plague Commissioners called him before them, by his evidence they were mainly guided, and that evidence has turned out to be an almost exact prognostication of everything that has happened since it was given in October last. The Government, then, were peculiarly well furnished with advice. Well, what did they do? Why, they did not summon that gentleman at all. He has never had any voice in their dealing with this matter, which they have withdrawn wholly from his cognizance, and placed in the hands of a veterinary surgeon, Mr. Simonds, an able man no doubt, but a gentleman who would not think for a moment of comparing himself with Mr. Simon. If they had consulted Mr. Simon as we did they would have got his evidence as we did, and that evidence would have left no doubt that the two diseases were identical. We thought, at first, that there was a great deal of evidence on each side, and that it was our business to hear evidence on both sides. But we could only get one witness, and he was a butcher, to say that the disease was not highly contagious. The absolute identity of the two diseases was established, and also the applicability to England of those precautions which a long and melancholy experience has demonstrated to be necessary in countries to the East of Europe. We set to work on the 10th of October, and our Report is dated the 31st. It must be admitted that we lost no time, especially if it be considered that we started in a state of total ignorance, and heard the jobbers and persons who dealt in cattle, and whose evidence, as we were going to interrupt their trade, we were bound to hear, though we might not attach great weight to what was said by them under such circumstances. In the first few days we got a pretty clear view of the real nature of the disease and the only remedy to be applied. Now if we could do that, why could not the Government do it; or, if they did not choose to do it, might they not have refrained from making reflections on us who did their work? My hon. Friend (Mr. Baring) states that the Report shows that there was a difference of opinion among the Commissioners, and, after exaggerating it, tries to shelter the Government behind it. That, however, will be of little avail. The state of opinion in the Commission was this:—The majority and the minority both agreed that the real remedy for preventing the progress of the disease was the stoppage altogether of the removal of cattle from one locality to another. There was no difference of opinion on that point, and I am speaking in the presence of a noble Lord (Viscount Cranbourne) who was a distinguished member of the minority. The second point in which we were all entirely agreed was, that whatever was to be done—whether the larger measure, of which the majority approved, or the less stringent one, advocated by the minority, should be adopted—the action of the central Government was necessary, and nothing ought to be left to the local authorities. What we really differed about appears at this distance of time to be a very small matter. It could perhaps best be described as a matter of temporary expediency. The majority thought it expedient to recommend what we all agreed was the real remedy, though some of us may have felt not much confidence in its being carried out. The minority thought that it was better to modify the proposition so as to make it more acceptable to the public, not because they liked the modified proposition better than the other, but because they deemed it more calculated to meet the public mind. The House, therefore, will now be able to judge how far my hon. Friend is justified in sheltering himself behind the minority. The course adopted by the Government is entirely condemned both by the majority and by the minority of the Commission, and there was no one on the Commission who supported it except Mr. Maclean, the engineer, who thought it unnecessary to do anything at all. Well, what did the Government do? We reported on the 31st of October, and after a waste of three weeks of infinitely precious time they give jurisdiction to petty sessions, and shortly afterwards they extend that jurisdiction to quarter sessions, and so in substance the matter rests now. I did not come here to-night to criticize or to condemn the conduct of the Government, but I have been urged to say what I think on the subject. I am not going to re-open the controversy before the Commission. It would be most indecorous for me, and for the noble Lord (Viscount Cranbourne), to take advantage of the position we occupy here to fight those battles over again. I say, then, that the Commission was right in their recommendation that a central authority ought to act in the matter, not because I have fallen in love with despotism, but because there is nothing despotic in delegating power to the only persons competent to act. The rule is simple. Matters of public interest, in which the whole community is directly interested, ought to be left to the central authority, whereas matters in which the general public is not directly concerned ought to be left to the local authorities. Now, what was this cattle plague? Had it been epizootic merely, spreading in certain districts, and influenced by climate and local circumstances not likely to go beyond those districts, I can quite understand that it would be perfectly right to leave it to be dealt with by the local authorities. But is this disease of such a nature? It is exactly the contrary. Every part of England is interested in the suppression of the disease in every other part of England. One day it is at the Land's End, and the next at John o'Groat's. I believe I may say that the London market is one day infected, Edinburgh and Plymouth the next. Had Edinburgh and Plymouth, then, no interest in the conduct of the local authorities in London at that time? And, if so, how can we reconcile it to ourselves that these things should be left to the discretion of local authorities? My hon. Friend (Mr. Baring) spoke of the trade of Liverpool; has he read what The Times said this morning about the cattle at Kirkdale market, where hundreds of cattle had been refused admission because though branded, they had no pass? Did my hon. Friend read about the state of the neighbourhood of Bristol, where there was one set of rules for the county of Somerset, another set for Bristol, and a third for Gloucester? Does my hon. Friend think that is the way to check a calamity which has, at any rate, this recommendation—that its action is uniform? Could my hon. Friend expect that a great and general calamity like this would be cured by piecemeal and parti-coloured legislation? If the rule was to be loose here and tight there, such contrariety and uncertainty must necessarily lead to discontent. It is clear to me that you have no right to impose those restrictions on one part of the country unless you can make up your minds to impose them upon all. Each man will cheerfully submit to great inconvenience for the sake of others only when he finds persons submitting to great inconvenience for his sake. I therefore think there never was a case more clearly made out than that if Government interference was required there should be a central authority. My hon. Friend says he does not approve of our preventing traffic, as the disease might be carried by birds. Well, perhaps even a fly might carry it; but we must deal with this question as practical men, and not as mere theorists. De minimis non curat lex. Practically it is conveyed by the cattle, and if the principal cause be suppressed, there is no reason to doubt that the spread of the disease would be checked and prevented. My hon. Friend has talked much about responsibility, but he has not considered that on the Government devolved

the responsibility of dealing with this calamity in the first instance, a responsibility which it cannot shake off. But how do the Government meet it? By avoiding it. When the calamity becomes worse they seek out persons to deal with the subject, and when those persons make up their minds for them they, by partially adopting the plan those persons suggest for themselves with responsibility for the inadequate local means they choose to employ, I misunderstand the functions of Government if it is to stand by quietly amid such a calamity, and, when the calamity increases, to delegate its functions to others. Look at the case of Berkshire. Two lines of railway traverse it from north to south and from east to west. The calamity showed itself in the eastern part of the county. By timely measures the disease has been kept away, there are no deaths among the cattle, and I am informed that the county, except in Windsor where a different local authority rules, is free from cattle disease at this moment. The whole stress of my hon. Friend's argument was that what was recommended by the Commission was full of mischief to trade and a hardship to everybody. No one can doubt that such a thing is difficult to arrange; but what I complain of my hon. Friend is that I could not gather from what he said that he ever pictured to himself what the real state of the calamity was. I appeal to the House with the utmost confidence whether if our recommendations had been adopted, even after four precious months had been lost, it might not probably have stopped this disorder. But I must say that we have by no means the same confidence now. It is one thing to stop a disease in its nascent state; it is another thing to stop it when it has acquired 14,000 centres of infection, when it has spread to every county in England, and when the air has become loaded with volumes of polluted matter. It is quite right we should struggle against it now with our whole force, and try every measure we can think of, but the prospect is now dark and unpromising. I hope the House will do the Commission the justice to believe that what they recommended might at first have been effectual. We cannot say that it will avail now. Our advice was difficult to carry out, and the Government would not take the responsibility. That, Sir, I will say was a responsibility indeed.

MR. HENLEY: Sir, after the admirable speech of the right hon. Gentleman it will be only necessary for me to say a few words. There is no doubt the difficulties of the subject are very great. I am not going to conceal that for one moment. Neither am I going to be led away into the discussion as to whether this disease came from Revel, or whether it was generated in Hampstead in the cow-sheds of the President of the Council. No doubt in the month of July, if not in June, the fact was reported to the Government that the disease was in London. That, I believe, cannot be controverted. The only question is, whether it was certainly known to be the true rinderpest. I agree that the Government might have known this if they did not. Well, what was the course they took? Of all the statements I ever heard to show the utter weakness and shrinking from responsibility of Government, that made by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary (Mr. Baring) is the most extraordinary. For what did he say? He stated that there were innumerable difficulties in dealing with the question of stopping the importation of foreign cattle, and innumerable difficulties in following the recommendation of the Commission. What was his difficulty in following the recommendation of the Commission? Why, that it was not a perfect remedy; and as this disease might be carried by the air, therefore they would not be justified in adopting it. Now that reasoning, if it comes to anything, comes to this—that it is idle to take any remedy at all if it be not entirely perfect. The hon. Gentleman said, “What! will you have a perfect cordon of soldiers as in Prussia, for if you don’t do that you do nothing.” Still, he talks of the responsibility of the Government. He further said, “The best thing we could do was to order the cattle to be killed.” But how long did the Government maintain that order? What sort of resolution must they have on the subject. Why did they not stand to their guns? If they were right in their opinion, why did they not stick to it like men, and see whether it did any good or no? I am quite prepared to admit that all these things were tentative. There is one other point I wish to state, and it is this:—A great deal has been said by the Under Secretary about the impossibility of making general orders; but he did not touch upon the subject at all whether the Government had power under the Acts of Parliament to delegate to other persons the authority which Parliament had given to them. I am not learned in the law, but I very much doubt if those orders had gone to the Queen’s Bench whether that point would not have been raised. If their construction of the law be the true one the Poor Law or any other Board might authorize the thousand and one authorities in the country to act in their place. But what was the argument of the Under Secretary? That they could not make general orders. But why not make particular orders. Surely if they could give power to a thousand local authorities to make these orders, inconvenient as they were, and to a very great degree without benefit, they might have applied themselves to make them, as they had a knowledge of the whole subject to which the local authorities could not pretend. Surely they might have made those particular orders which, with their knowledge of the subject, might have been so framed as to avoid the inconveniences and confer greater benefits than could possibly arise from such orders as a thousand different authorities were at liberty to frame. As to the difficulty of making those orders in that part of the country where I live, I believe in every case where power was given by the Government, the local authorities did everything they could under the circumstances. But what benefit was it to us when here, from Copenhagen Fields, a well known centre of infection, every week was vomited forth cattle to every county. It was through that means, and no other, that Oxfordshire and Buckinghamshire were infected. Not that diseased cattle were sent down because butchers would not buy them, if they knew it, but they bought cattle in Copenhagen Fields, and brought them down to kill them, and thus spread the infection like a stone dropped into a pond. If the Government had taken a waterpot with a large rose in their hands and watered the country for the purpose of spreading the infection they could not have done it more effectually. What was the power they gave to the local authorities? First and foremost, we had inspectors who did not know much about the disease, never having seen it. They did neither harm nor good. Next came stopping fairs; but what was the use? The only effect was this:—Butchers went up to London, and the danger was incurred of bringing the infection from

Copenhagen Fields. The next measure was to give us authority to stop beasts coming into our districts. Such a measure was something the same as if the Government had taken a bottle of quick-silver and thrown it down, and said, "Stop it from going into your district." While Copenhagen Fields were sending hundreds of thousands of cattle over the country there was no chance but that the disease would spread as it had spread. Were it not that the Under Secretary had put the thing in such an extraordinary manner, I should not have said a single word; but he challenged opinion in such a way that I could not help making these observations. I think the Government, if they had not sufficient nerve to enable them to do what was necessary in these matters, should have called Parliament together. There never was a time in which everybody through the length and breadth of the land was more disposed to give their support to the Government without question. But really the Government did nothing. I do not hesitate to say that virtually they did nothing. They had the means of getting general information, and in giving their particular orders they could ascertain how they should act, and yet all that they did was to hand over to local authorities that power which Parliament had intrusted to them. What was the necessary course for the Government? They were obliged to publish in the Gazette their Orders in Council. There was some time lost in that way, and the local authorities had to meet and to publish their regulations in the local papers before they had the force of law, and so more time was lost. I believe that down to the present time property amounting to £1,500,000 or nearer £2,000,000 has gone, absolutely gone, without any benefit to anybody. On the former occasion the disease lasted twelve years; and if it is to go on so long now, it is very difficult for me, not having passed an examination before the Civil Service Commissioners, to count up what will be the cost to the whole country. I have heard the Under Secretary stating that possible annoyances and possible stoppages to trade might take place if such and such a thing had been done; but he said not one single word of the unfortunate people who had been put to so much trouble all over the country by the local justices making orders, sometimes contradictory and sometimes against persons not connected with their neighbourhood. The Government seem to feel very much with respect to inconveniences to trade, but they do not seem to care one farthing about inconvenience to the general trade of the country. I cannot understand why the Government could not stop all cattle from going out of London which has a large market and excellent means of slaughtering beasts. I believe if Copenhagen Fields and one or two such places had been isolated in such a way for the first two months the disease would have been stopped. The fact is, if we had had no Government at all we should have been as well off. The hon. Secretary of State has pointed out the difficulties which would attend the course proposed to be pursued; but I would ask the Government, this House, and the country, what is the use of a Government if they do not meet these difficulties—if they are not prepared to take the lead instead of leaving to the local authorities the task of grappling with so fearful a malady? The real use of a Government is, that the greater the difficulty is the greater is the power shown by the Government in dealing with it. That cannot be said in the present instance. There may be more reasons why it is so than meet the eye. The death of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston), whom we all deplore, no doubt paralyzed the Government to a certain extent; but, whenever the history of this time comes to be written, it must be stated that what the Government did in this crisis was nothing, and that they handed over to a thousand authorities in the country the work and the business which they ought to have carried out themselves.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: I would not have risen if I had seen any indication of an intention on the part of any occupant of the Treasury Bench to rise and address the House. It appears to me that not only was the Government prepared to inflict the greatest injury to the agricultural interest that they have suffered for the last century, but to treat with something like contempt their complaints. I do not intend to trouble the House at any length, for I feel that these matters as to the cattle disease, which are of so much importance to the occupiers of land, had better be dealt with by those who represent counties in this House. I wish to advert, however, to the conduct of the Government during this disease. If I understand the Under Secretary, there is still lurking in the mind of the Government an idea that this rinderpest is not strictly a contagious disease, but that it originated in England. It is the unanimous opinion of all the scientific men who have examined the question in England, and of those who have had the opportunity of accumulating evidence upon the Continent, that the rinderpest is indigenous to the Steppes of Russia; that when it wanders beyond those limits it is carried by contagion, and that the contagion is more rapid and sudden than in any other case with which the science of medicine is acquainted. It was reported to the Government on the 10th of July, by their own veterinary officer, that this terrible scourge was in the country, and they were not in a state of profound ignorance as to the nature of the plague. The thing had been well studied by persons whose information was transferred to Government. Professor Simonds had made a prolonged journey, had collected evidence on the subject, and made every inquiry in the county where this disease originated. He laid his information before the Government, and so much was the attention of the Government drawn to the disease that when the report was spread in 1864 that the Austrian army had brought it into Schleswig-Holstein, and that there was danger of its coming by importation from that country, they caused a special inquiry into the truth of that report. It is perfectly clear, then, that when the attention of the Government was called to this disease they possessed the best information on the subject. It was not an unknown disease. The period of its existence on the Continent it is impossible to say; but it had been studied and had been the subject of most careful and scientific research, and Her Majesty's Government had all the accumulated experience of some of the best men of science England could furnish, to instruct them as to the symptoms, the rapid spread, and the certain results of the disease. It is impossible, then, to accord to Her Majesty's Government the plea of ignorance to excuse their conduct with regard to this disease. On the 10th of July they were informed of its existence; but, as the House has been informed, they took no action until the 24th, and then it was only to give orders that every person having cattle afflicted with the disease should give notice to the inspector. It was not until the 11th of August that they gave any powers to the local authorities. On the 23rd of November they gave full powers to the petty sessions; but it was not until January that they gave full powers to the quarter sessions, and up to the present time no sufficient action has been taken by the central authorities. One thing stands out very prominently with regard to this subject—namely, that Her Majesty's Government have not been able to exercise the slightest influence in checking or controlling this disease. It has increased in something like a geometrical ratio, and according to the last Returns 100,000 heads of cattle have fallen victims to the ravages of the disease. Now, the question we have to ask ourselves is, whether any measures the Government could have taken would have had the effect of stopping this fearful calamity under which the country labours; and it seems to me that the only mode of solving that question to our satisfaction is to ask ourselves whether, in any other country simultaneously with our own, any measures have been taken which have had the effect of checking the disease. Now, I have to bring before the House a different picture with respect to results in the case of Belgium from our own. And I select Belgium for a particular reason. We have heard a great deal from Her Majesty's Government about the free institutions of this great country, and I think they have had to bear a great deal more than they need. When Members of the Government do not do what is expected of them we are told that it is one of the drawbacks of the Constitution, and that we in London can supply illustrations in reference to it. Whenever it is urged that the Government ought to have been more rapid and prompt in action we are told that it is only the quality of despotism to be prompt in action, and that if we wish to escape from despotism we must submit to such little inconveniences as having our cattle by the 100,000 die of the disease. That may not be the case in Prussia, Austria, or France, where the action of the Government is quite prompt, and where they have no notion of dallying with a public grievance. But setting aside the despotism of Austria, Prussia, and France, I ask the attention of Parliament to the conduct of a Government as free as our own—where the Parliamentary system exists in its full vigour, and where, to use an expression familiar and agreeable to hon. Gentlemen opposite, a strong Liberal Government is in office. Now, this strong Liberal Government does not sit still in the face of so great a calamity. I have in my hand a report presented in November last by the Minister of the Interior of Belgium to the House of Representatives. In it he states that the disease was introduced in Belgium from Holland, and since it has been discovered that it was introduced on the 16th August. It does not, however, appear to have come officially to the knowledge of the Government until the 28th August. Before that they had heard rumours of its existence, and they had issued orders to prevent the importation of cattle from England. On the 29th August, as soon as they heard of the existence of the disease, without losing a day they stopped the importations, and on the 3rd September all importations from any country. On the 22nd September they stopped all fairs and markets throughout the country, so far as they were connected with the sale of store stock. Fat cattle were still allowed to be sold, on condition that they carried a certificate that they came from a district not infected by disease. At the same time, which was most important, they offered ample compensation to all who declared the existence of the disease (under severe restrictions certainly, to prevent abuse), and ordered the slaughter of the cattle. They gave more than the absolute value of the cattle, an idea almost enough to terrify the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) into a fit. Now, what was the result of these prompt proceedings? Between 600 and 700 heads of cattle were the whole of their losses, and the expense incurred somewhere between £4,000 and £5,000. And with the exception of one or two cases in the neighbourhood of Antwerp on the Dutch frontier, where they were exposed to the contagion, the disease was swept out of the country, although it had appeared in all parts of it. Belgium is at present entirely free from the cattle plague. The plague has, in fact, been completely stamped out in a very short space of time, and at a very trifling expense. Such was the result of the prompt and decisive action of a Liberal Government in a constitutional country. Now, Sir, I say that the responsibility which the Government has assumed in this case by the extreme timidity of its action has been very serious indeed. The question of compensation is one of the most serious questions that can present itself to the House of Commons. As a general rule it is far from a sound principle—it is the reverse of it—that any individual business should be reimbursed out of the proceeds of the general taxation of the country. The rule is that if the acts of the Government cause individual loss it shall be reimbursed out of the public Treasury. If, therefore, the Government undertakes the functions of Parliament, without calling Parliament together, and without taking proper measures to avert the evil, it then becomes a serious question whether or not they have incurred pecuniary liability to those who suffer by its neglect. I do not know in what way the House will deal with that question. It is a very serious one, and I can understand the discontent and heart-burnings which exist in different parts of the country in consequence of it. The responsibility of this calamity rests on those who declined to check it. If the Government had in July last, in August, even if when the Commission reported, they had acted with one-half the vigour, decision, and discretion exhibited by the Liberal Government of Belgium, the farmers of the country would never have suffered as they now are suffering. The entire means of existence of numbers have been destroyed because there have been placed in high official position men unable to meet the responsibilities entailed by the offices which they hold.

MR. WILLIAM LESLIE said, that in the county which he represented, and to which several times allusion had been made (Aberdeenshire), they had, on the breaking out of the disease, slaughtered all cattle attacked by the plague. They made a rate which was divided equally between proprietors and tenants, and they were thus enabled to treat with every individual case that was presented to them, and to make such arrangements with the owners of stock that they were enabled to stamp out the disease. This plan had proved entirely successful, and they had succeeded in effectually checking the further progress of the disease in their county. He was not inclined to coincide with those who appeared disposed to blame Her Majesty's Government. He considered that the course which Her Majesty's Ministers had taken was the one befitting the free institutions of their country. The Orders in Council enabled the petty sessions throughout the country to take the proper steps to crush out the cattle plague in their respective districts. Those steps had been taken in Aberdeen, as he could testify, with the most perfect success, and if they had not been taken in other parts of the country, it certainly was not the fault of the Government. The Government was asked why they did not call Parliament together last autumn. He believed that had the Government done so, such was then the temper of the public mind on the subject, Parliament would not have passed any Resolution calculated to place serious restrictions on the cattle trade. He asked what would have been gained by calling together Parliament to pass some half-hearted measure that would have proved utterly ineffectual to check the spread of the cattle disease. As a Member of the Select Committee on the Bill which had been referred to, he must say he thought that Her Majesty's Government were justified in thinking that the late Parliament were of opinion that there should be no interference with the trade of the country. The Bill was withdrawn under circumstances which had been referred to; and, as a perfectly independent Member, he bore testimony to the fact of Her Majesty's Government having done all that was necessary under the circumstances. At the same time, as the representative of a large agricultural constituency, he begged to impress upon Her Majesty's Government the necessity of immediate action in this matter. He repeated that immediate action was highly desirable, and he trusted that Her Majesty's Government would lose no time in introducing a concise but stringent measure.

Srs GEORGE GREY: It is impossible, Sir, to overrate the gravity and importance of the subject that we have for some hours been debating. The ravages caused by the distemper which has now been prevailing for some time in this country fell, in the first instance, on the agricultural interest, or rather on portions of the agricultural interest, in particular districts of the country, with great severity; but there can be no doubt whatever that every class of the community has a deep interest in the preservation of that great article of food which enters so largely into general consumption. I am not, therefore, surprised to find that the debate on the Address has been almost exclusively confined to this subject. Looking to the multiplicity of topics embodied in the Speech from the Throne, I thought it not improbable that some others might be alluded to, upon which the House might expect me to say something. I therefore reserved myself for that purpose, but as I understood from the noble Lord the Member for Stamford that he considered the debate was closing without my having addressed the House, I am quite ready, under these circumstances, to make a few observations. I think no Member of Her Majesty's Government can complain of the tone or spirit in which the hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. Banks Stanhope) brought this subject before the House, and the House and the Government are alike indebted to him for the frank declaration of his own opinion, as well as for the suggestions which have been offered with regard to any Bill to be submitted to the House. I will not myself enter into that subject or express any opinions upon the suggestions which have been thrown out, because the proper time for discussing them will be when I ask leave to bring in a Bill on the subject, a proposal which I shall make on an early day. But to deal with a few of the objections which have been raised in the course of this debate. Several Gentlemen have implied that the Government were open to censure because they did not at once issue Orders in Council absolutely prohibiting the importation into this country of cattle from any other country. I must say that at no period since it was first ascertained that the disease existed in this country would the Government have been justified in taking such a course, though under an Act of Parliament they had clearly power, if they thought proper, to prohibit the importation of foreign cattle. The matter formed the subject of anxious deliberation, and I do not wish at all to evade the responsibility attaching personally to myself. But I may observe, that in the Act of Parliament no power is given to the Secretary of State for the Home Department; it is vested in the Lords of the Privy Council. In all their deliberations on the subject I took part, and I can bear witness not only for myself but for my Colleagues that we were anxious to do all in our power to check this disease. Two considerations weighed upon our minds, and I do not think this House will visit us with its censure for taking both into account. The first was the desire to do all that was practical and reasonable to arrest the disease; and the other was the desire to interfere as little as possible, without an absolute necessity, with the supply of food to the great body of the people. And the difficulty we had to contend with throughout was the necessity of preventing any regulations which might be issued from clashing with either of these important objects. It has been said that we received intimation of the existence of this disease in June, and that for a fortnight we did nothing. What are the facts? Information was not received of any one case till the 10th July. Immediately on the receipt of the information the Privy Council caused inquiries to be made in the dairy sheds in London to which the disease at first was supposed to be confined, with a view to ascertain its nature and extent. They also consulted the Law Officers of the Crown as to the powers which the Crown possessed of dealing with the matter in case the disease should turn out to be, as it did, the Steppe murrain. The interval, therefore, so far from being lost, was spent in making inquiries and in acquiring knowledge, without which it would have been impossible to have acted afterwards. The principal charge against the Government is that they did not take on themselves at once the duty of legislating for the whole country by issuing and enforcing stringent regulations under the power vested by the Act of Parliament in the Privy Council for that purpose. The House, however, will remember that the country was wholly unprepared for such a stringent procedure. Even when the Commission—the appointment of which was censured by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) as wholly unnecessary—made its valuable Report, if the Government had felt disposed to give effect to its recommendations, it would have been impossible to do so without exciting such an amount of opposition throughout the country as must have neutralized altogether the efforts of the Government. The hon. Member for Aberdeenshire has stated that but one opinion existed as to the recommendations of the Commission—namely, that they were impossible recommendations. My right hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) implied that my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State (Mr. Baring) attacked the Commission. My hon. Friend found no fault with the Commission; but when we are told that we should have adopted the recommendations of the majority of that Commission, he endeavoured to show that the reason why we did not adopt the remedy which the Commissioners suggested was because it was not a practical remedy, and even in the opinion of the Commissioners themselves was not a sure remedy against the disease. The Government are accused of not having laid down stringent rules for the whole country, by availing themselves of the knowledge and experience of particular districts, and acting upon that. But first as to the supposed delegation of authority by the Privy Council to local authorities, that is an entire misapprehension. The Privy Council made the Orders, but declared that they should only come into operation when the local authorities in a particular district, to whom its circumstances were, of course, familiar, decided that such Order should be applied to the locality. The authority, therefore, which was put in force remained the authority of the Privy Council, invoked and applied by the local authorities, who must be judges more competent than an authority at a distance could possibly be. Then it has been said that uniform Orders, applicable to the whole of the kingdom, ought to have been made. The Under Secretary has distinctly shown that that would have been absolutely impracticable. If we had made an Order that no cattle should be moved at all in Great Britain, what would have been the feeling of the agriculturists, and of all persons concerned in the cattle trade? What we did, therefore, was to require of the local authorities the expression of their opinion as to the amount of restriction necessary for their different districts, and leave them to give effect to that opinion by bringing the Order of the Privy Council into operation. How is it possible for the Privy Council to have that accurate knowledge of the different circumstances of every part of the country which would be requisite to enable them in the first place to frame such an Order, and then to insure its being carried into effect? Why, even local authorities from time to time have been obliged to recall or modify their own decisions to prevent them from pressing too harshly or vexatiously on the agriculturists in their own districts. The hon. Baronet the Member for Northumberland gave a striking instance of the difficulty of making any legislation universally applicable; for in some cases, though the magistrates had applied the terms of the Order to sheep as well as to cattle, they found it necessary to sanction the removal of sheep from one place to another, otherwise the ordinary operations of farming there would come to a standstill. The Government, if they made a law actually prohibiting the removal of stock from one place to another, would not merely be preventing by anticipation the making of arrangements applicable to such special cases as the hon. Member had referred to; but in districts and counties where the disease had not made its appearance at all, as in the North West of Scotland and some counties in England, would be imposing intolerable restrictions on the people. Allusion has been made to the deputation which came to the Privy Council from the Royal Agricultural Society in December. A prominent member of that deputation was Mr. Thompson, the late Member for Whitby, who was then persuaded of the necessity of some general Order prohibiting the removal of cattle by railway. But since the quarter sessions have had the power of exercising a discretion on the matter, he has written me a letter, in which he distinctly states his opinion, founded on the large experience that he has gained, that it would be utterly impossible to carry into effect in the West Riding the Orders which have been made in the North Riding. In the West Riding he thinks it would be impracticable, for instance, to stop the markets. He has pointed out the serious evils which could not fail to arise from butchers slaughtering cattle at farm houses. The working people, who were well fed and well paid, would not, he wrote, submit to the absolute suppression of the fairs and markets, but would have beef. If the Government had made such an order it would, no doubt, lead to great dissatisfaction in many parts of the country; it would have been said that the Government were adopting more stringent rules than were necessary, and actually contributing to the spread of the disease. The fact appears to be that what answers very well in one county or in one riding may not answer in another, but, on the contrary, may conduce to the spread of the disease. I can assure the House that the Government considered the whole subject with the greatest care and attention, and came to the conclusion that it was only by enacting such rules and regulations as the Privy Council had power to make, and, in doing so, having regard to the various circumstances of the country, to the various conditions which are found to exist in different parts of it, not only in regard of the plague itself, but also as respects the manner in which the farmers carry on their operations and by calling on the local authorities, the leading gentry, and agricultural body to carry them out, we could hope to do anything effectual towards stopping the spread of the disease. We availed ourselves of the experience of the past, and looked to what had been done when the disease broke out in the last century. During the former visitation of the plague very much the same steps had been gone through as on the present occasion. Local authorities were invited to co-operate with the central Government. We came to the conclusion that the most effectual measure to adopt would be to have every beast affected with the disease killed at once, and we gave power to the inspectors to order it. But the Royal Commissioners objected to the continuance of the power, and public opinion was very strongly expressed against it, and we therefore limited the power to cases in which the order for isolation was disobeyed. We could not shut our eyes to the experience of the past. In the last century the Government at length made a General Order applicable to the whole country as some hon. Gentlemen have recommended to-night, but such a feeling was manifested, and such an opposition to it raised, that they were obliged to revoke that Order before the day on which it was to have come into operation. I believe there would have been a similar opposition if the Government had ordered such a measure at the present time. The step recommended by the Royal Commission—that of putting an absolute stop to the removal of beasts throughout the country—would, no doubt, have been the most effectual one; but the only question was—that which weighed on the minority of the Commission—whether it was practicable, and it was the consideration of this question which forced us to the conclusion at which we arrived. It has been urged that all the cattle brought to a market should be slaughtered within the place where that market is held—that no cattle should be allowed to leave the market alive; but my hon. Friend has pointed out what has been the effect on the Liverpool market of what has been done in Lancashire, the Liverpool market being outside the boundary of the borough. Any general order of that kind would have had to be modified, unless we were prepared to stop the supply of animal food to the people. As to the Metropolitan Market, for a long time it has been free from the disease, and I do not believe one case can be shown during the last two months in which the disease was propagated by a beast coming from the market. Very great anxiety, however, has been expressed lest it might be spread by cattle brought from the London market; but, as much of the animal food consumed in Birmingham, Wolverhampton, Manchester, and other places is obtained from beasts coming from the Continent through London, before we made an order prohibiting the removal of any animals from the Metropolitan Market we felt it necessary to communicate with the places interested in this question in the country. We have made an order that no cattle brought into the Metropolitan Market should be allowed to leave the district of the Metropolitan Board of Works. The effect of the regulations of the magistrates with reference to the removal of beasts in different parts of the country has been that the supply of the London market has fallen off to a great extent, and the number of beasts brought here now is much smaller than it was a few weeks ago. Something has been said, in the course of this debate, with regard to Ireland. I will explain what the Government did in respect to that country. In Ireland great apprehension was felt that the disease might be imported; for though it is not a cattle-importing country, cattle do arrive chiefly from the west of Scotland to be fattened in Ireland and afterwards exported. Accordingly, the agriculturists of Ireland were very naturally desirous that every precaution should be taken against the introduction of the disease and they memorialized the Lord Lieutenant, asking for an order prohibiting the importation of cattle into Ireland. I must say that my noble Friend brought the whole of his influence to bear on the Government in favour of such an order. We found that this question had been raised several years ago by persons interested in sheep farms in this country, who were desirous of preventing the importation of sheep from Ireland, where a sheep disease existed at the time. The question was at that time referred to the Law Officers, and it was held that the power of making such an order did not apply to removals from one portion of the United Kingdom to the other, but only to removals from one specified place to another. However, the Law Officers in Ireland were consulted, and they gave an opinion that the power of making such an Order as was asked for was vested in the Government. In this opinion the Law Officers of England concurred, and the Government made the Order. I had not the pleasure of seeing any Irish gentlemen on the subject; but there was much communication between the Home Office and the Irish Government relating to it. As soon as the Report of the Royal Commission was in our hands, we transmitted a copy of it to the Lord Lieutenant, directing his attention to the portion of it relating to Ireland, and asking him to obtain the opinions of persons in that country on the recommendations. The Lord Lieutenant thought that as there had been no Irishman on the Cattle Plague Commission its recommendations could not be adopted as to Ireland without such a course. A committee was thereupon formed in Ireland; they made their report; and their recommendations, so far as they came within the scope of the Act, have been adopted. Should the disease unfortunately break out in Ireland, the authorities there have the power to order the slaughter of beasts in order to prevent the spread of the plague. With regard to compensation from public funds, I ask the attention of hon. Gentlemen to what occurred in the last century. Compensation was then given, but only to the amount of 40s., but as we are informed by the Commission, it produced, in the frauds to which it led, very bad results, and in rendering persons careless as to taking proper measures to prevent their cattle from being attacked with the disease. But it is in the power of every county to do what has been done in Aberdeenshire. By means of a voluntary assessment there compensation has been paid for animals slaughtered wherever the disease has appeared, including those in contact with diseased animals, and I believe the fund is not exhausted. This system has been attended with the greatest success. I read the other day a circumstance which reflected credit upon the county of Northumberland. On the appearance of the disease near Hexham the residents in the neighbourhood immediately raised a subscription, and buying the two herds in which the disease had appeared caused the whole of them to be slaughtered. If the same local energy had been displayed in other districts we should have heard fewer complaints about the rapid diffusion of the disease. Upon one other point I may say a few words, although it is not a material one. The legality of the Order in Council which came into operation on the 3rd of January was doubted, because it was supposed that every Act of the sessions dated from the first day of their meeting, which in many cases was the 1st January. The point was raised by the Oxfordshire quarter sessions, and in accordance with their request we took the opinion of the Law Officers, who held that this legal fiction applied only to cases of judicial and not to matters of administrative business. I can only repeat that the Government have been anxious in all they have done to consult the interests of all classes alike. I believe it would be a great advantage if a dead meat supply could be substituted for a live meat supply throughout the country, but such a change cannot possibly be effected without much preparation. I trust we shall obtain the concurrence of the House and of the country in the measure which the Government will introduce on the subject of this night's discussion.

THE O'DONOGHUE moved the adjournment of the debate.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Although it is rather earlier than the House is accustomed to adjourn a debate of this character, yet, as the attention of the House has been exclusively occupied by a question of great importance, and I believe the hon. Member intends to introduce to the notice of the House another subject demanding much consideration, I do not believe that we could in fairness ask him to proceed to-night. It will not be convenient for the House to proceed with the debate to-morrow, and it will, therefore, be adjourned until Thursday.

House adjourned at twenty minutes

PUBLIC BILL—First Reading—Sale of Land by Auction [H.L.] (2.)

PARLIAMENTARY OATHS.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD RAVENSWORTH said, that he had given a pledge on one occasion during the last Session of Parliament that, as it had been admitted upon all sides that some amendment was necessary in the law regulating the oaths administered to Members of Parliament, he would ask their Lordships to deal with the question in a comprehensive manner. But, since Her Majesty had been pleased to call attention to the subject in Her Speech, and as the Government had already given notice to consider the whole subject of the oath taken by Members of Parliament, he considered himself absolved from the engagement he had entered into. Still, he would say that, if the Government proposed a uniform oath for Members of all creeds, they would experience more difficulty than might at first sight be expected. He had given much attention to the subject, and would, of course, give all due consideration to the proposal of Her Majesty's Government when it should be laid before Parliament. He had been, from the moment of his first entrance into Parliament, an advocate for the removal of all religious disabilities, and his opinions upon that subject still remained unaltered; but he would venture upon that occasion to express a hope that the Government, in any new oath they might propose, would take care not to interfere with the authority and pre-eminence of the Established Church, or to derogate in any way from her position as the Church of this nation.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE—DAY OF FASTING AND HUMILIATION.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I wish, my Lords, to ask the noble Earl opposite (Earl Russell) a question which some may think, perhaps, not very important in itself, but which is certainly important as showing the spirit by which Her Majesty's Government is actuated in dealing with the present calamity. I noticed in the papers of this morning a report of the proceedings in Convocation; and though your Lordships may, perhaps, think that an odd place whence to gain any information respecting the cattle plague, I wish to ask the noble Earl a question bearing upon a statement made by the most rev. Primate. The most rev. Primate was stated to have said that he had had a correspondence with the Secretary of State for the Home Department respecting the appointment of a day of fasting and humiliation in consequence of the pestilence upon our cattle; and that the right hon. Gentleman had declined to accede to the request, among other reasons on this ground—and I will quote the most rev. Primate's words as reported—

"Her Majesty's Government do not think it expedient to appoint a day, because national fasts are only observed in event of calamities affecting the whole of the nation, whereas the cattle plague is as yet only partial."

Now, my Lords, I have no intention of going into the question of the expediency or in expediency of appointing a day of national fasting and humiliation; but if Her Majesty's Government are influenced by the reason assigned by the right hon. Baronet for refusing the proposal, I cannot help saying that I regard it as one of the most extraordinary reasons I ever heard of. Such an idea would indeed go very far to justify the belief, which is very prevalent at the present moment, that Her Majesty's Government are in a great measure indifferent to the class upon whom this great calamity has fallen, and that if any other branch of the community had been similarly affected they would have acted with more vigour. There is, I know, a class of doctrinaire philosophers in this country who believe that if every head of cattle in this kingdom were swept away the laws of trade ought not to be disturbed, and that everything ought to be allowed to find its level: but this I am sure is not only not the general feeling of the country, but is generally repugnant to the common sense of the community. The cattle plague is a calamity affecting not merely the agricultural classes—not only those who live on the land and by the land—but it affects every class throughout the country. Indeed, if it continues much longer unchecked, I doubt very much whether Her Majesty's Government will not feel its effects in every department of the revenue and the Excise. Meat, milk, cheese—articles of prime necessity—may possibly rise to famine prices, and the other concerns of ordinary life may become so affected that Her Majesty's Government and the Chancellor of the Exchequer may not improbably be among the first to realize the wide-spread nature of the calamity. I wish, therefore, to ask the noble Earl, Whether the reason assigned in the newspaper reports, as one of the reasons for which the proposal of the most rev. Primate was rejected by the Secretary of State, is correctly attributed to the right hon. Gentleman? If, indeed, Her Majesty's Government needed a reason for the view which they seem to have adopted, I could suggest at least a truer and a more intelligible one; for I could understand their declining to appoint a day of fasting and humiliation on the ground that the cattle plague was likely to bring us fasting enough, and that we have already ample humiliation in the position which Her Majesty's Government have occupied during the last three months.

EARL RUSSELL said, that he intended to lay upon the table of the House so much of the letter of the most rev. Primate, and of the reply of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, as referred to the subject of the cattle plague. The noble Earl would then see that one of the reasons given by his right hon. Friend for declining the proposal was, that there was already in use a prayer sanctioned by the most rev. Primate by which the nation humbled itself before Almighty God, and prayed for the Divine protection in consequence of the cattle plague. He thought the noble Earl would have done well to have waited for the production of the correspondence before indulging in such an invective against Her Majesty's Government.

THE BISHOP OF LINCOLN could not help expressing his regret that the Government should have refused the request of the most rev. Primate. He could assure their Lordships that in the district with which he was connected, and which had suffered, and was still suffering, severely from the cattle plague, the appointment of a national fast would be viewed with great satisfaction. It was true that the form of prayer to which the noble Earl referred was used in the churches each week, but a large proportion of the population felt that a day of national supplication and humiliation was needed. As it was, they were now taking the matter into their own hands, and in many instances parishioners had requested their clergymen to assemble their congregation for the purpose of intercession.

SALE OF LAND BY AUCTION BILL—[H.L.]
PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, he rose to call the attention of their Lordships to the law relating to biddings at sales of estates by auction, and would conclude by introducing a Bill upon that subject. In point of fact, there was scarcely an occasion on which an estate was put up for sale by auction without some one being employed to bid on the part of the owner. It was a matter—and he believed the only matter—on which there was a conflict between the common law courts and the equity courts; for while the former held that a sale was actually void if any bidder was employed on the part of the owner, it was maintained by the latter that the owner might appoint a person to bid for him up to a certain value, for the purpose, not of unduly stimulating other persons to go on bidding, but of preventing the sacrifice of his property. The law as to auctions of real estate was the only instance yet remaining which was not construed alike in the courts of law and of equity; and it was quite time this discordance should be put an end to. If a man put up an estate by auction, with the common condition that the highest bidder should be the buyer, and should appoint also a person to bid for him, the courts of law would hold that sale to be void, on the ground that the seller, by his "puffer," had bid for himself. A court of equity, on the contrary, if no unfair advantage was taken by the use of a "puffer," would decide that the sale was good. It was discreditable that such a conflict should exist, and he therefore begged to introduce a Bill to amend the present law upon the subject. By the provisions of his Bill an auctioneer was forbidden to bid at the sale of any property either on account of himself, the owner of the property, or any other persons; but the owner of the estate was permitted to engage a "puffer," who might bid up to a certain price, provided that such price was communicated to him and to the auctioneer in writing before the commencement of the sale. Those provisions would enable a man to insure that his property should not be sold at a price far below its real value, and yet would prevent the public from being induced to give more than the estate was worth by fictitious bidding on the part of either the auctioneer or the "puffer." Great mischief had resulted in past times by allowing auctioneers to bid; and there were numerous instances in which sales had been declared invalid from this practice. There had recently been a decision in a case before the present Lord Chancellor, in which it appeared that the auctioneer and the "puffer" bid eleven times before any bona fide purchaser began to bid, and then the property was immediately knocked down to that bidder. His noble Friend on the Woolsack rightly held that this sale was void. He was aware that Lord Loughborough, when Lord Chancellor, had spoken with something like disrespect of the idea that the biddings of one man influenced those of others; but he (Lord St. Leonards), on the contrary, believed that all men were influenced more or less at auctions by the biddings of those around him. In the first place, the biddings at an auction gave some indication of the real value of the property; and, in the second place, a little bit of vanity induced a man to show that he possessed the longest purse. He therefore thought it absolutely necessary that the public should be protected from being taken in by fictitious biddings. In sales under the Court of Chancery, where a bidding was reserved, the sum below which the estate was not to be sold was stated in a sealed paper, which was placed in the hands of the auctioneer, who was not allowed to open it till the sale was commenced. If the bids stopped short of the price stated in that paper, he announced to the persons assembled that no sale had taken place. That was very proper, and this Bill provided that where there was a reserved bidding, as in sales under the Court of Chancery, the sum below which the estate was not to be sold should be stated in writing and delivered to the auctioneer, so that there should be no misunderstanding; and where the biddings were real, but did not come up to the sum fixed, he was to announce that no sale had taken place; but he would then be at liberty to receive any bidding equal to or beyond the sum fixed as the value. An auctioneer acting contrary to the directions of this Bill would be liable to an action for the damage which any real bidder might sustain. There was another provision in the Bill of a different nature. It was not one man in a hundred who knew the extremely important conditions under which auctions took place, and the expense incurred in making up the title was often very onerous. When he came into the hands of his own solicitor, the buyer generally found he had some £200 to pay for making out the title. That expense ought to fall on the seller. The noble and learned Lord concluded by presenting a Bill for amending the Law of Auctions of Estates.

The Bishop of Lincoln

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the subject to which the noble and learned Lord had called attention was one of considerable importance, and he thought their Lordships were indebted to the noble and learned Lord for the care he had bestowed on it. His noble and learned Friend would not, he hoped, think that he was treating the proposed enactment with disrespect if he declined at present to enter into a discussion upon it; for it was precisely one of those measures with respect to which, until one saw the Bill and entered into its consideration, clause by clause, it was impossible to say more than that its general object seemed advisable.

DUMBARTON COUNTY ELECTION.

MR. SPEAKER acquainted the House, that he had this day received a letter from Mr. Stirling, informing him that it is not his intention to defend his return for the County of Dumbarton:—Letter read as followeth:—

"Cordale, Dumbartonshire,

"8th Feby. 1866.

SIR,—I beg to inform you that it is not my intention to defend my Return for the County of Dumbarton.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient Servant,

"JA. STIRLING.

"To the Right Honble.

"The Speaker of the House of Commons."

WEST AFRICAN COMMITTEE.

QUESTION.

MR. ADDERLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, What steps have been taken towards carrying out the recommendations of the West African Committee?

H

Mr. CARDWELL replied, that orders had been given for the final abandonment of M'Carthy's Island not later than the end of June. As regarded the more general recommendations of the Committee, the Governor of Sierra Leone had been appointed Governor of the Lower Settlements. The estimates, including those for steam communication, had been approved by the Treasury, and would be submitted to Parliament. The Governor of Sierra Leone had received instructions to make arrangements for the reduction of the establishment at Lagos. That objectionable state of the law which was proved before the Committee to have existed with regard to domestic slavery would be met either by an alteration of the law or by a restriction of the area of territory.

DEBATE RESUMED.

Order read, for resuming the Adjourned Debate on Question [6th February], "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to convey the thanks of this House for Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech from the Throne," &c., (see p. 115).

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he was sorry to be obliged to intrude for a very short time upon the attention of the House, and to take a course which perhaps might give an unexpected turn to this debate. While he fully recognized the importance of the question which was discussed for more than seven hours on Tuesday evening—while he deeply deplored the calamities which had been inflicted on England by the disastrous ravages of the cattle plague, and while he would do all in his power to abate and, if possible, to stay them—he thought the question of the state of Ireland was one of at least equal importance, and one which could not and ought not to be postponed. During the life of the last Parliament some of the causes of Irish discontent were more than once pointed out by his hon. Friend the now Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire), and by his hon. and learned Friend Mr. Hennessy, who he was sorry was not there to support him with his great ability. His hon. Friend (Mr. Maguire) was, he recollected, then told by the right hon. Baronet, who was at that time Chief Secretary for Ireland. (Sir

Mr. Adderley

Robert Peel), in tones which were emphatically triumphant, that there were no causes of discontent, and that Ireland had entered on an era of prosperity and contentment. He thought that must now be some evidence to everyone that the information supplied by Her Majesty's Government to the last Parliament was, to say the least, not very accurate; and it was in order to do away with the injurious effects of this erroneous information, that he was anxious, as early as possible, to place the true state of things before the House and the country. It would be in the recollection of hon. Members that the right hon. Gentleman the (Chancellor of the Exchequer) in consenting, as he readily did, to his Motion for adjournment of the debate on Tuesday night, said he did so as he understood that he (The O'Donoghue) was going to introduce to the notice of the House a question of vast interest. He felt that was a just description of the subject of which he was about to treat, and which gave him a claim on the attention of hon. Members to which, personally, he had no pretension. From the paragraph in the Queen's Speech relating to Ireland he totally dissented, and principally for this reason—that throughout the whole of it there was the assumption that the state of Ireland, as far as regarded legislation, left nothing to be desired; from which, no doubt, it was intended they should infer that those who wished to disturb such a state of things must be the victims of unreasoning impulse, or sanguinary revolutionists intent on robbery and murder. All those connected with the administration of the law—local magistrates, Judges of assize, and assistant barristers at quarter sessions—had declared that there was an almost complete absence of crime in Ireland. In point of morality the people of Ireland need not fear comparison with any other on the face of the earth. There was no country in the world in which revolutionary ideas had made so little way, and in which those unmistakable symptoms of a revolutionary tendency—irreligion and want of respect for social status—were so little known. If the contrary of all this were to be found in Ireland, he could understand it being taken for granted that the fault was altogether on the side of the governed, and not on that of the governing. But when they were told that a spirit of disaffection existed among a people whose conduct in every social relation of life might be said to be exemplary, he maintained that it was impossible to believe that the Government of such a people had nothing to answer for, and that the fault was all on the side of the governed; and he further maintained that it was the duty of those who represented such a people to insist upon the Government, while taking every necessary precaution to preserve the public peace, coming forward and declaring their intention of examining into the alleged causes of this disaffection, with a view, if possible, to their removal. Accordingly he totally dissented from the paragraph in the Queen's Speech relating to Ireland; and, with the permission of the House, he would beg to substitute for that paragraph the following:—

"Humbly to express our deep regret to Her Majesty that great disaffection exists in Ireland, and humbly to represent to Her Majesty that this wide-spread disaffection is the result of grave causes which it is the duty of Her Majesty's Ministers to examine into and remove."

It appeared to him quite evident, indeed he might say, inevitable, that there should be a difference of opinion in this country as to the actual condition of Ireland at the present time, and as to the causes which produced that condition, how it could be averted, and what steps ought to be taken with reference to the future. But while admitting that various views would, no doubt, be held on these different points, he thought the House would give its unanimous assent to these two propositions—first, that the present condition of Ireland must be unsatisfactory to every man who has her prosperity or the prosperity of the British Empire at heart; and, secondly, that it was the plain duty of the Legislature diligently to investigate the causes which had produced the existing disaffection, and, having discovered them, to deal with them in the way that justice might require. It might appear startling to assert that it was not easy for the House of Commons to obtain a clear notion of the state of Ireland. In the first place, the English—and he spoke of those who were animated with favourable dispositions towards Ireland, and who constituted the majority of the House and the overwhelming majority in this country—were satisfied with a very superficial glance at Irish affairs. For the most part, they derived their notion of the state of things on the other side of the Channel from what was passing in their own country. They there beheld prosperity and contentment as the principal features, and assuming that wherever British institutions existed there must be a like prospect, took it for granted that the stagnation and eternal restlessness of Ireland were attributable to the wavering of the national character or the superabundance of frolicsomeness among the people, which they hoped their own more serious character would in time modify. Like mankind in general, they took the most hopeful view of the case. It was sometimes a difficult thing for a man to discharge his duties to his constituents, and at the same time to occupy an agreeable position in the House of Commons. Grievance-mongers were universally disliked, and more especially Irish grievance-mongers, because the British mind had been worked up to the belief that Irish grievances were the mere creations of agitators and politicians, who must find something to exercise their intelligence and delude their countrymen. The result of this belief, as must be obvious to every one who had had any experience of Parliament, or the press, or of the public mind out of doors, was that an Irish Member shrunk from making himself ridiculous, or, at all events, wearisome, in the eyes of those with whom he associated in daily intercourse by uselessly urging, year after year, the settlement of questions which, though considered grave and dangerous in Ireland, were in this country regarded as visionary and absurd. Accordingly, even those Irish Members who fully realized the necessity which called for the settlement of certain questions, became gradually, though perhaps unconsciously, animated by the all-pervading sentiment of incredulity as to the reality of Irish grievances, and their statements became more and more diluted until, in the course of time, they acquired that contented flavour which alone was palatable. Then, again, there were some who, notwithstanding the opportunities they possessed, would not see Ireland as she really was, and their version of her condition found too ready credence, owing, in great part, to the exigencies of party. Besides, all hon. Members knew that the occupants of the Treasury Bench, who were supposed to have within their reach the fullest and most reliable sources of information, had an insuperable objection—whether they were Whigs or Tories—to admit that Ireland was not in a prosperous condition. It was not difficult to discover that this arose from the fear that such an avowal would be interpreted as an acknowledgment of incapacity, might produce unfavourable notions in the minds of foreigners as to the efficacy of British institutions and the stability of British power, and that, above all, it would necessitate the renunciation of certain political maxims and the adoption of such a policy towards Ireland as, in the presence of the party exigencies to which he had referred, might lead to unpleasant consequences. Indeed, among all British statesmen he knew of none, except the late Sir Robert Peel, who adopted an Irish policy regardless of party exigencies. The reasons he had just stated justified him in asserting that, in the ordinary course of events, it was not easy for the House to obtain a clear perception of the state of Ireland, and consequently to deal fairly with the country. But this Parliament possessed advantages for dealing with this subject which preceding Parliaments had not enjoyed. Within the last few months extraordinary events had occurred which, he thought, must satisfy every reflecting Englishman that the state of Ireland was very different from that of his own happy and flourishing country, that the grievance-mongers had some justification for their grievances, and that those who, possessing full sources of information, told a different tale were in reality the false prophets, and that the sunny pictures of the Treasury Bench were the imaginary creations of men who either deceived themselves or who for some purpose deceived others. Those events had shown Ireland as she really is. They had enabled hon. Gentlemen to judge for themselves and, he would add, had imposed upon them, as the representatives of the English people, the solemn duty of endeavouring by a just and courageous policy to make Ireland a prosperous, contented, and loyal appendage of the British Crown. At the present moment, from one end of Ireland to the other, among the masses of the people, both in town and country—among millions—there was a feeling of disaffection towards English rule which had only been kept from breaking out into open insurrection by the manifest hopelessness of contending with the vastly superior power of England. This hopelessness, however, had by no means taken the shape of despair—it influenced only the action of the hour, and had settled itself into a resolve to wait for the favourable chances which, it was believed, time and the fluctuating fortunes of nations would certainly bring forth. This dislike to English rule pervaded the whole island, except a few districts, the inhabitants of which, influenced by sectarian animosity, believed that the slaughter of all who differed from them in creed was the first step towards acquiring religious ascendancy. To what, then, was this disaffection attributable? Was it to be ascribed to the labours of the apostles of Fenianism within the last few years? Most certainly not. They found everything ready to their hands, and all they had to do was to establish in a few localities a kind of military organization. Fenianism must be ascribed to disaffection—not disaffection to Fenianism. By the masses Fenianism was looked upon as a kind of insurrectionary experiment, for which they had been long prepared by what had passed in their minds—by the events which had occurred within their memory, by the history of other countries, and by the national traditions. They had not accepted Fenianism, because the Fenian Society, being secret and oath-bound, was condemned by the Catholic Church, and because they could not persuade themselves that Fenianism was adequate to attain the end it proposed, and because they were keenly alive to the consequences of failure. But that man would grossly deceive the House who, from whatever motives, should assert that the sympathies of the vast majority of the Irish people were not on the Fenian side. The Fenians might be described by some as intending only robbery and murder. They might be denounced at quarter sessions and by Puisne Judges, and anathematized by persons higher in authority. But all in vain. The denunciation and anathema only recoiled upon those who uttered them by impairing their influence, for the people of Ireland felt that their country was not what she ought to be, that she was pressed down by many grievances, and that English rule was a cause of them all. So long as this remained, so long the people would continue to regard those who endeavoured to overthrow that rule as true friends of theirs and true lovers of their country. The true cause of the disaffection in Ireland was the impression upon the minds of the people that all the evils that afflicted them were the consequences of English rule. It was utterly fallacious to imagine that this impression was the work of those who had been denounced as “agitators,” “demagogues,” and “rebel conspirators.” The people themselves saw the result of English rule in the poverty from which they suffered, and the precarious nature of their position. Surely nothing more was necessary than the evidence of their senses to convince them of their thorough and complete dependence on the will of others. Their estimate of the value of English rule was derived from the incidents of their daily lives. They knew that the laws and institutions under which they lived were English, and when they found that those laws and institutions failed to insure them a comfortable existence and secure homes, they reasonably and logically condemned those laws and institutions, and held Englishmen responsible for the failure. If O'Connell were living to-day with undiminished popularity, and were to appeal to his countrymen to accept their position and be content with it, they would turn away from him as a traitor to their interests. The question then naturally suggested itself—Was the disaffection of the Irish people based upon just grounds, or could English rule be fairly held accountable for the grievances of which they complained? He, for one, thought these questions must be answered in the affirmative. He passed by, as unworthy of consideration, the oft-repeated assertions that these evils were beyond the reach of legislation, and that legislation had done all that could be done by legislation for Ireland. He would say to the House, "That you are accountable for the state of Ireland is incontrovertibly determined by this fact, that you have deprived the Irish people of the power of self-government, and have taken upon yourselves the duty of governing them. That is your duty under the Act of Union." No lengthened argument was needed to show that 105 Irish representatives could do nothing which was opposed to the views of the 500 and odd Englishmen with whom they were associated in that House, who, in the natural order of things, would on all occasions, as had been illustrated in the course of that very debate, look first to the requirements of their own country. He would not dwell upon the fact of the Union having been carried by force and fraud, and of its never having, through continued misgovernment, been approved by the Irish nation, but he would refer to the disadvantages to be traced to it. The Irish people knew that the mere arrangements for the carrying out of the Act of Union of necessity impoverished their country; they believed that the transference of the seat of Legislature from Dublin to London had placed the Irish Members beyond the reach of Irish public opinion; that it had increased absenteeism, and that it had disorganized Irish society and had weakened the home sympathies of the higher classes, by making them virtually English, socially and politically, and by imbuing them with the notion that, while they could count upon the support of the strong arm of England, they need pay little attention to the goodwill of their countrymen. The people also were well aware that the expenditure of the surplus funds of the public revenue without any appreciable benefit to them, that the possession of all ecclesiastical revenues by the Church of the minority, and that the exhaustive drain of absentee proprietors all combined to inflict upon them, year by year, heavy pecuniary loss. Some of these effects of English rule must co-exist with the Union; but some, and perhaps the more important, were wholly independent of it. They affected, more particularly, the trading, artisan, and labouring classes, and the floating population generally. But there was another and far more influential class whose dislike to the English rule supplied life, hope, and inexhaustible resources to the disaffected of every other class—he meant the agricultural tenants. England having taken upon herself the duty of governing Ireland was responsible before God and the world for the grievances of this class, whose voice had been so often heard in that House, and who by petitions had so often implored those who governed them to pass laws which would save them from the cupidity and still worse passions of their landlords. At this moment there was silence in the homes of the peasantry, as if they were listening for the first sounds of a mighty tempest, foretold by strange signs and threatening clouds. They made no manifestation of political feeling; but to learn what they felt, we must look across the Atlantic at the attitude of their brethren—from whom they might be said to have only just parted, and for whom their hearts were still lonely—marshalling in hundreds of thousands, proclaiming that the day of vengeance was at hand, and calling out to their fathers and brothers in the old home to keep aloof from English party squabbles, and never more appeal for justice to that Parliament which had so often spurned their petitions. The moral of these demonstrations had penetrated to the highest hill and the remotest valley, and had sunk deep into the souls of the peasantry, who were profoundly touched by the constancy and devotion which, far away, amidst the new associations of America, still made common cause with them. No matter how we regarded the thousands of banded Irishmen now parading their numbers as a menace to England in the States of the Western Republic, by the vast majority of the agricultural population of Ireland, by the millions of the Irish people, these banded Irishmen were loved and trusted, and every indication of their growing strength was hailed with delight. All this might afford pleasant and wholesome food for journalists and satirists if, unfortunately, it were not too true that the peasantry had ceased to look to Parliament for the redress of their grievances. If things were as they ought to be, the House could almost afford to laugh at the idea of a foreign force landing on the shores of Ireland, because then the whole population would be prepared to fight for the maintenance of the laws and institutions of their country. What would happen now, if a force came, no matter whence, having the avowed intention to overturn English authority and abolish the hated land-law? Would the landlords be able to appeal to their tenantry in defence of insecurity of tenure and high rents—in defence of a system which allowed one man to sweep away the inhabitants of a whole countryside (as was recently done in Galway by Mr. John George Adair), and even placed the Queen's troops at his disposal to assist him in exterminating the Queen's subjects, in defence of a system which recognized no more right in the tiller of the soil, independently of the will of his landlord, than it did in the beast which draws the plough? It was this system which had made it true, as a right hon. Gentleman had remarked in that House, that "Every man in a certain rank of life who leaves Ireland is an enemy of England." If a hostile force came to Ireland, no matter whence, we should have to contend for the dominion with that force, sustained by the whole agricultural population, to say nothing of the sides which would be taken by the trading, artisan, and labouring classes. No doubt they were indisposed to credit his words; they might think that he exaggerated for a sinister purpose, either to lower their reputation before the world, or to encourage their enemies by giving proof of internal weakness or to gratify an anti-English sentiment. No!

The O'Donoghue

he had no anti-English sentiment; the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) might laugh, but he did not mind that. He repeated that he had no anti-English sentiment; he deemed it scarcely possible that a man who had had much intercourse with Englishmen should be anti-English. Yet it did not follow from this that he must approve England's treatment of all nations subject to her rule. Perhaps it would be found, before the Parliament was much older, that Englishmen themselves did not know that. What he had spoken he conceived to be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. He had spoken with reluctance, because he knew that what he had to say would be disagreeable to those ["No, no!"] with whom it was his ambition to stand well, if he could only do so consistently with truth and without sacrificing the interests of his own country. He could not tell them that Irishmen were loyal and contented, because he knew the contrary to be the fact. He could not tell Irishmen that they ought to be loyal and contented, when he saw they were denied justice. He repeated that it was a ridiculous doctrine that loyalty could exist without a cause, that it could exist notwithstanding continued misgovernment; and it was an equally untenable and ridiculous assertion, that the disaffection of Ireland had any other cause save and except misgovernment. He did not need to come to her Majesty's Government to learn the state of Ireland. He knew there was disaffection—widespread disaffection—in Ireland, the result, as he maintained, of just causes; but he knew, besides, that if Her Majesty's Government declared it was their intention to do all that could be done to remove these causes, and gave proof of honesty of purpose towards Ireland, that spirit of disaffection would subside; that same spirit which now was threatening to break out in an insurrectionary movement, and which possessed, beyond all question, the popular sympathy, and which made the people of Ireland formidable, no matter how they were laughed at or ridiculed. What, then, was to be done? Would the Government persevere in a policy which had produced the deplorable results to which he had borne testimony—a testimony he would not alter if he thought that were the last moment of his life. If that policy was persevered in, it would please the mass of those who contemplated the overthrow of the British Empire, who did not wish to see England conciliate the Irish people, because then the British Empire would be established on a firm and imperishable basis. Or, would the Government diligently and carefully investigate the causes of Irish disaffection, and deal with them impartially and fearlessly? If they did, they would not be required to do anything offensive to English pride—to do anything which in their judgment might tend to the dismemberment of the Empire, or impair the stability of British power; but they would have simply to do certain things which, if England had not dispossessed the Irish people of the right of self-government, would have long since been carried out—things which the Irish people now expected the British Government to do, and by which the Government might acquire an indefeasible title to the confidence and allegiance of the Irish people. The Government would be asked to give Ireland a large surplus revenue to be expended in works of public utility; to impose heavy penalties on absenteeism; to do away with the ascendancy of one Church over another; to assimilate the education system and the Poor Law system to those of England; and particularly to pass an Act of tenant-right, which would give the tenant-farmers a firm hold on the soil; such an Act as would make it impossible for the landlord to render improvements valueless, or worse than valueless, by the action of a notice to quit; such an Act as would give the tenant-farmers of Ireland freedom of thought and action, and relieve them from that mitigated serfdom in which they existed at present. If the Government diligently and carefully investigated the causes of Irish disaffection—if they diligently and carefully investigated what the aspirations and wishes of the Irish people were—they would find he had correctly stated them; and he had done so in no selfish spirit, but he based the claims of the Irish people on those eternal principles of right which should ever guide the policy of statesmen and of nations. If these demands were conceded dissatisfaction would cease; but if they were refused, then dissatisfaction would continue to exist in Ireland until the Irish race had been banished from it. His reliance was upon the native virtue and intelligence of Englishmen; and he was confident that if they brought their love of justice and their intelligence to bear upon the question of his unfortunate countrymen, there would soon be an end of that state of things which imperilled the safety and the tranquillity of the Empire. In the hour of England's need the support of those to whose selfishness she had too long ministered would be but a poor substitute for the millions of true hearts and stout arms which by her policy she had alienated. He could not think that in these days of enlightenment it was their intention to rely upon brute force; his own reliance, in this hour of the crisis of Ireland, and, perhaps, also of England—his reliance was, as he had said, upon the native virtue of Englishmen; and he implored the Englishmen in that House, for the sake of their own country and of Ireland, to demand before it was too late, before blood had been shed, and passion had taken the place of reason, and before the demon of vengeance had been raised, to do something that would give a new direction to thought, by convincing the people that they might expect justice from this united Parliament. He hoped that the Amendment which he now placed in their hands would meet with the approval of the House and of this country, as he was confident it would of Ireland; and he would only further say, that whatever might be the result, he should press his Amendment to a division.

Amendment proposed,

In paragraph 22, to leave out from the word "our," to the end of the paragraph, in order to add the words "deep regret to Her Majesty that wide-spread disaffection exists in Ireland, and humbly to represent to Her Majesty that this wide-spread disaffection is the result of grave causes, which it is the duty of Her Majesty's Ministers to examine into and remove."—(The O'Donoghue.)

MR. BLAKE said, he had very great pleasure in seconding the Amendment of his hon. Friend, who had in his eloquent speech expressed himself so well on every topic connected with the subject before the House. It was not his (Mr. Blake's) intention to trespass long on the time of the House, for his main object in rising to second the Amendment was to interrogate the right hon. Gentleman, who was the representative of Her Majesty's Government in the House, as to what policy the Government intended to pursue in reference to the present state of Ireland. A considerable amount of surprise had been created by the only allusion made in Her Majesty's Speech to Ireland—an allusion which referred so much to measures of repression and prosecution, measures which had been resorted to a hundred times before, with a view to the pacification of Ireland, and had failed as often as they had been tried. So far as giving greater security to the Crown, he might say that, in common with many others, he was inspired with hope when the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland was made recently at the dinner of the Lord Mayor of Dublin, in which he very encouragingly stated that, although the Government had resolved upon strong measures of repression to put an end to the revolutionary movement in Ireland, at the same time it was the intention of the Government to inquire into the causes which required these repressive measures, and to take prompt remedial measures to prevent a recurrence of the same unsatisfactory state of things. Now, it would be exceedingly satisfactory to know whether these observations of the right hon. Gentleman had the concurrence of the Government, and it could scarcely be denied that the House had a right to expect some sort of statement with respect to the matter. His hon. Friend the Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue) had in his clever speech so clearly pointed out what the remedial measures were which the state of Ireland required that it was unnecessary almost for him (Mr. Blake) to offer any observations on that branch of the subject, as whatever he would say had been already much better said by the hon. Member for Tralee. Having to touch on so many topics the latter had not furnished the House with some statistics as to the condition of Ireland, to show its position as compared with twenty years ago, as well as its present state. For these statistics he was indebted mainly to the works published by Mr. Fisher, of Waterford, on subjects relative to Ireland, on which much labour and ability had been expended, and which afforded valuable sources of information; later he would also quote from a work from the same gentleman about being published, which had appeared in the form of letters in a leading London journal, on the supply of meat obtainable from foreign markets, which had much added to his reputation as a statician and able writer. According to a statement in the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Lords on the Consolidated Annuities, 1852—

"The gross value of the crops of 1846, had not this calamity (the famine) occurred, is estimated by Mr. Griffiths as follows:—Potatoes, 1,500,000 acres, value £18,000,000; oats, 4,000,000 acres, value £14,000,000; wheat, flax, and green crops, 2,000,000 acres, value £14,000,000; pasture and meadow, 6,500,000 acres, value £8,125,000; giving a total of 14,000,000 acres, and a total value of £51,125,000."

The population of Ireland was 8,250,000 and the value of the produce requiring human labour was £5 per head. Dr. Hancock also estimated the crops of 1862-3 at £27,327,772, of which the return from cattle was £9,751,188, and from crops requiring human labour £17,876,584. The population has been reduced to 5,250,000, and this produce was only equal to £3 per head against £5 per head in 1846. If the value of green crops be added to that of Sir Richard Griffiths' of grass and pasture it would be seen that the annual produce of Ireland was greater in 1846 than in 1861, though the quantity of live stock had increased. There cannot, therefore, have been that great increase in the supply of meat which some persons erroneously supposed. The acreage under each crop in 1862 and 1864 was as follows:—1862, wheat, 356,321; oats, 1,977,528; potatoes, 1,018,212; green crops, 463,772; 1864, wheat, 276,453; oats, 1,814,886; potatoes, 1,039,724; green crops, 401,020; showing a net decrease of 282,640 acres. It appears quite clear that the animal and vegetable produce of Ireland had both diminished in precisely the same ratio as the population. According to Mr. Donnelly, the produce from all descriptions of crops in 1865 was about thirty-five millions and a half. Last week Dr. O'Brien, Catholic Dean of Limerick, at the Irish National Association, had truly said in speaking of the decline of Ireland—In 1860, the value of the horses in Ireland was £4,958,488; in 1864, only £4,490,888; in 1860, the value of cattle was £23,441,451; in 1864, £21,172,508; in 1860, the value of sheep was £3,896,288; in 1864, it was £3,699,357; in 1860, the value of the pigs was £1,588,840; in 1864, it was £1,320,331. The total decrease in value on those items in 1864, as compared with 1860, was £3,201,965; in 1863, the quantity of land in Ireland going to waste was 4,543,166 acres; in 1864, the quantity was 4,601,234 acres, showing an increase of waste of 58,068 acres. Again, there was a decrease in cereals in 1864, as compared with 1863, of 122,437 acres. Here, then, we have a decrease of three millions and a quarter in the value of stock from 1860 to 1864; an increase of 58,068 acres going to waste in one year; a decrease of 122,437 acres under cereals in one year; and in nineteen years a decrease of tillage to the amount of 1,223,588 acres, and we are asked to be contented and happy. Need I say that we have a fine proof of our contentedness in the fact that one million and a half of our people ran away from misery between May 1851, and May 1864—that is, over 11,100 a year. It might be supposed—indeed, it had been frequently asserted—that since the population of Ireland had diminished from nearly 9,000,000, to about 5,500,000, that the present inhabitants were much better off by having proportionately a greater amount of produce to divide amongst them; such was not, however, the fact, for poor as the people were in the years just before the famine, on a moderate calculation he believed there was £1 per head more for them from the produce of the country, than there was last year, which was considered a good one. Now that fact, he thought, disposed of the boast about Irish prosperity, as compared with the time there was nearly double the population. As his hon. Friend had clearly pointed out, the remedy for the state of things he described was to give the tenant security for a just compensation for whatever improvements he made in the letting value of the land, in the event of his being evicted, or having to surrender possession. No doubt many hon. Members would say why have this exceptional legislation for Ireland as regards land; has not that country just the same, or just as good, laws respecting land as England? All this he admitted was quite true; but as regards agricultural customs, and the dealing of landlords with their tenants, the cases were very different. It should be borne in mind that Ireland was a conquered country; that nearly all her soil had been three times over confiscated to those who had subdued her; and that besides depriving the ancient inheritors of their estates, different customs and mode of tenure was forced on the humbler cultivator of the soil, to those to which he had been accustomed. Within almost a century laws existed, and were often strongly enforced, which forbade Papists, which really meant no farmer in Leinster, Connaught, or Munster, holding land for a term exceeding thirty-one years, on which three-fourths of the full yearly imposed value was not received for rent; while such were the cruel enactments against the great body of the people, the Protestants and Presbyterians of the North were fostered and encouraged by laws which, under the acts of settlement, or articles of plantation, compelled those who got grants of confiscated estates to let their farms out at rents which would enable the Protestant or Presbyterian tenant to prosper, and failing to do this, the landlord was liable to be deprived of his estates. And thus two laws which existed at the same time—the first conceived in fear, in hatred of a plundered race; and the other to encourage those differing with them in race and faith, became the normal arrangement between the owner and occupier of the soil; and, down to the present hour, influenced the transactions between landlord and tenant; whether as in the north, where custom had almost acquired the force of law in making the landlord not only let his land at a fair rent, and recognize the tenant's right to obtain the value of his improvements; or as in the south led the proprietor to generally exact the interest the tenant could pay, consistently with living in the poorest manner, tenancy-at-will, and a liability very often exercised of being evicted without being compensated for the improvements his industry had created. Exceptional legislation had been the main cause of these evils, so far as the people of the three provinces were concerned; and it was not, he thought, too much to ask that exceptional legislation should be demanded to remedy, to some extent, at least, the evils it had inflicted on Ireland; and he believed if that House, in its wisdom and justice, took the course which he and others suggested, that so far from injuring the landlords, that the value of their rentals would be increased, their property would be rendered more secure, and the people prosperous and contented, would, instead of being a source of apprehension and danger to the Government, become one of the bulwarks of the Empire; her right hand in the hour of danger instead of a sharp thorn in her side. What did Fenianism owe its origin to? To the settled conviction on the part of the people that what they complained of would not be redressed by constitutional means. He had been obliged to tell his constituents, after nearly ten years spent in that House, that he believed their votes and efforts were thrown away in sending him there, and his own life and means wasted in remaining, so far as there was any use in appealing to the justice or policy of Parliament on the one vital question for Ireland. Fenianism was strong, not on account of its enrolled members, but because it relied on the sympathy of the great mass of the people; the small farmers, tenants-at-will, half-paid labourers, poor artisans, impoverished tradespeople. In the United States it counted its numbers in hundreds of thousands of well-drilled soldiers who had fought and won the battles of the Union—in thousands of Irish evicted farmers who had become the owners of the land they tilled in America—but who strongly sympathized with their less fortunate kindred at home; and the number was still further augmented by the emigrants who daily left the shores of Ireland, carrying such settled feelings of vengeance in their hearts against England. He (Mr. Blake) lived almost in the centre of the southern proclaimed districts. The city he represented was proclaimed; the adjoining counties of Waterford, Tipperary, Cork, and Kilkenny, were either in whole or part proclaimed also; and he firmly believed that if the great mass of the people of these counties, and many others besides, only thought there was a good chance of success, that they would join in the revolution; and he was also persuaded, if the militia regiments raised in the south and west saw England in a difficulty, and that they thought by joining the insurgents they would insure success, they would do it. Now, he would ask the House was not that a deplorable picture for England? In his own locality he had done all in his power, when opportunity offered, to dissuade the people from enrolling themselves as Fenians; and represented to them, under existing circumstances, the utter folly and hopelessness of attempting to cope with the power of England. He felt he was, therefore, entitled to ask Government to do what they legitimately could to remove the cause of disaffection. He was interested in the maintenance of order, as if a successful insurrection took place, in the confusion that would ensue, he probably would lose nearly all on which he depended for his maintenance; and there were many well affected towards the Government, who would be great sufferers, and they had a right to expect that Parliament would do what it could to render them more secure. While on the subject of Fenianism, he would remark that the manner in which the political prisoners, lately convicted, had been treated, had caused great disaffection in many parts of Ireland. It was generally understood that prisoners convicted of political offences should not be treated like common felons. It would be in the recollection of the House that no one had more eloquently laid down than the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the treatment of political prisoners ought to be different from the treatment of other prisoners. He was indebted for his authority on that subject to a letter of an hon. Friend of his, the late Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy), whom he sincerely hoped soon to see again in that House. Mr. Hennessy had quoted a passage from a letter addressed by the right hon. Gentleman to Lord Aberdeen, in which he denounced the Neapolitan Government for having obliged their political prisoners to shave their heads and beards. He granted the right of the Government to punish the persons convicted as political prisoners; but the treatment which they had received was quite different from that of Mr. Smith O'Brien and other political prisoners in 1848, who were taken red-handed in revolt, and whom the Government gave orders to treat as gentlemen. The Fenian prisoners were compelled, after their conviction, to shave off their beards, they were put into convict dress and, previous to being sent on board ship they were heavily ironed; this fact he had from an eye-witness. On their arrival at Pentonville Prison those unfortunate men were subjected to a punishment similar to that inflicted on footpads, burglars, and other criminals of the very lowest grade. The effect of the treatment at Pentonville Prison on the prisoners had been well described by a high authority, Chatham, who stated that when the unhappy men were transferred from Pentonville numbers of them fell into fits, and it was only by allowing them to associate for a fortnight before they left the former prison that this was prevented. The same gentleman stated that for weeks after the prisoners arrived there from Pentonville, it would be absurd to treat them as rational men. Such was the nature of the punishment to which the men recently convicted of treason in Ireland were doomed. The matter was one well worthy of the attention of the House—well worthy of the attention of the right hon. Gentleman who had in such eloquent language denounced the treatment to which the Neapolitan prisoners were subjected. Those Neapolitan prisoners were all, it should not be forgotten, found guilty of as serious an offence against the laws of the country as were the Irish political prisoners—in many cases of a far more serious offence, for some of them had been convicted of plotting the assassination of the King of Naples. He trusted that before the sitting was over he would hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or some other occupant of the Treasury Bench, an assurance that, during the present Session, measures would be brought forward calculated to put a stop to the present deplorable condition of things in Ireland. If that assurance was not given, he would have no alternative save to follow the hon. Member for Tralee into the division lobby.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAWSON): Sir, I am sure it is unnecessary for me to bespeak the kind indulgence of the House while I rise to make a few observations in answer to the speech of the hon. Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue), followed by one from the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake), and to state the grounds on which it appears to me that this House ought not to accede to the Amendment proposed. I was glad to hear from the hon. Member for Tralee the emphatic statement, which he repeated more than once, that he had no anti-English feeling. I am glad that the hon. Member has made that public declaration, for I think it will be of considerable value to himself. But I can only say that, however valuable it may be to himself, it is at the same time one by no means calculated to advance his popularity with the members of the Fenian Brotherhood. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has made the observation, because—although I confess his speech was characterized—as his speeches always are—by great ability, nevertheless, I think that he has introduced into it some matters of the tone and temper of which, exhibited in the British House of Commons, I might fairly complain. Although, Sir, I am a new Member of the House of Commons, and this is the first occasion on which I have had the honour of speaking here, I have no hesitation in saying that I cannot give any credence to the statement of the hon. Gentleman that Ireland has entirely lost the power of self-government. Nor can I attach any weight to the statement that 105 Irish Members in this House are not able to carry any measure in favour of their country, because they are sure to be outnumbered by the English and Scotch Members. Sir, I do not believe that such is the spirit or temper of the British House of Commons. On the contrary, I am confident that if the 105 Irish Members, or any considerable number of them, were united together in support of any measure which they conscientiously believed to be for the benefit of their country, such measure would receive a full, fair, and impartial consideration, as has always been given under such circumstances by the House of Commons. I therefore think there is no foundation whatever for the statement of the hon. Member for Tralee, that Ireland is deprived of the power of self-government. I, for one, think, as the hon. Member has referred to matters connected with the Act of Union, and has spoken of evils which he attributes to it, that the results have been very different from those alleged. I look upon the question in this light—that it is a much nobler and a higher destiny for a country like Ireland to be able to send representatives into this honourable House to take part in discussions relating to this mighty Empire. Irish Members have been always treated in this House with respect; and I am convinced that when those representatives do present themselves to its notice, acting honestly and suggesting bona fide measures for the good of their country, that they never will fail to receive a just and impartial hearing from both English and Scotch Members. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake) has introduced a matter which appears to me to be alien to the actual subject under discussion, and therefore I am anxious to dispose of it before proceeding to deal with the arguments used by the hon. Member for Tralee, which are entitled to an answer from me, and to every consideration of this House. The hon. Member for Waterford introduced the topic connected with the treatment of the prisoners convicted in the recent political trials in Ireland. I have made it my business to inquire into the matter, and I have ascertained that the statements so industriously made in respect to such treatment are entirely and utterly destitute of foundation. The most absurd and unfounded statements have been circulated. For instance, a statement has been made that corporal punishment has been inflicted on one of these prisoners in Pontonville Prison. I repeat that such a statement is utterly without foundation. And yet that statement has been repeatedly made, accompanied with such details and particulars as would make one suppose that it could only have been made by one who was himself present at the occurrence. Now this story is not only untrue, but there is not the slightest shadow of foundation for it. The hon. Member for Waterford has stated—of course on information furnished to him—that the recently-convicted prisoners in Ireland, now in Pontonville, are undergoing a system of separate confinement; that they are subjected to great and unnecessary severity, and are compelled to herd with footpads, robbers, and the vilest felons. Now, that statement is not correct. It is true they are undergoing the separate system of punishment, but they are not made to associate with the persons whom he has described.

MR. BLAKE: I wish to say a word in explanation. I did not say that the Irish political prisoners were compelled to herd with robbers, foot-pads, and other felons, because, being subjected to the separate system of punishment, it is of course obvious that such could not be the case. But what I said was, that at Pontonville the political prisoners were subjected to the same mode of treatment dealt out to the ordinary malefactors.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND: That is totally different from what I supposed the hon. Gentleman to state. Those political prisoners must necessarily be subjected to the same system as other persons convicted of equally grave offences. Is British law, I ask, to have respect to persons, and to say, if one man is able to raise himself to the position of a State prisoner by compassing to overthrow the government and the institutions of the country, that, on that account, he is to be treated with more leniency and tenderness than an humbler individual guilty of a heinous crime, into which his ignorance may have led him, or his poverty tempted him to commit? Sir, I think it would be unworthy of any Government to treat such a man with greater severity than any offender of the former class; and, therefore, whilst the most scrupulous care has been taken to prevent any undue severity being practised, instructions were given that those political prisoners should be dealt with precisely in the same way as any other persons in that prison convicted of crime and sentenced to penal servitude. No additional punishment of any kind is inflicted on them, their treatment is exactly similar; and I have heard no argument adduced by the hon. Member for Waterford to show why it should be otherwise. In respect to the letter referred to by the hon. Member for Waterford, written some years ago by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, a letter on the subject of the treatment given to the Neapolitan State prisoners, I beg to remind the hon. Gentleman that the observations to which he alluded had reference not, like the men of whose treatment the hon. Gentleman complains, convicted felons, but to untried prisoners, who were kept in custody and subjected to much severity without having been brought to trial. But it never was intended by the writer to say—nor could my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer have ever intended to lay down as a general principle—that political prisoners convicted of conspiracy to overthrow the Government were to be dealt with in a different manner from other prisoners whose crimes after all were not of a more heinous character. I know no such principle in British law as that when a man is convicted of a political offence, if he be one who had occupied a respectable position in society, or a man who had a certain halo around his name, he is to be dealt with more leniently than any other felon convicted of an equal offence and was sentenced to the same punishment. I have, I think, disposed of the observations of the hon. Member for Waterford, in which he referred to the treason-felony prisoners, and I will now venture to approach the immediate subject-matter brought forward by the hon. Member for Tralee. The hon. Gentleman introduced the question regarding Ireland in the shape of an Amendment to the Address moved in this House in reply to the gracious Speech of Her Majesty. The Address does not allege the existence of any general spirit of disaffection in Ireland, but states—what was an undoubted and incontrovertible fact—that a conspiracy against law and order in these countries had been proved to exist in Ireland, a conspiracy condemned, as the hon. Member for Tralee stated, by all classes of the community, by the clergy especially, and by no one more emphatically than by the hon. Member himself.

THE O'DONOGHUE: I am sure the right hon. Gentleman (the Attorney General for Ireland) would not attribute anything to me which I did not say. I beg to state that I did not express any condemnation.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND: I am sorry I should have attributed to the hon. Gentleman anything that he has not said. I think if he did not condemn the Fenian organization he ought to have condemned it, for it is condemned by the unanimous opinion of every right-thinking man in the Empire. I was stating that this conspiracy existed; and then Her Majesty's Speech goes on to state that it has been dealt with by the ordinary legal and constitutional tribunals of the country, and, as I trust, in accordance with the facts. For this temperate expression of an undoubted fact contained in the Speech, the hon. Member for Tralee proposes to substitute the paragraph which he has submitted to the House; and to substitute for an undoubted fact, as to the existence of the conspiracy, another matter which it appears to me is not at all germane to the subject—namely, that wide-spread disaffection exists in Ireland, the result of grave causes which it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to examine into and remove. I do not stand here to deny that it is the duty of Her Majesty's Ministers to examine into and remove, if they can, any cause or causes of disaffection, whether existing in Ireland or in any other part of the United Kingdom; and I am certain I express their sentiments when I say that it is their anxious wish and desire favourably to consider and entertain any reasonable proposition that might be put forward for the removal of any real grievance affecting Ireland. The consideration of such grievances, moreover, would not be in the slightest degree prejudiced as far as they were concerned by the existence of this conspiracy, calculated though it might well be to prejudice the minds of the English nation and of the English House of Commons against the country where that conspiracy had taken root. But for the House to accede to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Tralee would, I think, be a most dangerous thing; for its adoption would carry with it this consequence, if ingrafted on the statement in the Address with regard to the Fenian conspiracy, that this conspiracy resulted from those grave causes which it was the duty of Her Majesty's Ministers to examine into and remove.

Anyone who had read the history of the Fenian conspiracy must be perfectly aware that it has not sprung, as the hon. Member for Tralee supposed, from the misgovernment of the country. The avowed aim of the Fenian conspiracy was not to improve, but to destroy the institutions under which we live. Its organ denounced in unmistakable terms all constitutional agitation for the redress of grievances, and all appeals to the Imperial Parliament. It even represented the granting of Catholic emancipation as injurious to the cause of Ireland, because it tended to render Roman Catholics more loyal to British rule. Those are the sentiments avowed by the organ of the conspiracy; and yet the House is now asked to say by implication that the existence of that conspiracy is to be traced to grave causes which it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to examine into and remove. In like manner it was declared that the only hope for Ireland lay in an entire revolution, which would restore the land to its rightful owners, and "root out robbers from the land." I am quoting now the very words of articles which have been established in proof upon the occasions when these conspirators were convicted. Finding this to be the line taken, can anybody believe, or will this House be induced to give their assent to the proposition now before them, that the conspiracy was caused by the pressure of unjust laws upon Ireland? Surely the hon. Member must have forgotten that the conspiracy is not confined to Ireland, but extends in immense ramifications to those of the Irish race now sharing in the benefits of the Constitution of the United States, and to some even, I regret to say, among the Irish domiciled in this country and now enjoying the benefits of English rule uncontaminated by the administration of the law as it is supposed to exist in Ireland. Its influence has even shown itself among the persons allowed to compete in the labour-market with Englishmen, and to participate in the advantages and achievements growing out of the almost boundless expenditure of capital in the busy hives of industry. Knowing well the true character of this conspiracy, I believe that any attempt to extenuate or palliate its guilt by suggesting grievances, out of which it might possibly have sprung, will be construed into sympathy with the designs of the conspirators, and I feel sure the House of Commons will not commit itself to any declaration that can be supposed to express sympathy or to be capable of being treated as an excuse for men who have banded themselves together in a daring, though hopeless, attempt to overthrow the British rule. With conspirators of this kind the Government can hold no parley; they cannot negotiate with traitors with arms in their hands. They must be dealt with—as I hope they have been dealt with—according to law, administered in a spirit of vigour, but still with moderation. At the same time, I must express my conviction that Her Majesty's Government would be unwise and short-sighted indeed if they made the existence of such a conspiracy a reason or an excuse for turning aside from investigating any real grievance said to exist which might be removed by constitutional means. I should rather say that the proved existence of such a conspiracy renders it a duty incumbent on Her Majesty's Government more seriously and anxiously to inquire whether there is any cause for this disaffection which it is within their power to remove; because it now behoves the Government of this country to endeavour to combine into one body all the loyal and well-affected subjects of the kingdom, by showing them that the ear of the Imperial Parliament is not closed to their remonstrance, and that the Minister who holds the reins of power in Ireland, as in England, is animated with an anxious desire to promote the interests of that country. Anything which will admit of a practical revision, if brought forward, will, I feel sure, receive at the hands of Her Majesty's Government the most careful and most deliberate consideration. I am not aware that there are any other matters in the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Tralee to which I need refer. He has spoken in the strongest terms of the dislike which exists in Ireland to English rule, and he has spoken in terms of condemnation of certain expressions used by the Crown lawyers in the course of the trials, and by the Puisne Judges, condemning the conspiracy. But I know no language strong enough or emphatic enough to condemn it. It stands condemned by its own manifestoes and its own acts. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Tralee might well have spared the observation, for I believe the learned Judges and the Crown lawyers in the discharge of their arduous duties made no observations with respect to the criminals calculated in the slightest degree to prejudice their case, and that everything they did say was warranted and sustained by the evidence produced upon the trials. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Tralee says there is a dislike in Ireland to English rule, but that it might be removed; and I, for one, heartily wish it were in the power of the Government or of this House to remove it. Every thoughtful man who has lived in Ireland has his own views as to the measures necessary to put an end to the spread of disaffection in that country; and I leave it to such men to say whether a spirit of disaffection such as has shown itself in this conspiracy is to be got rid of by proposals such as those of the hon. Member. But as it would ill become me to canvass any of them on the present occasion, I shall decline to follow the hon. Gentleman the Member for Tralee into the statement of what he expects at the hands of Her Majesty's Government, such as diverting all surplus revenue to Ireland, and of imposing a heavy tax upon absentees. I hope, however, some time hence, to see the hon. Gentleman himself rise in his place to propose a specific measure to that effect, and then I shall be able to discuss it on its merits. I do not now consider myself at liberty to enter upon those subjects, and I shall therefore content myself with merely stating that I agree with the hon. Gentleman that it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to direct their attention to the causes of disaffection in Ireland, and to express my belief that Her Majesty's Government is animated with a sincere desire to do full and complete justice to Ireland. I trust the House will agree with me that the Amendment proposed by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Tralee should not be adopted.

Mr. GEORGE said, the paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech with reference to Ireland contained three distinct propositions to which no fair and reasonable man could dissent—namely, that a conspiracy dangerous to the prosperity and the welfare of Ireland existed in that country; secondly, that every man possessed of property in that country was hostile to it; and lastly, that (at the eleventh hour) all the ordinary constitutional means were put in force to repress it and put it down. Whilst he admitted that it was a most notorious conspiracy, he could not go so far as to say the Government were justified in postponing their measures until so late a period to put down the threatened rebellion. When they were taken they proved effectual, and he bore testimony to the able manner in which the trials had been conducted and brought to a conclusion by the learned Judges who presided and the able Crown lawyers who had conducted them. The admirable temper, able judgment, and sound knowledge of law, and the spirit in which justice had been administered in Ireland by Mr. Justice Keogh and Mr. Justice Fitzgerald had been a common topic of observation, and the conspirators had acknowledged that they had experienced fair play at the hands of the Law Officers of the Crown. In many instances, those who had been convicted had admitted the justice of the severe sentence which had been passed upon them. A full knowledge of the conspiracy, its nature, and the circumstances attending it, was possessed by Her Majesty's Government long before they acted in December last. The sales of landed property had practically ceased, and English capitalists had been calling in their money for some time past, from the extreme insecurity there was arising from the wide-spread conspiracy. It was known to the Government so long ago as 1848 that a conspiracy of the same description then existed, and the present Head Centre, Mr. Stephens, was well known to have been a coadjutor of Mr. Smith O'Brien. From 1848 to 1859, when Lord Derby came into office, nothing was done; but when he came into power the first step his Government took was to bring the parties engaged in the then conspiracy to justice. The Phoenix conspiracy of 1859 was the Fenian conspiracy of to-day. There was the same connection between them and America then as there was now, the only difference being that at that time the United States were in the enjoyment of peace and tranquillity, and there were no persons to come over and foment and foster rebellion. Now we had a portion of the disbanded American army, composed of Irishmen, come back to feed the flame of rebellion in Ireland. His right hon. Friend the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Whiteside), who was in 1859 Attorney General for Ireland, and himself, were sent down to Tralee and Cork to prosecute certain persons under the Treason-Felony Act, the same Act under which the recent prosecutions had taken place. There were the same proofs of overt acts in administering oaths, treasonable letters, nocturnal meetings, drillings, &c., though they lacked the articles of a treasonable character which were written by some of the persons who had lately been tried, and which threw a light on the conspiracy. Lord Derby's Government had not the benefit of such evidence, but notwithstanding that they put a man named Daniel Sullivan upon his trial. He was tried by that able criminal Judge Mr. Baron Greene; the trial occupied several days, and about fifty witnesses were examined for the Crown; the jury could not agree—ten being in favour of a conviction, and two of an acquittal—they were discharged, and the Commission adjourned until after the Commission at Cork was concluded. Sullivan was then again put upon his trial, when he was found guilty and sentenced to ten years' penal servitude. Another man, called Jerry O'Donovan, but known as Rossa, was put on trial and a bill found against him at Cork. He had written a letter, in which he stated that "he was of opinion that nothing but cold steel and cold lead," as he expressed it, "could settle the question at issue." Yet would it be believed that when the present Government came into office these men were set at liberty. The right hon. Gentleman now the Secretary of State for the Colonies was then Secretary for Ireland, and it was for him to tell the House why men of this description were allowed to go at large. During the trial of these men at Tralee and Cork every effort was made by the Government to secure Stephens, but was made in vain. He was known under a number of aliases and many changes of attire. He then went to America, and remained for a considerable time; but he came back years ago, and his first act was to establish, by the hands of the men so justly convicted of late of treason-felony, that nest of pestilent sedition, the office of The People newspaper in Dublin, and the Government were required to give to the peaceable people of Ireland a reason why they allowed this paper to go on so many months unseathed, knowing, as they must have done, that it was read in every pot-house in Ireland, and was spreading its poison among the whole of the population. Although probably not one single owner of property in Ireland sanctioned or countenanced this conspiracy, there were masses of people who did, and who would, if an armed force came into the country, or an armed insurrection broke out in the land, lend their assistance, some few from inclination, many more from intimidation and fear. He, therefore, said that, although the Government were entitled to great credit for the manner in which the prosecutions had lately been conducted, they had a heavy account to settle for the delay that took place in putting law and justice into operation. He had listened attentively to the eloquent speech of the hon. Member for Tralee, and he had only one word to say to the Amendment of the hon. Member. His speech contained no efficient suggestion as to the manner of redressing what he was pleased to call the grievances of Ireland. The hon. Gentleman had indeed mentioned that wonderful panacea, tenant-right; but when that question underwent the most careful consideration at the hands of the Committee obtained last year by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire), and every project and nostrum that could be brought forward came to be properly examined, no plain or satisfactory solution of the alleged land difficulty could be discovered; it was found that they must leave the matter to the good feeling of the landlords and the tenants, and that the vague and visionary theories which some had shadowed out could not be carried into practical effect. The Government would, therefore, do well to wait and see what practical measures could be proposed, and not rashly hold out hopes which might lead to the idea that this rebellion was based on grievances of that kind, or that if these nostrums were adopted to-morrow they would be the means of arresting it. With regard to the threatened motion respecting the Irish Church, he would only at present say that, putting the religious aspect of the question out of view, if they polled the peasantry, the farmers, and the labouring men of Ireland, they would find that no class of society was more prized or looked up to in their own districts than the clergy of the Established Church; and it would be an evil day for that country when that most estimable body of resident gentry were interfered with. He believed that that sub-soil of disaffection which had been spoken of that night had been to a great extent engendered and increased by the unguarded language of persons in high places, who, having in view temporary political objects on the eve of a general election or the like, let fall words to which an ignorant people naturally attached weight. Thus, although the mischievous language used might be forgotten as soon as it had answered its end by those who employed it, still it remained like bad seed sown in the popular mind, and fructitified, perhaps, after many days. He had extracts from the speeches delivered by those who should have carefully abstained from making them, but he would not trouble the House by reading them. He would only say that they had emanated from men who were still Members of the Legislature, some of them filling high positions, and that it was not surprising if they did a vast amount of harm. He would not pursue the subject further, as a full opportunity of doing so would be afforded when the question of the Irish Church came on for discussion. He should conclude by expressing his intention to vote against the Amendment.

SIR HENRY BARRON said, he was unable to see that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Tralee gave the slightest support or countenance to that miserable conspiracy in Ireland called Fenianism. If it did, he would be the first man in the House to vote against it. But, looking carefully at the words of that Amendment, he thought that every Member of the House, on whichever side he sat, ought to support it. If he needed proof of this he found it in the words of the noble Lord who proposed the Address, and, even still stronger, in the words of the hon. Secunder, who represented one of the largest constituencies in Scotland. The noble Lord had said—

“Had not the prosecutions unmistakably shown the loyalty of the class of men who composed the juries? . . . He did not think, if it was the first, it was the only duty to put down a conspiracy like this, disapproved as it was by the influential classes of the community. There could be no doubt it resulted from a strong feeling of disaffection among the low classes of Ireland, and if it did there must be some cause for it.”

In every word of this he (Sir Henry Barron) fully concurred. But in doing so he was far from giving the slightest countenance to the unfortunate men who had been engaged in the conspiracy. He could not condemn the rebellion in terms too strong. He did not know one person of position in Ireland who did not disapprove of these mischievous proceedings. But was this the first conspiracy which had occurred in Ireland during the last half century? On the contrary, had there not been several rebellions or insurrections in Ireland during the last sixty or seventy years? He, therefore, thought it was the duty of the Government to put an end to such a state of things by a searching inquiry into the causes of this disaffection. It was impossible to believe that any country could be permanently in a state of disaffection without a cause. He believed there were many causes of Irish discontent. How else account for the constant emigration of the Irish people to foreign countries? The hon. Gentleman who seconded the Address also, in the course of his speech, said—

“It was surely the duty of the Government to endeavour to ascertain why this disaffection and discontent existed. They should endeavour to discover whether the reason of this feeling was the present condition of the landlord and tenant laws or the laws relating to education, or some grave wrong existing in the present relations of the religious institutions of the country.”

Now, it was somewhat remarkable that both the noble Lord and the hon. Gentleman—the one representing a large agricultural, and the other a great commercial constituency—should have recommended inquiry into the causes of the discontent prevailing in Ireland almost in the very words of the hon. Member for Tralee. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Graham) said it was the duty of that House to ascertain the cause of the disaffection existing in Ireland. Well, the Amendment only went to that extent. The hon. Member for Glasgow recommended that a searching inquiry should be made into the causes of this misconduct, so as to ascertain whether it arose from the present condition of the laws regulating the relations between landlord and tenant, or the state of education, or some great wrong connected with the religious institutions of the country. Now these were grave causes of discontent lying on the surface of the question. Any one who knew anything of the country and the opinion of the people of Ireland must be aware that such was the case. But were there no other causes? There were other serious causes. He was one of a most influential deputation to the late Prime Minister three years ago, asking, not a grant of money, but the grant of a charter to the Roman Catholic University of Ireland. A charter and a large endowment had been granted to the Protestant University of Dublin, a charter and an endowment had been granted to a University which had no particular religion at all; but the late Prime Minister, in stronger language than he was in the habit of using, plumply refused to grant a charter to any Roman Catholic University in Ireland. This refusal was regarded by the majority of the Roman Catholics of Ireland—the Catholics comprising seven-eighths of the population—as a great grievance and a great insult, from the bishops and archbishops of the Church down to the humblest of the people. Another cause of disaffection in Ireland was the oath which the Parliament required to be taken at the table by Roman Catholics, and which that Parliament had refused to alter so as to bring it in accordance with their feelings. This was felt to be a great indignity to the people of Ireland; and hon. Gentlemen opposite lost at least fifteen votes at the last election by their conduct on that occasion in Parliament. Again, of the fifteen Members who formed the Cabinet not one was an Irishman. Then look at the Irish appointments. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was an Englishman. The Secretary for Ireland, up to within a few weeks, was also an Englishman. Then, the Under Secretary for Ireland was also an Englishman. Did hon. Members think that the people of Ireland were so stupid and so ignorant as not to see the insult thus passed on them? He could assure the House that they felt it most acutely; and that there was not a reflecting man in Ireland who did not regard this state of things as an insult. Again, almost every public office in Ireland was headed by an Englishman. He was not attacking individuals, but a principle. The head of the Excise was an Englishman; the head of the Customs was an Englishman; the head of the Irish Board of Works was an Englishman; the head of the Poor Law Board was an Englishman; even the head of the Irish Constabulary was an Englishman. There was scarcely a department of patronage, position, or station in Ireland that was not headed by an Englishman. Would the English tolerate such a state of things in England? Well, all these things united formed an abundant source of discontent in Ireland. He would observe, with deference to the illustrious individuals to whom he was about to allude, that it appeared to the Irish people that the Royal Family had ignored the fact that there was such a part of Her Majesty's dominions as Ireland, and yet there was no part of Her Majesty's dominions in which she had been more enthusiastically received when, like angels' visits, few and far between, she visited that country. She might have exclaimed, in the words of a great conqueror of old, “Veni, vidi, vici,” for she had conquered the hearts of the people by her virtues and her high character. The reception on both her visits to Ireland was like that given to Maria Theresa, when she visited her Hungarian subjects, and they said, "Our blood and lives are at your disposal." Loyalty always had been a characteristic of the Irish people. They had been devoted to their ancient kings—the O'Briens, the O'Connors, and O'Neills who had reigned in ancient times, and to their chieftains, the O'Donnells, the O'Farrells, the Desmonds, and the Kildares. Loyalty was essentially a part of their character, and if they were placed on a perfect equality with the people of this country they would exceed them in devotion and loyalty in every sense of the word. When the English people thought fit to behead one King, what did the Irish people do? They stood by their lawful Sovereign and supported Charles II. against all the power of England, headed by that ruthless conqueror Cromwell. They stood with equal fidelity to James II., with all his faults, and it required the great military skill of William III., Schomberg, and Marlborough, to subdue them. It was an enormous mistake to appeal to conspiracies, and insurrections, and rebellions in a free country like Ireland. They had their representatives in Parliament, and were able to appeal to that tribunal; he had such faith in the honesty and intelligence of the people of England and Scotland that he believed they could not appeal in vain. He himself had seen the greatest measures of conciliation, reform, and improvement take place in this country against fearful opponents, great talent, and powerful opposition in and out of this House. He did not forget that the House had granted Catholic emancipation, reform in Parliament, free trade, the abolition of slavery, the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, and various other important changes; and he would say to the people of Ireland, "Nisi desperandum, persevere in a constitutional manner; present your complaints to the House, and no Minister will dare to refuse you so long as you have right and justice on your side." With reference to the Amendment, if he thought it gave any support, directly or indirectly, to the Fenian movement he would not give it his support. He thought it would have been politic on the part of the Government if they had put similar words into Her Majesty's Speech, and followed them up in a spirit of conciliation, showing the people of Ireland that they were in earnest, and capable of grappling with the difficulties which six centuries of misrule had generated in Ireland. The result of that long period of misgovernment had been within the last sixty or seventy years rebellions, insurrections, conspiracies, and various Coercion and Arms Acts. Now, that was not the way to govern any country. It was the duty of the Government to probe the evils of the country, and to apply a remedy to those evils. Half measures would not do. If the Government acted in a proper spirit towards Ireland they would achieve a greater victory than that of Waterloo, for they would conquer the people of Ireland, not by the sword, but by kindness and justice. Before sitting down, he wished to state the opinion of the highest Catholic authority in Ireland (Dr. Cullen) on the subject—

"Every man who does not shut his eyes against the truth must fully understand that Fenianism is not indeed a dangerous or powerful, but a foolish and a wicked conspiracy against the existing civil authorities, and still more against the divinely constituted authority of the Church of God. Its effects have been most injurious to the country, turning away the minds of the people from their legitimate occupation to wicked, wild, and impracticable projects, disturbing the course of trade, interrupting business, and giving a pretext to the Orange lodges of Ireland to arm all their members, to the great risk of the peace of the country. So far from being a Catholic movement it has been from its first onset conducted by leaders known to be infidels and avowed enemies of the Catholic Church."

Mr. WESTROPP said, that reference had been made by several hon. Members who had addressed the House before him to what, whether correctly or not, were grievances in the opinion of the lower classes of the people in Ireland. It had been stated that the Protestant Church in Ireland was one cause of Fenianism; that the circumstance of the relations between landlord and tenant being in an unsatisfactory state had also conduced to Fenianism; and that the result of these two misfortunes to Ireland was the great emigration from the country. He would not now discuss the Irish Church question and the landlord and tenant question, as no doubt other occasions for so doing would present themselves; but with regard to the exodus of the population from Ireland, he maintained that, so far from being the consequence of grievances, it resulted from the natural order of things. He did not know personally the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill), but he knew he stood in the presence of a distinguished political economist, the Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), and he ventured to say before him that the increase of population would always be in proportion to the capital which is destined to support that population. Now, bearing this in mind, and looking back a little to the history of Ireland, it would be seen what had been its effect. And here, in limine, he must protest against the habit that Irish Members had of perpetually raking up the fires of past grievances. He was fully willing to admit that the penal laws in Ireland were wrong and mischievous, and that they produced the usual effects which wrong and mischief entail; but he would ask whether the people of England had never had grievances to complain of? Were not the Test and Corporation Acts pro tanto penal laws? And were they not repealed subsequently to the laws called par excellence penal laws? But did the people of this country ever quarrel over the carcass of these defunct laws? The gentlemen who once opposed or advocated the repeal of these statutes had now ceased to wrangle about them—they had had their fight—the thing was now done with, and they let it rest. But in Ireland, whenever any discontent arose, they instantly went back to the penal statutes which had been repealed for nearly fifty years. To return from this digression, he would remark that when the 40s. freeholders were established in Ireland, towards the close of the last century, both the landlords and the Roman Catholic clergy perceived that it was their interest to increase the population on their lands as much as possible. The Roman Catholic gentry were at that time disqualified from entering Parliament, and therefore the landlords—for the greater part Protestants—allotted their lands and made sham 40s. freeholders, so that they might be able to go to the hustings with a long tail of these men. The greater the number of 40s. freeholders they could bring to the poll, so much the greater was the influence they could bring to bear upon the county Member in order to induce him to procure their sons and dependents places in various situations. The Roman Catholic clergy, who then as now were paid by the contributions of their flocks, of course opposed no obstacle to this increase of population, and so they and the landlords increased in a fictitious way the population of the country. This they were enabled to do by creating a fictitious capital—an unlimited supply of potatoes. Things went on in this way until the year 1829, when the Catholic Relief Bill was passed. Roman Catholics then became eligible as Members of Parliament, and the landlords found that their power over the tenants was gone. The consequence was that they steadfastly set their faces against the subdivision of land, and endeavoured to thrust out as many small tenants as possible; and when the £4 clause was introduced into the Poor Laws, whereby it was enacted that the landlords must pay the rates levied on all farms assessed at £4 and under, they all eagerly strove to thrust out the small occupiers. Hence one cause of the very great emigration from the Irish shores. In 1846, when the failure of the potato crop took place, those persons who had small farms found it impossible to continue on them, and from that time, in consequence of the wages of labour being higher in America, an efflux from Ireland took place. In his judgment that efflux was the natural result of politico-economic causes, and in no way attributable to grievances such as those the hon. Gentleman the Member for Tralee had specified. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had on some occasion remarked that there were a vast number of amateur Chancellors of the Exchequer. Now, the hon. Member for Tralee had elected himself an amateur Home Secretary, and had propounded what he deemed to be a panacea for Ireland. He (Mr. Westropp) would not venture to follow in the hon. Member's footsteps, but this he would say—that if Ireland was to be governed rightly and discreetly, it must be governed without any reference to party. In Ireland there existed two parties, the constitution of which people did not sufficiently understand. In the South there was a large body of Roman Catholics, formidable from their numbers, while in the North were the descendants of the old Scottish Covenanters almost equally strong from their indomitable resolution. The Orangemen of the North were still animated with the old spirit which animated the Covenanters, and which compelled the English Government to allow them to have their own ritual and their own way of going on. That spirit was of such a nature that they would never allow themselves to be worsted in anything they undertook. Thus, there were two parties in the country, one strong in numbers, and the other strong in consequence of the spirit which actuated them.

For many years Ireland had been governed by an oscillatory Government. At one time the Government was Conservative, and at another time Liberal. Therefore, each of the two parties had to see what Government would be most likely to favour it; and the consequence was that the Lord Lieutenant—who was a sham which it would be a good thing to get rid of—leaned to one side or the other, and thereby caused the party of which he was for the moment the partisan, to be the party which held its head up. For his own part, he believed that the Irish were a good and a loyal people if left to themselves; but the fact was that sinister forces were brought to bear upon them. There were at the present moment persons who held their power, and he might say their existence, by reason of their opposition to this country, and he believed in his heart that until Ireland was governed like Somersetshire, or Yorkshire, or any other part of the British dominions, without any intermediate power, it would not be possible to establish tranquillity and peace in that part of the British dominions.

MR. SYNAN said, he differed from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgewater (Mr. Westropp) in describing the Government of Ireland a sham—English and Scotch Members might use such language, but the people of Ireland, at least, did not look upon the Lord Lieutenant as a sham. Nor could he without qualification agree with the Attorney General for Ireland, when he said that Ireland by her union with England was raised in the political scale. He so far agreed with the right hon. and learned Gentleman that if they governed Ireland as an integral portion of the Empire, and as they governed Scotland, it would raise her in the political scale:—but while Ireland was treated partly as a conquered province, and partly as an integral part of the Empire, she would not be elevated, but degraded. He desired to express his thanks to the Mover and the Seconder of the Address for the terms in which they had spoken of Ireland. If the representative of the Government in that House adopted the same tone in his observations as those hon. Members had done in theirs, he was satisfied that the object of the hon. Member for Tralee would be fully effected. Nobody who had studied the history of Ireland would hesitate to admit that causes of discontent existed in that country. He did not imagine that any

that there were causes of discontent in Ireland; and that being so, there was no difference of opinion between the hon. Member for Tralee and Her Majesty's Government. He should not now enter into any discussion of those causes, for he had no doubt he would have an opportunity of doing so fully before the Session was over. He, however, believed that there never was a more opportune moment for applying a remedy to those grievances than the present. The great body of the people had stood aloof from Fenianism and had remained faithful to their allegiance, and so far they were entitled to the favour of the Government, and the kind consideration of this House. Now was the time for the Government to pursue a policy of conciliation towards Ireland, undeterred by opposition or the selfishness of a class. A few conciliatory words to Ireland at the present moment would be productive of the greatest benefit. It had been said that the cause of the misery of Ireland was agitation—constitutional agitation. He knew not whether hon. Gentlemen on the other side would echo that assertion, but if they did he would refer them, as he would refer all, to the history of the world in disproof of it. Whatever merit might be due to the Government for the manner in which they had dealt with Fenianism, he ventured to assert that it was the constitutional party in Ireland, and not the Government, that had put down Fenianism, and that unless they had been supported by that party their efforts to put it down would not have been successful. It was on behalf of that constitutional party that he asked the Government whether they were not entitled to the reward of their patriotism? Whether or not the present state of Ireland was the effect of agitation, he hoped they would probe the causes of it to the bottom, otherwise they would only skin and film over the ulcerous part. He had, however, great hope from the sound and liberal political principles of the right hon. Gentleman who represented the Government in that House. He hoped that the opening of a new Parliament might be the dawn of a new era and of a new policy for Ireland—a policy that should bind Ireland to this country, not only by the golden link of the Crown, but by the indissoluble ties of social progress and material prosperity. There was a time when one of the greatest of our modern statesmen had thought it his duty to adopt a policy of conciliation towards Ireland, and he dared to hope that the pupil and successor of that great man, inheriting as he did his principles, his wisdom, and his great administrative capacity, would follow his example, and declare to them that night his resolution to send another message of peace to Ireland.

MR. WHALLEY said, that so far as the Amendment related to an inquiry by the Government into the causes of discontent in Ireland he should gladly support it, but he had a few words to say in reference to the assertion that the disaffection would be remedied by what the hon. Member had proposed. They had been informed, for the first time that night, that there was any connection between the Fenian movement and the alleged grievances which it was proposed to remedy; but, notwithstanding the extraordinary demonstration of eloquence to which they had just listened, that connection was as questionable as the grievances were imaginary. No man was more anxious than he was to show respect and affection for the people of Ireland, but it appeared to him that all the propositions which had been put forward in their behalf were mere figures of speech. They were never entertained by the people of Ireland, and would afford not the slightest remedy, if adopted, for the distress in that country. Every one of the alleged grievances of Ireland applied equally to Wales, and a more loyal and peaceable portion of the Empire than Wales was not to be found. With respect to Fenianism, he thought the Government would not be doing its duty unless they inquired into its origin—whether in America or elsewhere—as well as into the progress and extent of it. He could not admit that the language used with respect to it in the Speech from the Throne was what it ought to have been. It spoke of it as a conspiracy against life and property, disapproved by all interested in the maintenance of peace without distinction of creed or class. Was there anyone who could believe that? It was notorious that the Fenian movement was a mere continuation of that of 1848. It would be, in his opinion, an excess of zeal on the part of the Government to attempt to conciliate those fifteen Members who—as the hon. Member (Sir Henry Barron) had said—had been returned by the people of Ireland in consequence of what had been done in another place. Whether the Roman Catholic priests had done that or not, he was not called upon to state. But let them see how matters stood with respect to them. What was meant by all those grants to Roman Catholics? What was meant by the grant for a new university to them? It was clear that this agitation must have originated, as all former agitations in Ireland had done, with the priests, and that it was an essential part of their policy. The true cause of the present state of Ireland was well stated by an hon. Member, and that was the authority of the Roman Catholic Church. Dr. Cullen had been quoted, but he (Mr. Whalley) challenged any hon. Member to quote a single instance in which the statements of Roman Catholic prelates or other authorities during the last fifty years had not been falsified, directly or indirectly. He wished to call the attention of the House to language used by a Roman Catholic prelate. Dr. Manning, trained at the Oxford University, but now the head of the Roman Catholics of England, had given utterance to such sentiments as these—that the Government of England was an usurped Government, and all such Governments were our foes—the enemies of society and of God. It was ridiculous to say, with such teaching before their eyes, that the Government could not trace the course of the disaffection, and hon. Members from Ireland must have taken a low measure of the intelligence of English Members, when they put forward these pretended grievances. He trusted that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue) would be so far recognized that Her Majesty's Government would cause inquiries to be made into the disaffection, and thereby not fall into the errors they had committed last Session.

MR. REARDEN thought that the Government ought to be under an obligation to the hon. Member for Tralee for affording them an opportunity of amending the Speech from the Throne, because there was not in that Speech a single allusion to Ireland, except that which spoke of repressive measures for the Fenian conspiracy. As every one admitted, the bishops and clergy of the people had endeavoured to suppress the disaffection; but the best way to suppress Fenianism was to get possession of some of the "Head Centres," and this would be done if the British Government would adopt the same course of action as if they were at war with a foreign Power. Let Her Majesty's Government send to Washington, to Mr. Seward, a message that the British Ambassador would be withdrawn from the States unless the great Fenian Head Centre of all, who had his head quarters in the United States, were arrested, and this sham Irish Republic put down. If that course were adopted, he, for one, should have some confidence in the sincerity of the Government, when they expressed their fixed determination to crush this miserable, degrading Fenian movement: and then there would be an end to it, for the Fenian conspiracy was not of Irish growth, but was fostered in the United States. The Attorney General for Ireland asked the Irish Members to suggest a remedy, and he (Mr. Rearden) would do so. There were three million acres of waste land in Ireland. The Government ought to encourage private Members to introduce a Bill for the reclamation of these, and they could be distributed among tenant-farmers. If each farmer had thirty acres there would be remunerative employment for 133,314 tenant-farmers. When the land was reclaimed, debentures could be issued on the security of them, which would be transferred as a bill of exchange, and Government would only have to lend their names instead of advancing money. He would introduce such a Bill if no other Member would do so, and from his experience of English Gentlemen during the last thirty years he thought that they would support it. He believed another remedy would be the introduction of such a system of tenant-right as would be equitable to both the landlords and tenants—a system of tenant lease and compensation. He also thought the development of the fisheries was essential to the prosperity of Ireland, and that an advance should be made by the Loan Commission, in order to aid such extension and improvements. The Gordian knot of education for Ireland was the university question and denominational education, and for any instalment of them his country would prove grateful. He trusted that the necessities of Ireland would receive kindly consideration at the hands of the Government, and he felt certain that his countrymen would hail with thankfulness any instalment of legislation, provided the instalment were not of such a character as practically to amount to nothing at all. He felt that much might be done for Ireland in the extension of railways, the development of the fisheries, and in other directions; and he hoped that the day might not be far distant when the prosperity for which his countrymen had so long been sighing was at last approaching.

Mr. Rearden

MR. BAGWELL said, he must accept the portion of Her Majesty's Speech to which exception was taken. Every one must acknowledge that a conspiracy existed in Ireland, and therefore it would be incorrect to expunge the paragraph in question. But if it were not so, it would be the necessary consequence that an enormous conspiracy existed, at the head of which was Her Majesty and Her Ministers, and over which presided two of the Judges, and to which the grand juries were accessory, as well as the independent juries, who had sent to prison, and to penal servitude worse than death, thirty-six persons. If the hon. Member for Tralee had moved his Amendment as an addendum he could not have found it in his heart, as an independent Member, to have voted against it, because what had been stated was the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. But there was a way of putting things. As now put, the Amendment would make the conspiracy not the work of the Fenians, but of the Government, in order to create a conspiracy for the purpose of crushing the Irish people. He (Mr. Bagwell) could not endorse such a view. He had always, he believed, found himself in the same lobby with his hon. Friend, and should continue to vote with him on any remedial measures for Ireland relating to the Established Church and education. But if it were the last vote that he had to give he should give it against this Amendment—not on its merits, but on account of the form in which it was introduced.

COLONEL GREVILLE said, agreeing in what had fallen from the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Bagwell), he could not support the Amendment. The preservation of order was the first and most essential thing, because society could not otherwise exist, and therefore the Government must be expected to maintain it. But though that was the case, the representatives of Irish constituencies would not be doing their duty if they abstained from saying that their country laboured under grievances which required redress at the hands of Her Majesty's Government. If the Amendment of the hon. Member for Tralee could be moved as an addition to the paragraph in the Queen's Speech, Irish Members might very fairly have voted for it. The Chief Secretary for Ireland, at the recent banquet of the Lord Mayor of Dublin, said—

"It is the duty of the Imperial Parliament to take away from the disaffected in Ireland every excuse, every shadow of excuse that the most dis-tempered and disordered imagination can conceive, and which leads many to believe that there exists physical and violent means for the redress of social and political grievances."

In that opinion he entirely coincided, and he rejoiced that a right hon. Gentleman, occupying the responsible position of what he might call Minister for Ireland, had expressed it. They had also heard from the Attorney General for Ireland that night that it was the duty of the Government seriously to consider the grievances of Ireland, and, if possible, remove them. But, after all, it must not be forgotten that neither of these Gentlemen were in the Cabinet, they were not among those who guided the policy of the Government, and therefore Irish Members were entitled to know from the leader of the House, or at all events from a Member of the Cabinet, whether the Government coincided with the views put forward by the Chief Secretary and the Attorney General for Ireland. It was a fact also that there was no Irishman in the Cabinet, there were but few holding any post in the Government, and therefore, until Irish Members obtained an expression of opinion from some Member of the Cabinet, they were left entirely in the dark. It had been said by the Secretary for the Colonies, in a speech to his constituents, that it was very desirable to regard Irish matters from an Irish point of view, but Englishmen found it very difficult to do that. There were several grievances which had been repeatedly brought under the consideration of the House, and yet for which no remedies had been provided. There was first the education question, then there were the laws which related to landlord and tenant, and thirdly, the question of the Established Church. The so-called mixed system of education, which was not a mixed system at all, but under which religion could not be taught, was one which was not at all in accordance with the feelings of the people, and one for the amendment of which they had made repeated applications to the House in vain. With regard to the land question, it had been repeatedly referred to in speeches from the Throne, and had been made the subject of inquiry by Commissions and Committees, and yet the farmer in Ireland remained without those remedial measures which many of those Commissioners had recommended. And then with regard to the Established Church, that certainly was a most anomalous institution. There was no other country in the world in which the religion of the minority, and that a small minority—about a tenth of the population—totally absorbed the whole of the ecclesiastical property. The Irish Church Establishment had been repeatedly condemned by Members of that House, and yet it remained. That Church had been called a monument of folly; the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) had called it a badge of inferiority. It was at the bottom of all the religious differences which existed in Ireland. It was Protestant ascendancy which kept the Irish people disunited and prevented them from joining together for redress of grievances. He must say that the Government had not always shown a disposition to deal with this subject in the proper spirit. It was only last year, on a Motion made by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), that the Secretary of State for the Home Department made use of expressions which would shut out all hope, and which if taken by themselves would be almost a justification for what had lately occurred in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman, on the 28th of March, 1865, said—

"We have the Irish Protestant Church established as an existing institution in Ireland. . . . The firm belief of the Government is that it could not be subverted without revolution."—[3 Hansard, clxxviii. 400.]

Now it was only within a few months from the time when these words were spoken that an absurd and mischievous attempt at revolution had been made. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

"We must bear in mind that this branch of the Church of England and Ireland is very dear to a large body of Protestants in Ireland, and they would not give it up without a struggle."

But what institution ever existed that was not dear to some one or other? He (Colonel Greville) was a member of the Church of England, and he declared that he believed that nothing could be so injurious as an establishment founded on injustice, wrong, and oppression. But he turned with great consolation from that speech to a statesmanlike speech delivered by a man who, he was glad to see, was now the leader of that House. The right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), in the course of the same debate, declared it to be unsatisfactory that "In a nation of between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 people, 600,000 or 700,000 should have the exclusive possession of the ecclesiastical property of the country, intended to be applied to the religious instruction of all."—[3 Hansard, clxxviii. 423.]

Again, as long back as 1835, Lord John Russell, on a Motion of Mr. O'Connell's for an inquiry as to the means by which the Union was effected, declared that he thought the Irish people had a good cause of complaint in the Irish Church. He hoped the noble Lord at the head of the Government would think fit to introduce a measure for the removal of this grievance, and that this would be done speedily—for many measures, when adopted, by long delay lost their good effect. When an evil was allowed to continue for a long time it caused other evils to arise, which would not have occurred if a change had been made at the proper time. He contended that it was the duty of the House to consider this question, and to relegate whatever was unjust, and when they had done what was right and just they must leave the rest to Providence. He trusted that on that evening they would have from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or from some other Gentleman who sat on the Treasury Bench, an assurance that the Government was about to introduce some measure with reference to the Irish Church calculated to satisfy the just claims of the people of that country. A late distinguished leader of the House of Commons—a man who had received nearly as much support from Gentlemen on the opposite as on his own side of the House—used very remarkable words with reference to this subject. In a debate on the Maynooth Grant in 1845 Lord Palmerston said—

"I conjure the Government not to be deterred by any of the difficulties into which this measure has brought them from going on in the path of which they have announced that this is only the commencement, but I do conjure them not to delay. I conjure them to lose no time in bringing forward those other measures which I am convinced they must have in their minds as a sequel to this Bill about Maynooth."—[3 Hansard, lxxix. 1805.]

It was evident from those remarks that it was then believed that Government was about to follow up the Maynooth Bill by a comprehensive measure, which would deprive the Irish Establishment of the entire possession of the funds devoted to religious purposes in Ireland. Unfortunately, that had not been done then; it was not, however, as yet too late to do it; and while, on the one hand, he did not believe that the adoption of such a measure would remove all cause of complaint—would make Ireland like England—he firmly believed that it would go far to remove the dissatisfaction and disaffection which undoubtedly did exist at present in the former country.

Colonel Greville

MR. MAGUIRE: Sir, before addressing myself to the subject under the consideration of the House, I desire, at the request of my hon. Friend the Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue), to make an explanation on his behalf, inasmuch as it is not in his power to reply to the observations of the Attorney General. My hon. Friend wishes me to state that he did not express any condemnation of Fenianism, for this reason—that, had he done so, such condemnation might be interpreted to mean, either that no cause for disaffection existed, or that the people of Ireland were bound to submit to an eternity of misrule. The hon. Member for Tralee said that he spoke in no anti-English spirit, and the Attorney General remarked thereon that that statement of the feeling of my hon. Friend would not make him popular among the Fenians. Now, I can inform the right hon. Gentleman and the House that my hon. Friend was not popular among the Fenians, and that he has, in the strongest and most marked manner, been assailed by the leaders and the organ of that movement. More than this I do not think it necessary to say on the part of my hon. Friend. For my own part, I rise in no anti-English spirit, but I do rise in an anti-Fenian spirit. I do not say this with the contemptible object in view of obtaining a momentary applause; for in my own country, in my own city, in the midst of a population deeply discontented and widely disaffected, I have done my utmost to impress upon my fellow-countrymen the folly, madness, and mischief of that insensate movement; not only at the risk of loss of popularity, but at the more serious risk of grave misapprehension. But although I oppose Fenianism, as injurious to the best interests of my country, I am not here to say that there are no real causes of discontent, or even disaffection—at least, for that state of the popular mind which leads to disaffection. Did I say that no cause for discontent existed in Ireland, I should state that which I do not believe. Before referring to some of the causes for discontent which unhappily abound in Ireland, I would offer a suggestion to my hon. Friend the Member for Tralee. I would advise him to add his Amendment to the paragraph in the Address, rather than move it as a substitute for that paragraph. But if my hon. Friend press his Motion to a division, I will certainly vote with him, as I prefer the terms of the Amendment to the paragraph in the Address; for while the paragraph in the Address thanks Her Majesty for informing the House of that with which the House is already thoroughly acquainted, the Amendment opens up a question of the most pressing importance, and which it is absolutely necessary to press upon the earnest consideration of Parliament and the country.

Sir, I believe no man who knows anything of Ireland will deny that the present crisis in Irish affairs is one of a really grave and serious nature. Certainly, the Government will not venture to represent it in any other light. They cannot pretend to say that the Fenian movement is not one of great importance, or that it is not ramified extensively through the country, or that the sympathy felt towards it is not wide-spread and general. If it be not a movement fraught with serious danger to the peace of the country, how comes it that two Judges of the land have been solemnly engaged for nearly three months in trying persons charged with conspiracy against the Crown and authority of the Queen?—why have some thirty-six men been sentenced to various terms of imprisonment and penal servitude—a punishment only less terrible than that of death?—why is it that regiment after regiment is being poured on the shores of Ireland, until the island is crowded with troops?—why is it that proclamations are spreading over county after county, until the whole kingdom threatens to be placed under the ban of the law?—why, in a word, has the Government put forth its utmost strength to crush this conspiracy and punish its leaders? Why all this if the movement is not one alike serious and full of danger? In making these remarks I desire not to be misunderstood. I speak in no tone of menace; and should any English Gentleman so understand me, I can only say nothing is further from my thought or intention. I desire to deal seriously with a subject of great gravity. I also, in order that there can be no misconception of my meaning, desire to express my own views, clearly and distinctly, in reference to this movement; and in doing so, I only repeat what I have expressed elsewhere, and with a far deeper sense of personal responsibility. I believe, then, that no wilder, more absurd, or more desperate notion could be entertained by my countrymen, either at home or abroad, than that of endeavouring to overthrow the mighty power of England by the efforts of an unarmed, an undisciplined, a divided people. I go further, and supposing, for the sake of illustration, that such a thing were possible as that the movement could be successful, I should deplore it as one of the most terrible calamities that could befall my country. I say, suppose an armed insurrection, aided by a foreign Power at war with this country, to be successful, what would be the immediate as well as the ultimate result? I shall not attempt to describe the horrors of the struggle, or the consequences of success; but I can imagine a state of things even more awful still—more terrible and disastrous to my country—when, at the close of the war with the foreign Power that had assisted Ireland to achieve a momentary independence, Ireland would be handed back to the mercy or the vengeance of England. Than such an insurrection, than such a momentary triumph, I can imagine no greater calamity, no more fearful disaster to my country. If, then, I regard Fenianism with apprehension, it is not because I anticipate an armed insurrection, or that I contemplate the possibility of its success, but because it is fraught with the worst possible consequences to Ireland herself. Not only is it calculated to keep Ireland in a state of chronic excitement, fatal to every healthful attempt at improvement; but if it be not suppressed—and the power of the law alone is unequal to do this—it will be a scandal and disgrace to England, and a source of weakness and embarrassment to the entire Empire. It is in this spirit that I desire to speak of Fenianism to this House and to the people of this country—as something grave and serious, and therefore to be inquired into in an enlightened and generous spirit. The Attorney General seems to think that if my hon. Friend's Amendment were adopted, it would be as if Parliament were to parley with traitors, and negotiate with those who had arms in their hands against the authority of their Sovereign. I deny that the terms of the Amendment can be fairly strained to bear any such construction. The noble Lord who moved the Address (Lord Frederick Cavendish), and the hon. Gentleman who seconded it (Mr. Graham), spoke in the very spirit in which the Amendment of my hon. Friend is conceived. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Graham) almost went over the same ground as that taken by the hon. Member for Tralee. He indicated the existence of certain grievances, and he said that the Government and Parliament should inquire into their existence, and that, if proved to exist, they should provide a remedy for them. In the present condition of Ireland Irish Members would have neglected their duty if they had not raised this discussion, and called the attention of Parliament and the country to what they believed to be the causes, or some of the causes, of the state of things which as Irishmen they have every reason to deplore. One of the causes of discontent—of that state of feeling which leads to disaffection—has been the fatal policy adopted by the Government of ignoring the existence of distress and suffering in Ireland. The late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, from his naturally easy and amiable nature, was ever inclined to take the most hopeful view of public affairs, and desired on all occasions to present the pleasant side, and that alone, to the view of the English public. From time to time, during years of great and wide-spread distress in Ireland, I brought the condition of that country before this House. Sometimes I was met by derision, sometimes by incredulity, sometimes with positive denial, and even expressions of anger and condemnation. On those occasions English Members naturally turned to the Government to learn from the responsible Advisers of the Crown what was the truth with respect to the real condition of the Irish people; but, unhappily, the Government rather led astray than enlightened the mind of Parliament as to the state of Ireland. Not only did they distinctly declare that no serious distress existed in that country, but they boasted, on the contrary, that she presented the most marked symptoms of progress and improvement. What is now proved to have been the fact? What is now the property of the historian? That in the years '60, '61, and '62, some £30,000,000 of agricultural property were lost by a people almost wholly dependent on agriculture by successive bad harvests. On Tuesday night there was much lamentation in this House because the cattle plague had, in a rich country, destroyed property to the amount of £1,500,000; but when £30,000,000 of property had been destroyed in a poor country, the statements of that country's distress were either derided or denied. That was not wise statesmanship on the part of the Government; for if they could not have applied a remedial measure, they might, at least, have given some kind and consolatory assurance of their sympathy. There is, or rather was, a cause for discontent and dissatisfaction created by the tone adopted by certain public writers against Ireland and Irishmen; and I am the more free to refer to it now as, happily, the tone of the English press is sensibly and beneficially changed towards both. The slashing leaders of the great journals representing, or affecting to represent, Englishmen, and helping to form English public opinion, and their small imitators throughout this country, have done more to sow the seeds of hostility between the two countries, and exasperate the people of Ireland, than even vicious legislation could have accomplished. It is scarcely possible to over-estimate the effect of this vitriolic rhetoric of the desk upon the minds of a sensitive and suffering people; and I have reason to know that it inflamed the ardent and high-spirited youth of the country with sentiments of the bitterest hatred and hostility. Happily, a better, a wiser, and a more patriotic tone pervades the public press of this country; and instead of galling taunt and irritating sneer, we now see evinced a readiness to deal with Irish interests in a kind and conciliatory spirit.

It has been said to-night, as it has been said before, that Irish Members have proposed no measures of redress; while, on the other hand, my hon. Friend the Member for Tralee has been blamed for having proposed too many. For instance, my hon. Friend has suggested a tax upon absentees. With the justice of such a tax I cordially agree, for I would, were it possible, punish men for their neglect of their duties to their country; but I leave it to the wisdom of Parliament and the nation to say whether they should be so taxed or not. But, coming to a grievance which is not only practical, but capable of legislative redress, I say—and I speak with authority when I do so—that the state of the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland is at the very root of the mischief. I admit that the Catholics of Ireland, who constitute more than two-thirds of the people of Ireland, are insulted by the enforced maintenance of a dominant Church, supported by the State with all its power and influence, for the sake of the one-tenth of the population. And the feeling of bitterness and discontent with which this standing insult is regarded is aggravated by the opinions expressed during last Session from the Treasury Bench. The present distinguished leader of the House then stated, at least in substance, that, viewed in the abstract, the Irish Church Establishment had not, argumentatively speaking, a leg to stand on. It cannot be defended in argument. The continuance of such a wrong naturally exasperated and alienated from the Government, which sustained while it condemned it, a large class of the high-spirited Catholics of Ireland, who felt it to be an insult to their creed and their consciences. But I repeat my confident assertion that the land question is at the root of the evil. There are hon. Members here who affect to think that this is an imaginary grievance. To show that it is no imaginary grievance, I give for their information one of the latest cases that has occurred. This happened in Tipperary about a month since. A gentleman who had lately become the owner of a certain property in that county evicted—in other words, turned out on the road-side—thirty families, consisting, it may be, of 200 persons. Why were they thus dealt with? Were they disloyal? Were they Fenians? Were they declared enemies to the Crown and authority of their Queen? Were they idle? Were they dissolute? What crime had they committed? None—none whatever. The amount of their guilt may be tested by the fact that they owed no rent, and that they offered to pay to the last farthing whatever rent the new proprietor would wish to impose upon them; but the purchaser under the Court of Incumbered Estates, which was to effect such a happy revolution in Ireland, turned out these innocent and unoffending people simply because he wanted to clear them off the face of the land. These 200 people are, perhaps, already on their way to America; they either are or will become emigrants—and am I to be told that their migration is the natural result of the necessary operation of certain economic laws, as has been intimated this evening by a speaker who did not seem to possess a remarkable knowledge of the state of things in Ireland. I say such migration as theirs is the result, not of the natural and inevitable operation of certain economic laws, but of the continuance of a law which should not exist, and of a power which no law should allow any human being to exercise against his fellow men. If, as I may fairly suppose, these evicted tenants, these guiltless people, are now on their way to America, what must be their sentiments towards the Government and the institutions of a country under which a landlord is permitted to exterminate without mercy or compunction? Do the Irish people demand anything impracticable, unjust, or revolutionary? Certainly no. They simply ask that if a tenant be evicted from his farm, he shall be entitled to receive full and fair compensation for the substantial improvements effected by his industry and capital on or in the land. What can be more rational than such a proposition? Its principle has been admitted over and over in this House and in its legislation. In 1860 it was fully admitted in an Act which, being devised in a timid spirit was so complicated, so restricted, so miserably small in its inducement to improvement, that it fell still-born, and has been disdained by the tenants of Ireland. For more than twenty years different Governments have made solemn promises to the people of Ireland to treat Ireland as an exceptional case, and deal with it by exceptional legislation; and those promises have never up to this hour been fulfilled. Therefore, if there be cause for dissatisfaction, disaffection, or even Fenianism, in connection with this unsettled land question, I must charge my Lord Derby, the late Duke of Newcastle, and every successive Administration for the last twenty years, with being the prime movers of discontent. On the part of the tenant, I advocate no legislation which would deprive the landlord of any right which he ought to exercise; but when landlords expel, or attempt to expel, their tenantry from their native soil, I would compel the landlords by law to give their tenants such substantial compensation for improvements as would either deter them from carrying out their intention, or if they did carry it out, would at least save the evicted tenantry from being driven forth as beggars on the world. That is not a revolutionary but a just and rational proposition. Another thing the Legislature should do is to devise some means by which landlords would be induced to give leases. Leases are, in my mind, essential not merely to the security of the tenant, but to the prosperity of landlords, tenant, and country. From the want of this security, which is felt by the tenant-at-will—and tenure-at-will is the tenure of the country—the energy of the tenant is paralyzed, improvement is comparatively at a standstill, and the agriculture of Ireland is what it has been represented as being by Judge Longfield, in his evidence last Session—in a very backward state. Let those who doubt the testimony of that eminent man believe the evidence of their own senses. No one can pass through the country—a country of natural fertility and mild climate—without being impressed with the extreme backwardness of its agriculture, and the general poverty it presents to the eye; and this state of things exists in spite of the fact that Irish farmers are frugal, thrifty, and laborious, whenever they have security for the enjoyment of the fruits of their labour, energy, or capital. The House may not pass a law compelling landlords to give leases—that I do not expect they will do, while I am certain such a law would be beneficial to both; but Parliament might take from the landlord the power of distress unless in case his tenant held by lease. I assert, Sir, that the great grievance of Ireland, the main cause of its discontent, is the existing state of the relations between landlord and tenant. This is what has given the most powerful stimulus to emigration, which is still pouring forth in strong and mighty volume. The noble Lord who moved the Address told the House that these hundreds of thousands of emigrants left the shores of Ireland with a feeling of indomitable hostility to England. The noble Lord was strictly accurate in his statement. It is scarcely necessary to corroborate that which is notorious; but I shall call a witness of unimpeachable veracity, and one who speaks with the fullest knowledge of the feelings of the Irish people. I refer to the Right Rev. Dr. Keane, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Cloyne, a distinguished prelate of his Church, one who, while seeking to obtain redress for the real grievances under which the people suffer, stands firmly between them and evil counsels, and who, as a priest and a patriot, uses every influence to dissuade his flock from rash and ruinous courses. When examined last Session before a Committee of this House, Dr. Keane used these words—

“I may state to the Committee that I never knew a period in which there was more estrangement, more dissatisfaction, more disaffection to the Government under which they live, than there is at the present moment. Amongst those that go away, there are expressions on their lips of burning hatred against what they complain of—the neglect and misrule of the English Government.”

“I do not think I could overrate the amount of discontent that is in the very depths of their souls.” When such feelings exist, is it to be wondered at that the Fenian conspiracy has been so largely adopted in Ireland? Some 100,000 of the Irish people annually leave the shores of their native country for America, where they join their brethren, the majority of whom have been compelled to leave from the same causes; and carrying away with them such feelings as are described by Dr. Keane. I am right when I say that such an emigration is alike dangerous to the present and future peace of Ireland, and to the strength and stability of this Empire. It behoves Parliament to inquire into the causes of Irish poverty and discontent, and endeavour, by wise legislation, to change the feeling which now exists, from one of hatred to one of amity. I do not mean to say, for I do not believe it to be the case, that anyone has left Ireland because of the existence of the Church Establishment in that country; but I say it is a cause, and a just cause, of bitterness and discontent. There are those who assert that in seeking to abolish the temporalities of the Established Church, the motives of priests and people are not pure—that, in fact, they only want to have their share in the spoil of the Establishment. It is well that there should be no possibility of mistake on this head. I solemnly believe that the Catholics of Ireland, priests and people, would not touch one farthing of the revenues of the Established Church—would not apply one farthing of them to the support of the Catholic clergy, or their church. Any attempt to appropriate any portion of the spoils, as they are so called, would be dishonour and disgrace alike to priests and people. The motives of Irish Catholics are pure with respect to this question, which, though not of the greatest magnitude, is one that affects the state of public feeling materially. Some persons, groping blindly in search of the causes of discontent, are weak enough to imagine that the ills of Ireland could be cured by the payment of the Catholic clergy. Sir, in my opinion, such a proposition is utter madness and folly; but could it be carried out, it would be fatal not only to the dignity of the Catholic Church, and the honour of the Catholic clergy, but to the peace and tranquillity of Ireland. It has been even proposed to restore the 25 per cent taken from the tithes in 1832, and out of the whole to carve two great portions—one for the Catholic Church, and one for the Protestant Church. In answer to this absurd proposition, let me ask one, and in my mind important, question—how is it that the Catholic clergy have had such power to aid the authorities in checking the Fenian movement, and to a certain extent baffling the hopes of the Fenian leaders? Because they are independent of the State, and intimately connected with their flocks by ties of mutual confidence and affection. But once link them to the State by means of annual stipend or provision, and from that moment, in the eyes of the people, the sacred robes of the minister of the sanctuary would seem to be degraded into the livery of the Government. Forty years ago Dr. Doyle, one of the most eminent prelates of the National Church of Ireland, indeed of any church, was examined before Committees of the Lords and Commons, and that illustrious Bishop gave testimony on this very subject. He said he was opposed to the acceptance of any emolument or provision from the State, and that he would prefer to receive the slender stipend which he received from the people whom he served. He warned the Government of the day against the danger of subsidizing the Catholic clergy; for he said that, though it might be possible to attach the clergy to the Government, the certain result of a paid priesthood would be to alienate the people from the priests, and more so from the State, all those over whom they desired to exercise control; and that the very means adopted to increase the influence of the Government over the people would most surely weaken and even destroy the influence which they desired to have exercised in their favour. The opinions expressed by Dr. Doyle, forty years ago, are those of the Catholic bishops, priests, and people of this day. It is true there are men who flout the authority of the Church, and who oppose the wise counsels of its ministers; but they are few in number, and the influence of the clergy is still powerful and salutary in Ireland. Why? Because they are not stipendiaries of the State. For myself, and indeed on the part of Roman Catholics without exception, I may say that, whatever our feelings may be with reference to the temporalities of the Established Church, we have no feeling of hostility to Protestants or their Church, in its spiritual sense. We simply desire to do towards our Protestant brethren as we wish to be done by. Our Church is a voluntary Church, and it flourishes in strength and vigour, notwithstanding that it does not receive support from the State. Why should not Protestants depend for the vitality of their Church on the allegiance and affection of its followers as we Catholics do? If a Church cannot be supported by its own followers, the sooner it falls the better. We say to Protestants, remove what is rotten and treacherous from your Church, and thus allow full play to the spiritual element, which is the living principle of faith in the truth and purity of the religion you profess. There are other panaceas suggested for the ills of Ireland, such as Royal visits to Ireland, the constant residence of a Member of the Royal Family in that country, and the abolition of the so-called sham Royalty in Dublin. No doubt the Irish people would hail with delight the presence of their Sovereign among them. As for the abolition of the Lord Lieutenancy, that is a question into which I do not care to enter. But none of those things will cure the ills of Ireland. Discontent, disaffection, Fenianism if you will, is not to be put down by such palliatives. Neither is it to be put down by the power of Government—it is to be put down and banished by the influence of public opinion based upon a wide-spread belief, in good laws and a wise Government. It is said that Fenianism is of foreign origin, but this I deny. Its organization may be in America, but its spirit is in Ireland. The peasant who leaves your shores to-day flings his contribution into the Fenian treasury the moment he lands on the shores of America. Fenianism would have no power, no strength, no success, unless there was discontent, and cause for discontent in Ireland. So the sooner you look to the causes of discontent, and remove them, the sooner do you really grapple with the spirit of Fenianism in Ireland. I have an intimate acquaintance with the state of feeling in the city and county of Cork, and with the neighbouring counties; and, while I am far from saying that the organization is mighty or powerful, or that any vast number are engaged in it, or are sworn members of the body, still, if I am asked whether there is a sympathy with the Fenian movement, I must confidently assert that there is scarcely an artizan, a labourer, or small farmer, or a small struggling shopkeeper who has not a kind of sympathy, more or less strong, in its favour. Those who are largely engaged in trade and commerce, or who are specially injured by the effects or influence of the movement, are naturally at the side of the Government; but the mass of the people feel a strong sympathy with the movement. And this is a just cause for anxiety, and even alarm. It is stated in the Royal Speech that Fenianism is opposed to religion, and is condemned by all who are interested in its maintenance; but it is unhappily true that amongst those who sympathize with the movement are many of the best and purest of the population. ["No, no!"] I know positively the truth of what I state. Is morality to be judged of by the cut of a man's coat, or the fineness of his cloth? I speak of men who lead blameless lives, who are good fathers and good christians. You say there is an absence of ordinary crime in Ireland—that the people are good and moral. Then, I say, that good and poor men sympathize with, though they do not join the movement; for it is true beyond all doubt that the mass of the people feel that sympathy. The reason why this is so is obvious. It arises from the idea which too fatally prevails in Ireland—that constitutional agitation and Parliamentary action are useless for the redress of admitted grievances. I neither sympathize with the movement, nor do I believe that constitutional means and Parliamentary action will be without avail; but I admit and deplore the existence of this sympathy and of this belief. Sir, this is a new Parliament, to which the country has sent 200 new Members; and it is necessary that Irish Members should draw the attention of the Government and Parliament to the state of their country. I call on the Government to send a message of peace to Ireland. But let it be no hollow truce, but real and permanent peace. The Government are strong enough to punish and suppress; but what is necessary is to eradicate the causes that lead to these periodical manifestations of deep-lying discontent. I admit that the law has been fairly administered by the Judges, and that, on the part of the Crown, there was an entire absence of that bitterness and malignity which disgraced Crown prosecutions in past times, not only in Ireland, but in this country. The blot on the Commission was the jury panel of the county of Cork; but the fault was owing, not to the Crown, but to the indiscretion or want of wisdom of an official who did not fitly appreciate the importance of the occasion, and the responsibility of his office; but while I object to that panel, I cannot deny that the juries decided fairly, and in accordance with the evidence. The Government are strong enough to meet the conspiracy, and to punish the conspirators; but, Sir, I want the Government to destroy the trade of the conspirators by putting an end to the causes of disaffection. I wish to see the two countries strong and united—strong because of union; but it is the idlest of all mockeries to assert or suppose it possible that there can exist a feeling of cordial union with England on the part of the Irish people, unless both countries are dealt with on one common basis of equal justice. Let the Government and people of this country deal with Ireland with justice and with wisdom; and then it will not be the terrors of the law that will crush Fenianism, but the all-pervading consciousness that the people of Ireland are really about to be taken into the bosom of this great Empire, and to be dealt with upon the same principles of justice.

LORD NAAS: No one, I am sure, will find fault with the tone and temper of the hon. Gentleman who has just addressed the House (Mr. Maguire); and if I differ from some of the conclusions at which he has arrived, I trust he will give me credit for taking as deep an interest as he does in the welfare of our common country. I wish, upon this occasion, to confine my observations—and they shall not be many—to one point, and to one point only. I wish to impress upon the House my firm opinion that those questions which have been referred to by the hon. Member for Tralee, and by many of the speakers this evening, as the foundation of the Fenian movement, are not the real causes of that unfortunate state of things which now prevails in Ireland. A new and disastrous state of things has arisen. I listened to the debate with considerable interest; and on seeing the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Tralee, I thought that he might introduce into the debate something which would go to show that the action of the Legislature and misgovernment on the part of this country had been the cause of this state of affairs. But I will appeal to every Member who has carefully attended to the discussion whether that position which was at first broadly laid down by the hon. Gentleman was maintained in argument. I believe that the causes of the Fenian movement, whatever they may be, do not lie here, but lie principally in a country over which we have no control. My belief is that this conspiracy did not originate in Ireland, and is not maintained by any causes that exist in Ireland. I believe it was created and is maintained by influences that arose in a foreign country, and is supported by money which does not come from the people of Ireland, and by men who are not subjects of Her Majesty. I have no hesitation in saying that the Fenian organization has been devised and carried on in America, and by men who have not the interests of Ireland at heart, but who are, I am sorry to say, citizens of that great Republic which contains within its dominions some of the bitterest enemies of England. What are the Irish grievances mentioned to-night? Are they new? The hon. Member for Tralee referred to subjects which, on many former occasions, were pressed upon the notice of this House. The condition of the Irish Church has been put forward as a cause of the Fenian movement; but how can it be imagined that the position or existence of the Church in Ireland has any interest for men who denounce all religions, and who have issued the most scurrilous and virulent attacks on the ministers of the very faith which they themselves pretend to profess? Or can it be imagined that the laws which regulate the tenure of property in Ireland have any influence on the leaders of a movement, whose leaders emphatically declare that their object is not to obtain compensation for tenants, or to improve the condition of the occupiers of the soil, but to sweep away the present owners of landed property and to distribute the spoil among the fortunate soldiers of the Irish republic? ["Oh!"] Ample evidence has been adduced that this is the object of the chiefs of the conspiracy—I hold ample proofs in my hand—but that evidence has been so often referred to by the learned gentlemen who represented the Crown upon the recent trials, that I need not take up the time of the House by referring to it. It has been laid down over and over again by these men that their object is not to alter or re-construct the law of landlord and tenant in Ireland, but to distribute the land, not among those who now occupied it, but among those who joined their conspiracy. It may be true—and I own that I, for one, participate in those views—that there are matters connected with the administration of the Executive in Ireland which might be improved, as they in some degree prevent Irish interests from receiving their due weight in the Councils of the United Kingdom. I have long held the opinion that Ireland would be benefited if the Chief Minister for that country always had a seat in the Cabinet, and was always either in that or the other House of Parliament, to defend and explain the acts of the Executive. But can it be thought for a moment that a change like that occupied the minds of these men, or that the interests of the Queen's Government was considered by those who aimed at sweeping her authority from the face of the land in order to establish on its ruins a socialistic Republic? I believe that questions, so often discussed and sometimes decided by this House, have nothing whatever to do with Fenianism in Ireland. The questions of tenants' compensation and tenant-right, which have been referred to, have been debated here, and in the most deliberate manner, for the last twenty years. Every successive Government has attempted to deal with it, but without success; because every statesman who has given his attention to the subject found it impossible to reconcile the pretensions of those who professed to represent the interests of the tenant with the rights of property and the legitimate interests of the landlord. That is the reason why the question has remained unsettled; and I believe it will long remain so, at least in the sense so often enunciated in that House. But if, as the hon. Gentleman has stated, that question really lies at the root of the evils of Ireland, and is therefore the cause of the Fenian movement, how comes it that that movement has gained so little ground among the agricultural population of Ireland? There is not one considerable farmer in the country who has been proved to be connected with it. The Fenian movement is supported principally by the inhabitants of towns, who have never cultivated a rood of ground in their lives. I therefore repudiate the statement of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) that the tenant question is at the root of the Fenian movement. I believe that no honest or impartial man who has studied Ireland, no foreigner who might be called upon to express an impartial opinion, if he examined the course of Parliamentary Government adopted during the last forty years, would be able to discover proof of any indifference to Irish interests, or any disregard of the wants of the Irish people. From my own experience—and I have sat in that House now for some considerable time—I must say I have never known an Irish question to be brought forward—as has been the case that night—with great ability, great earnestness, and great courage—without its receiving fair and ample discussion. Argument has been met by argument; and if those who agitated these subjects have not succeeded in persuading the House to adopt their views, it was not because there has been any unwillingness to consider them. On the contrary, the House had always felt Irish questions to be a great difficulty, and has always approached them with an earnest desire to settle them. Had not the representatives of Ireland themselves a voice here? True, they are only 105 compared with 500 English and Scotch Members; but is that the right way to look at the balance of the representation in this House? We know how equally parties are divided, and how often a few votes determined the fate of a Government. We have seen many crises in which Irish questions were made of the greatest possible importance, and how the votes of a small portion of the Irish representatives could control the action of the Cabinet. We cannot, therefore, draw the conclusion that measures for the good of Ireland will not be passed in this House because the Irish Members are powerless by reason of their minority. I admit that there is much in the past government of Ireland to regret. I believe that for centuries she was the worst governed country in Europe. But, at the same time, I believe that England has now for many years been doing everything in her power to atone for past errors and correct past mistakes. When people talk of English laws standing in the way of Irish progress, I want to know whether there is anything in the nature of Ireland so totally different from the nature of England that the same laws should be so poisonous and destructive in the one country and so salutary and beneficial in the other? The same laws affecting the tenure of landed property exist in Ireland as in England, and we have seen under those laws a greater amount of agricultural prosperity developed than had been witnessed in any other country. We have seen the same laws affecting trade and manufactures in Ireland as in England, and why is not the same effect visible in the former as in the latter? I may briefly recall what had been done by Parliament for Ireland during the last forty years. Within that period, those of the people who professed the Roman Catholic religion have been admitted to a full participation in all the civil rights enjoyed by the rest of their fellow subjects. The other important measures which have followed evinced a desire on the part of Parliament to extend every benefit in its power to that country. A system of education has been established which gives gratuitous instruction to upwards of 200,000 children; and the annual grants amount to no less than £250,000. Other sums are yearly voted for the education of the Roman Catholic priesthood, and that establishment has been placed on such a footing that its endowment is now made a permanent law to the country. A Poor Law has been enacted under which the property of the country last year was called upon to pay £750,000, administering relief to 300,000 persons. Again, in the years of famine, when a disaster greater, perhaps, than ever came on any country befell Ireland, was not money given freely, and with a lavish hand, to sustain life out of the Imperial exchequer? and although through maladministration there was considerable waste of these funds, yet at least no indisposition to minister generously to the sore necessity of Ireland can be fairly charged against this House. Indeed, it is, I believe, impossible for any man to get up and prove that any proposal shown by sound argument to be for the real good of Ireland has been rejected in this Assembly. And, therefore, I cannot refrain from taking this opportunity to protest against and repudiate the doctrine that bad laws or misgovernment have produced this treasonable movement. Justice, I maintain, is fairly administered in Ireland, as even these recent trials themselves suffice to show. The representation of that country, also, is on as fair a basis as that of the rest of the United Kingdom. I appeal to the Roman Catholic Members of this House whether there is any legislative body in any first-class European State in which greater freedom of debate is enjoyed? Ought we not, then, to be careful not to give the least sanction or support to this conspiracy by declaring that it has any excuse or origin in the action of Parliament? I will not weary the House by attempting to demonstrate the absurdity and futility of the objects of the Fenian conspiracy; but I may remind them that there exists in Ireland a large party, comprising men of all religious denominations, whose loyalty and determination to maintain the authority of the Queen are second to those of no class in the United Kingdom. I do not exaggerate the character of these classes when I say that they include every man of property and intelligence in the country, and all the ministers of every creed. Nor do I believe it possible to find outside of those classes one man who really, conscientiously, and openly has given his adhesion or sympathy to Fenianism, whose opinion is worth having, or whose character is in any way entitled to weight with his countrymen. Therefore, though this Fenian conspiracy may be inconvenient and most disastrous even for a considerable time to the interests of Ireland, it is manifestly utterly futile and absurd. I by no means underrate the mischief which such movements as Fenianism are calculated to effect. I recollect well that when I first entered the House of Commons, in 1847, a somewhat similar state of things existed in Ireland, and that some Members of the House actually did not hesitate openly to profess their sympathy with the seditious proceedings which were then taking place. There is, however, a considerable difference, I am happy to say, between those proceedings and the present, although the spirit which prompted both is no doubt the same. I cannot help expressing my regret that, at the expiration of eighteen years, similar misfortunes have again fallen upon us, and that while progress and civilization are going on around us, a portion of Her Majesty's dominions should be the theatre of a movement which, if successful even for a moment, would have the effect of throwing Ireland back at least fifty years. From the doctrine that bad government or legislation is the cause of that movement I must express my entire dissent. Indeed, my opinion is that those who have taken upon themselves to propagate that view have incurred a grave responsibility, inasmuch as thereby they give a colour to this movement, while they are totally unable to substantiate the correctness of their assertions. I hope we shall hear no more of such doctrines, and I also trust—nay, I am perfectly sure—the House will not, because of recent occurrences in Ireland, feel indisposed to deal with Irish questions in the same spirit of impartiality and fairness which it has for many years shown on these occasions. The various schemes for the benefit of that country which have this evening been suggested are legitimate subjects for the consideration of Parliament; if good in themselves, they will, I have no doubt, be ultimately carried, while, if bad, they will, as it is desirable they should, be rejected.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, believing that House to be the proper place for expressing his views as a representative of the people, he would not shrink from declaring his opinions upon the question submitted for their just consideration. He should be forgetting his own position if, from any miserable feeling of fear lest he should lose his popularity amongst his constituents, he hesitated to express his opinion of this unhappy and disgraceful Fenian conspiracy. There was not a man of education or position in the country but viewed that movement with horror and reprobation. He represented a county constituency, and it was their opinion, as well as his own, that it was calculated to drive back for years from the country any chances of prosperity which were likely to dawn on it, and in addition to bring ruin upon many innocent people. It was for men like himself, who had always been Liberal, to come forward at such a crisis and express the horror of the whole Liberal party, properly so called, at this ruinous conspiracy. [Cries of "Divide!"] He had reason to know that among the names which had been published in connection with the Fenian conspiracy in New York were some of the men he had seen hanging about the lobbies of that House, servilely soliciting the patronage of this very Government they now wished to trample upon. Being unsuccessful they went as adventurers to America, and there contrived to live in luxury by deceiving those multitudes who, like their countrymen here, who possessed the Celtic temperament, were especially liable to be deceived. [Laughter.] If hon. Gentlemen lived in the south and west of Ireland they would not laugh. With respect to many questions which had been raised, he would on that occasion—["Divide!"] If the hon. Gentlemen who interrupted him had sat in the House during the last Parliament they would be aware that during the whole six years he had rarely troubled the House; but in obedience to those hon. Members who were no doubt overflowing with maiden eloquence, he would conclude by merely adding his request to that of other hon. Gentlemen that the hon. Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue) would, instead of substituting the paragraph he had moved for another, append it to the Address. In that case, the hon. Member should have his most hearty support.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he thought that no one who had read the Amendment offered that night could find anything in its phraseology calculated to excite animosity or opposition. At the moment he heard that an Amendment on Irish subjects was about to be introduced, he went to the hon. Member (The O'Donoghue) and asked him for a copy of it; and on reading it he must confess that he did not see that there was much in it to which any Irish Member could object. The speech of his hon. Friend, however, was not exactly in keeping with the temperate and moderate words he had proposed; and, therefore, with great respect for the talents, and with high admiration for the eloquence, he had displayed, he could not consent to follow him into the lobby. Every one who had heard the hon. Member must, moreover, regret that one possessing so much ability and kindly feeling should have allowed either his oratory or his imagination to carry him to some of the lengths which he had gone that night. As a county representative of the north of Ireland, and the only one who had as yet spoken in this debate, he entered his protest against the statements made by the hon. Member (The O'Donoghue) with reference to atrocities said to have been committed in the county of Donegal. The hon. Gentleman had adverted to them as if they were admitted facts; but he (Lord Claud Hamilton) undertook to meet him on every point, and show that he had been the victim of the grossest misrepresentation. He did not wish to rest his denial of these statements on his own words, and he would, therefore, read a few lines from the Report of a Committee of the House, which sat on the very subject. Statements had been made of the heartless, cold-blooded conduct of some of the landlords, which it was said had driven the people of Donegal to poverty, desolation, and misery. An impartial Committee, consisting of English, Scotch, and Irish Members, was selected from that House, and they came to the following Resolution upon the evidence placed before them, by the authors of the statements complained of. The Committee found—

"That this poverty among the people is not attributable to the landlords; that no attempt had been made to drive the tenants from their holdings or to take from them any lands over which they had any real right; and it has been proved to your chairman that the statement in the appeal"

The very document relied upon by the hon. Member and assumed to be correct

"Which said that 'last year brought a sad change upon this warm-hearted peasantry, all the landlords of those districts save one simultaneously deprived them of the mountains, giving them to Scotch and English graziers as sheep walks, and at the same time doubled and trebled, and in many instances quadrupled, the rents on their miserable holdings,' is totally devoid of foundation."

Yet these very statements, so "totally devoid of foundation," were alluded to to-night, by his hon. Friend, as established facts. He must make one appeal to his hon. Friend the Member for Tralee, and ask him if any English Member got up in that House and ventured to assail his countrymen with language he had himself used, whether he would not, with that gallantry for which he is so eminently conspicuous, vindicate his countrymen against such unworthy and undeserved calumnies? The hon. Gentleman had unfairly assumed that Irish questions were put down by English and Scotch Members. He (Lord Claud Hamilton) had sat in that House for thirty-one years, and he maintained that such a statement was totally devoid of truth, and an unworthy calumny on the Scotch and English Members of that House. He had never known an Irish question, when fairly brought forward and practically debated, not listened to with attention, however much it might interfere with the general business of the country and the convenience of hon. Members, and he expressed his gratitude for the generosity and liberality of the House with regard to Irish subjects. If the hon. Gentleman would only turn his eloquence and talents to a more practical use than he had to-night, he predicted for him a far greater success than he would be likely to meet with on that occasion. The great fault hon. Gentlemen committed was in bringing forward at one time a number of alleged grievances, instead of confining themselves to one subject, and having it fairly and thoroughly discussed. If they would abstain from that, and bring forward what they considered solutions for the difficulties they complained of in the manner he had suggested, he should be able to recognize in it statesmanlike conduct, and his hon. Friends the Members for Tralee and Cork would thus be doing a far greater service to Ireland than by contenting themselves with making discursive speeches which did not suggest any practical solution of the grievances of which they complained. If he felt as strongly on any supposed grievances as his hon. Friends evidently did, from the frequent occasions on which they dilated on them, he should feel it to be his first and most solemn duty to offer suggestions and to bring forward measures which might form a basis on which remedial legislation might proceed. He protested against what had been said with regard to Donegal, and he could, if necessary, show that it was incorrect, but had been got up to excite the feelings of the people. He should support the Address as proposed by Her Majesty's Government.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, he gave full credit to the Irish Government for the vigour it had shown in the Fenian prosecutions. Praise was due to the Lord Lieutenant especially; and it was gratifying to find that his Excellency was so well supported by the middle classes. In the county which he had the honour to represent, the law was still respected. It was one into which Fenianism had not penetrated to any great extent; but even there the bad effects of the conspiracy were felt. A stop had been put to the establishment of manufactories—capitalists being deterred from embarking their money in a country in which there did not appear to be ordinary security for commercial enterprise. His opinion was that the present was not the time for inquiry into political grievances. When the Fenian conspiracy was put an end to, and when the law was vindicated, then would be the time for an inquiry such as that suggested in the course of this debate. The landlords had been spoken of as if they were indifferent to the state of the country. Holding the stake they did in it, he was at a loss to see how that could be. In the county with which he was connected they had a large measure of tenant-right, and there were no religious feuds, and yet things were not as they ought to be there; he was sorry to say there did not prevail such a spirit of satisfaction as he should like to see. Within the last few years vast numbers of the population of Ireland had emigrated; and it could scarcely be expected that the lower classes, receiving as they did by every post, from their relatives and friends on the other side of the Atlantic, letters speaking of the prosperous condition of the emigrants and containing substantial proof of that prosperity in the shape of remittances, should fail to draw comparisons between their own position and that of Irishmen who had left their own country. Irishmen who came to England or who went to Scotland earned large wages, and those at home asked why it was that in Ireland wages were so small as compared with those paid to their countrymen elsewhere. That was a question which it was difficult to answer without going into political economy; but he believed that much discontent arose from the circumstance which suggested the question. It must be remembered that most of the emigrants were young people, whose labour had been lost to their own country; and he could not but think, therefore, that if the money which had been spent on emigration had been spent on the encouragement of trade and manufactures, a very different result would have followed. It was to the extension of trade and manufactures he looked for an improvement in the condition of Ireland; but, to bring that about, security of property must be a first condition. He, therefore, hoped that to secure this all friends of Ireland would at present apply their exertions. It was not enough when you had to deal with ignorance to make a statement of the hopelessness of insurrection. You must use some argument that would be unmistakably demonstrative. He believed that if 10,000 men could be sent over to Ireland, it would put an end to Fenianism at once. When a feeling of security was restored, he would be ready to vote for an inquiry into the cause of the unfortunate circumstances which had been brought under the notice of the House.

COLONEL VANDELEUR said, he regretted that hon. Members should feel so much interest in making it appear that Ireland was disaffected. Some hon. Gentlemen spoke as if disaffection existed all over three of the Irish provinces. The county of Clare, which he represented, was essentially a Roman Catholic county, and it was not disaffected. He had had conversations with the clergy of both denominations, especially with the Roman Catholic clergy—with shopkeepers, farmers—with all classes, in fact, and the feeling they expressed was one of extreme horror of the conspiracy. The conspiracy was one got up in America in 1857 by Mr. O'Mahony and others, who appeared to think that the whole of Ireland was ready to join them. It was sought to be established in Ireland by American agents; but far from there being anything like a universal feeling of sympathy in Ireland with Fenianism, the farmers in that country feared that if the Fenians came over they would be ejected themselves—that the small holdings of the poor would fare no better than the large ones of the rich. In 1832 and 1834 the division of the land was the object sought to be achieved; and in 1843 and 1844, when immense meetings were held, the people did not assemble for nothing. They took part in the agitation with the idea that when the English were expelled the landed proprietors would be expelled with them, and there would be a division of land. When, in 1848, physical succeeded to moral force, the leading idea still was a re-distribution and apportionment of the estates. In 1860, when a meeting presided over by the hon. Member for Tralee was held in Dublin, for the almost avowed purpose of inviting the French to land in Ireland, the late Mr. William Smith O'Brien wrote to the secretary of the meeting protesting, in the strongest language, against such a proceeding. Ireland had been in a state of agitation for the thirty years before the last two years—there was peace until the Fenian movement reached that country. He trusted that the Fenians would find the English Government was too strong for them. The Motion of the hon. Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue) was in itself harmless, and it might be useful to institute an inquiry into the alleged grievances of Ireland; but if the Motion were carried, the people of Ireland would think the Fenians were right and had really something to complain of. It had been asserted that Fenianism was caused by the Church Establishment, and the opposition to what was called tenant-right. He did not concur in that view of the matter. The Fenians had nothing to say to the Established Church; and, as to tenant-right, he might remark that it was largely exercised in his county, and, indeed, he knew few landlords who did not allow it. He denied also what the hon. Member for the city of Cork (Mr. Maguire) had stated—namely, that no tenants who had leases had left the country, for he knew several cases of such tenants having gone to America. Neither was it correct to state that the want of work was a reason for their going. He knew of hundreds of men who had been induced to join the Federal army, and who were under engagement to return to Ireland and join the Fenian movement. In his own town twenty young men, apprentices in different establishments, went all together to join the Federal army and several returned to Ireland; but when they heard that the Government were taking strong measures, and that the Commission was issued, they absconded, and no more was seen of them. In Dublin there were hundreds of such fellows lounging about the streets. This state of things was dangerous, but it certainly was not one which would be ameliorated by the Motion brought forward by the hon. Member for Tralee, which he therefore hoped would not receive the sanction of the House.

Mr. ESMONDE said, that the discussion had assumed a very wide character, which was not unnatural considering the subject, but he ventured to recall the attention of the House to the proposal immediately before it. A paragraph in the Address treated of the Fenian conspiracy, and the Amendment proposed to be substituted for that paragraph had reference to the alleged causes of the sympathy which we were told, and which he believed, existed to a certain extent in Ireland with that conspiracy. Now, hon. Members who like himself were aware of the existence of those causes, but who, at the same time, were unwilling to give the slightest shadow of a reason for any one to believe that they did not entertain the utmost horror of the conspiracy itself, were placed by the Amendment in a very unpleasant position, for to vote for the omission of the clause would be as distasteful to them as to ignore the causes which led to this sympathy with Fenianism. There was another consideration which also influenced him in this matter, should his hon. Friend press his Motion to a division he would be in a very small minority. Now he feared this might be misunderstood in Ireland, and that the people of that country might, when they saw the body of English Liberals voting in the majority, mistake the significance of the division, and consider, however erroneously, that that party had refused to listen to their claims for redress; and that thus the union, or rather he might say re-union, which he was happy to say was taking place between English and Irish Liberals, might be in some sort endangered, and that good feeling which was growing up between them might run some risk of being impaired. He would, therefore, suggest to his hon. Friend the Member for Tralee, that should he succeed in eliciting from Her Majesty's Government a favourable expression of their views upon the subject of his Amendment, he would have done good service to his country and attained his object; and that he should not, under the circumstances, press it to a division. The Lord Lieutenant and his hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland at the Lord Mayor's dinner in Dublin the other day, gave utterance to certain sentiments as to the policy of the Government regarding Ireland. Should those sentiments be endorsed by the Government here he thought that might fully satisfy his hon. Friend, as it certainly would him, as to their intentions. He took the liberty of addressing himself more particularly to the leader of the House, and saying that some of his speeches during the last Session had raised hopes in Ireland, and exercised large influence upon the late elections there; and the result was seen in the increased number of Liberals returned to the present Parliament as compared with the last. He begged very respectfully, then, to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, and to ask him merely to endorse the expressions of two Members of his own Government.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have been anxious to follow this debate to its close, and to be guided entirely by the convenience of the House, in either confining myself to the single subject which has as yet been introduced into the discussions of this evening, or in addressing myself at once to remarks which any Gentleman might wish to make on any other topic adverted to in the Address. As however, during the whole of the evening, the attention of the House has been confined to a subject well worthy of that attention, I will follow the example of those who have addressed us this evening, and offer a few remarks on the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue), reserving liberty to myself, if occasion should arise, and if other subjects should subsequently be introduced in the discussion on the entire question, to offer such explanation as may be required on the part of the Government. With respect to the debate of this evening, I cannot but begin by saying that I think those who have watched it through the many hours during which it has continued will agree with me in the belief that Ireland has no cause to be ashamed of the manner in which her case has been stated by her representatives; whether I look to the ability displayed; to the spirit of seriousness and earnestness which marked their speeches; to the strong and unequivocal language which they have held on the subject of the Fenian conspiracy; or last, and not least important, to the determined disposition they have shown to prefer the methods of constitutional action and discussion to other and less legitimate methods of advancing political ends. But, Sir, while acknowledging the ability, and even the spirit, of the hon. Member for Tralee, I must explain why it is impossible for the Government to accede to the Motion which he has made. I take that Motion in the form in which he has himself laid it before the House, as a Motion to omit from our Address a paragraph corresponding with the paragraph in the Speech which related to Fenianism, and to substitute for it the words he has proposed. We are not prepared to part with the paragraph which relates to Fenianism. It has three objects. In the first place it aims at denouncing the conspiracy, which, as we believe, is subversive of all that a civilized community ought to cherish and maintain. I understand and respect the motives of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire), when he states that persons of pure and virtuous life are unhappily involved in sympathy with this conspiracy. It is an unhappy truth that, amid the infirmities of human nature, purity of intention is no uniform safeguard against the most serious errors. But we are not here to pass moral judgment upon our countrymen. We are here to denounce a great public evil; and this solemn denunciation which Her Majesty has been advised to utter from the Throne will, I trust, be sustained and re-echoed by the general and, I venture to hope, the unanimous judgment of the House. In the second place, the paragraph states a fact as important as it is gratifying. It is gratifying that this unhappy outbreak has developed in Ireland a public opinion which has sustained and strengthened the arm of law and authority, and has enabled the Government to walk firmly forward in the path of repression without fear without harshness, and without favour. The public opinion to which I refer is happily not dependent upon any one class or any one portion of the Irish people, however important or however powerful; but it represents, as has been truly said in the Speech and in the Address, all who are interested in the maintenance of authority, property, and religion without distinction of creed or sect. The hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley), however, in the tranquil period of the evening, uttered a protest against placing upon the same ground the disapprovals which have been emphatically declared by the Roman Catholic clergy, and those which have proceeded from other quarters, and which are entertained in every loyal heart and every enlightened mind. But, Sir, we differ from the hon. Member for Peterborough, as the especial object of this paragraph is to mark the satisfaction with which Her Majesty's Government has announced, and with which this House receives the announcement, that all who feel an interest in the maintenance of property, authority, and religion, the three great pillars of civilized society, are, upon this occasion, at least, happily united, and determined to maintain the law, and to discountenance and condemn all who rise in opposition to the law. Lastly, Sir, as to the third object of this paragraph, I hope, indeed I feel sure from what I have heard in the course of this debate, that our intention is not disapproved when, in the language which describes the methods in which the law has been vindicated, we have invited the House to join with us, at least by implication, in expressing a general approval of those methods, as having been characterized by fairness as well as firmness. And, although hon. Gentlemen have reserved their judgment—as they had a perfect right to do—respecting the time when the necessity for repression began, still the opinions which have proceeded from every quarter of the House have expressed satisfaction with the conduct of the Executive as advised by the Law Officers of the Crown in Ireland. And here I may be permitted to congratulate the Attorney General for Ireland on the manner and results of the first acts of his official life. We cannot, therefore, willingly at least, part with the paragraph proposed. But let me refer to the paragraph suggested by the hon. Member for Tralee; and I will take it either as in substitution of, or as an addition to, that portion of the Address under discussion. He proposes that we should humbly express our very deep regret to Her Majesty that a wide-spread dissatisfaction exists in Ireland, and that we should humbly represent to Her Majesty that this wide-spread dissatisfaction is the result of causes which it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to examine into and remove. Now, Sir, in the first place, I doubt the wisdom or necessity of the formal announcement by this House of the statement that a wide-spread dissatisfaction exists in Ireland, which may be liable to much misrepresentation among persons not so well informed as ourselves of the actual state of the country. I further doubt the wisdom of representing that this dissatisfaction, which must be interpreted in the present instance as synonymous with Fenianism, is the result of certain grave causes which it is our duty to remove. My objections are twofold. In the first place, I am far from saying that it intends to state that dissatisfaction is a justification or palliation of Fenianism; but, certainly, the proposed paragraph partakes too much of that character, or, at least, too easily permits that interpretation to be placed upon it. In the second place, I greatly object to stating that the evils of Ireland are the result of causes which it is our duty, thereby implying that it is in our power, to remove. Why, that very flattering and alluring suggestion? But because it is flattering and alluring, I suspect it, and hesitate to adopt it all the more. The evils of Ireland are inveterate. The hon. and gallant Member for Longford in an able speech to-night has well pointed out that, in a country where misgovernment or where oppression has prevailed, you must not expect that by removing the causes you will immediately get rid of the effect. You may withdraw the weapon which has caused the wound, but it does not follow that the process of healing will be immediate. Therefore, Sir, inveterate and complicated as is the great Irish question in all its branches, I hesitate to adopt any words which seem to pledge Parliament to a promise which it would be unable to fulfil. On these grounds, I respectfully object to the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman. But I confess that I think there is a still wider ground for objection. Her Majesty has had before her in this matter the case of a conspiracy subversive of law, order, property, and religion. It is well that Her Majesty, and that this House, when dealing with those who seek amendment of the law, should enter frankly upon the discussion raised; but these are not persons seeking amendment of the law. They are seeking to dismember the British Empire. Now, Sir, it appears to me that the Executive, in the face of a fact like this, had one duty to perform, not its only duty, but certainly its first duty, and one so distinct and important that nothing should be mixed up with the performance of that duty which can possibly be construed into a condition or a restriction. Therefore, I frankly own I am loth to the last degree in dealing with the subject of Fenianism in the Address in answer to the Speech, that we should place in connection with what we say upon that subject any promises of the nature I have described. Such promises may be well enough in their own place, provided they are limited in their terms, that the time be fitting, and that they be not liable to misunderstanding; but I submit that, either as a substitution for or addition to the paragraph in the Address, they would not, if examined in the spirit of political prudence, be pronounced to be either in the right place, or set forth at the right time. I fully understand the anxiety of Irish Members who come to us and say that in looking at an evil so portentous as Fenianism you must not be content with that view. But, Sir, having said that, and having strongly and clearly, or at least as strongly and clearly as I can, asserted our duty of confining ourselves in the Address we propose to present, to the denunciation of this great and monstrous evil, I fully understand the anxiety of Irish Members who come to us and say, that in looking at a phenomenon so portentous as Fenianism, you must not be content with that view of it which has exclusive reference to the means of repression. It is invariably true that in such cases as that which we are considering the guilt does not all lie on one side and the reason and right on the other; but that mixed motives and mixed considerations are to be found upon both sides. It may be that we should more properly look not so much for the cause; but, as I once heard it expressed with reference to another great case of discontent—to the causes of that cause—to that which is removed from Fenianism by many links perhaps; and it may be that these causes would form a proper and legitimate subject for the consideration of Parliament. Sir, the representatives of Irish constituencies have not shrunk from stating in this debate the subjects to which they, or some of them, think it right that the attention of Parliament should be directed, with a view to improving the state of Ireland. We have heard of the questions of the University, of National Education, of the Established Church, of the reclamation of waste land, of the tax on absentees, of tenant-right, of loans, of railways, and of general measures for promoting the material prosperity of Ireland. The noble Lord the Member for Cocker mouth (Lord Naas) has given a fair description of these subjects. Taken in the mass, he says they are fair questions for the consideration of Parliament. I suppose he does not mean to pledge himself by any means to the practicable character of each and all of those subjects. It would be impossible for Parliament to venture upon making promises with regard to them. Vague promises, general comprehensive and sweeping promises, would result in infinite difficulty, especially when addressed to people whose minds are yet sore and sensitive with the recollection of former wrongs. They would, moreover, create little confidence, convey little comfort, and only tend to bring into difficulty and to hamper the body by which they were made. Now, Sir, what I submit is this. There are some of these questions already in motion; there are others of them which it is the intention, or may be the intention, of Members representing various constituencies to bring under the consideration of the House. Let the Government be judged upon each of these questions as it arises, in the spirit in which it attempts to deal with them. I have been asked whether we approve the language which has been used by the representatives of the Government in Ireland in respect to their general views and principles as to the way in which the administration in that country should be carried on. Not being cognizant of the precise terms of that language, it is impossible to give a categorical reply; but I may say that my noble Friend and my right hon. Friend, who represent the Government in Ireland, have been chosen by Her Majesty to represent it on the ground that the principles on which we know they are prepared to act, and therefore the language in which we should expect them to speak, are the principles and are the language by which we wish ourselves to be represented to the people of Ireland. Sir, our first duty is to condemn the folly, the madness, and the deep guilt of this conspiracy. I respect the sentiment, for I see it to be a sentiment of high honour, which has prevented the hon. Member for Tralee from saying he joins in the emphatic condemnation of Fenianism. I am certain it is not because he does not condemn it; but, at the same time, I feel that the more clear, distinct, and unequivocal our language on the subject is, not only the better do we discharge our duty to the Throne, to the law, and to our constituents, but the greater mercy we show to the deluded persons who are at once the agents and the victims of this conspiracy. But, Sir, having said this, I concur with those who say that the existence, and the emerging from a conspiracy like this, so far from taking away any duty, any obligation of the Legislature and the Government to examine into Irish evils, with a sincere desire to improve the condition of the country, on the contrary, raises that obligation to its highest point. Nor is that merely in deference to the dictates of political expediency, and the obvious necessity of avoiding the mischief consequent upon the existence of such a conspiracy. It is due from us also, in acknowledgment and in gratitude for the strong and genuine Irish sentiment which has been developed upon this painful and critical—but yet, perhaps, in some respects beneficial—occasion, which has given to the law, and to the representatives of the law, a strength such as in that country they never before enjoyed. The noble Lord the Member for Cockermouth (Lord Naas), and other hon. Members, have enumerated the great results which have been attained to Ireland, by Irish Members making their appeal on the subject of the welfare of their country to the Imperial Parliament. If those great works of improvement which have been already performed have now re-acted beneficially upon Ireland in such a way as to marshal on our side more than ever before was known all the best sentiment, conviction, and intelligence of the country, that I say is at once the greatest of all encouragements, and the highest of all obligations, to lead us to persevere in the carrying forward of such works. Sir, for my own part, I can only beg to say that which I have often presumed to say in this House. We are an united people, with a common Government, and a complete political incorporation. But we are also an united kingdom made up of three nations, of three countries welded politically into one, but necessarily and in fact with many distinctions of law, of usage, of character, of history, and of religion. In circumstances such as these there are common questions which must be administered upon principles common to the whole Empire—all those questions in which the interests of the whole overbear and swallow up the interests of the part. The composition of the Government must be determined, not by domicile or birthplace, but by the competence of those who are chosen to fill offices of State. The levying of taxes and the administration of the public revenue must, it is obvious, be governed by principles applicable to the three kingdoms alike—alike as a general rule, subject, possibly, in certain cases, to exception. But, if there be exceptions, they should be well defined as exceptions, they should be thoroughly understood by the three kingdoms as exceptions; and, above all, if there are exceptions made in behalf of one particular country, they should not be made in favour of class, party, or place in that country, but to the whole of that country alike. But, Sir, there are many other questions in regard to which, in England, in Scotland, in Ireland, that interest which is English, Scotch, or Irish respectively predominates over that which is common. Those are the questions which, when they relate to Ireland, I apprehend we ought commonly to call Irish questions. With respect to all the questions that fall into that category, we ought of course to apply to Ireland the same principles on which we act in the other countries, not making the opinion of the one country overrule the opinions and settle the questions belonging to the others, but dealing with the subjects and the interests of each as nearly as we can in accordance with the views and sentiments of the natives of that country. Sir, I hope, therefore, that while this House will avoid giving forth to the world vague promises capable of misapprehension, I also hope that as each subject connected with the condition of Ireland comes before us, we shall be able to treat it, if it be specifically Irish, with a special view to Irish objects and interests. I say this whether the questions may lie in the sphere especially of the mind and the feelings of men, as do those connected with education and religion, or whether they may refer to political arrangements or social arrangements; or whether they may refer to that other class of subjects well worthy, indeed, of the attention of Parliament which are connected with the material prosperity of Ireland. And I frankly own I cling to the hope, though quite unable to define the precise extent or even the precise manner in which Parliament may be able to realize that hope, that it may be possible for England to do hereafter that which she has often done before, to assist with a liberal hand, perhaps, under improved circumstances, and with views matured by experience, to promote the development of that material prosperity. It is in that way we can best hope to attain the object well described by the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) to-night, when he said that it is our duty to destroy the trade of the conspirator. It is our duty to restrain and to repress his acts, strongly to denounce them in their character and their tendency; but it is our duty above all, if we can, to destroy his trade, pursuing that system of practical legislation by which, as has been observed, so much progress has already been made rallying on the side of the law and the Government all the best sentiments and feelings of the country, by which we hope to contribute alike to its welfare, and to the credit, and the honour, and the dignity of the British Empire.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he had been urged by many of his hon. Friends to withdraw the Amendment, and to add the words to, instead of substituting them for, the paragraph in the Address. He wished, therefore, to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the Amendment was in possession of the House, and that it was for the House to decide whether they would grant permission to the hon. Gentleman to make the change he proposed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

To add, at the end of the same paragraph, the words "Humbly to express our deep regret to Her Majesty that wide-spread disaffection exists in Ireland, and humbly to represent to Her Majesty that this wide-spread disaffection is the result of grave causes, which it is the duty of Her Majesty's Ministers to examine into and remove."—(The O'Donoghue.)

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The House divided :—Ayes 25 ; Noes 346 : Majority 321.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON rose to move the adjournment of the debate. Although it had occupied the unusual period of two nights, the House had only touched upon two subjects ; but there was a question more important than either of them which had not yet been referred to—namely, the subject of Parliamentary Reform, concerning which they had had no information from Her Majesty's Government. He therefore thought it desirable they should adjourn the debate until to-morrow night.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Government had no desire to avoid discussion upon all the points of the Speech ; but they stood in a peculiar position. His right hon. Friend (Sir George Grey) had given notice of a Bill upon the subject of the cattle plague for Monday, and another hon. Member (Mr. Hunt) had likewise expressed his intention of raising the same question. It was exceedingly desirable that the House should not run any risk of the postponement of that subject ; but as the Report of the Address must be brought up the day after the debate was concluded, there would be no security against the cattle plague question being thrown over if the present debate were adjourned. Upon that ground he would suggest that the Address should be allowed to pass, and then a full opportunity would be afforded to raise discussion upon it on the Report to-morrow (this day).

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that he would assent to that course.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Committee appointed, to draw up an Address to be presented to Her Majesty upon the said Resolution :—Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH, Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Sir GEORGE GREY, Mr. SECRETARY CARDWELL, Sir CHARLES WOOD, Mr. MILNER GIBSON, Mr. VILLIERS, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, The LORD ADVOCATE, and Mr. CHILDERS, of any Three of them :—To withdraw immediately :—Queen's Speech referred.

NATIONAL DEBTS ACTS.

RESOLUTIONS IN COMMITTEE.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he moved that the Speaker leave the Chair, in order that he might submit to the House preliminary Resolutions for bringing in two Bills founded on principles which had obtained universal approval. The first of them aimed at the extinction of two small funds which belonged to the old Sinking Fund, which was cancelled by Parliament forty years ago. The other fund arose from the interest on unclaimed stock and unappropriated dividends. He also proposed, in connection with the Post Office savings banks, to pass a Resolution for the confirmation of permanent annuities, according to a plan peculiarly accepted by Parliament, at first in a formal manner, and which had the effect of contributing to defray the charges of the National Debt by a sum which exceeded £100,000 a year. By this means it was proposed to create £5,000,000 of stock, and the plan would operate advantageously on the annual charges of the country, and that was an operation to be extended as much as circumstances would permit.

Motion agreed to.

Acts considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Laws relating to unclaimed Stock and Dividends and to Donations and Bequests, and to grant powers for cancelling certain perpetual Stocks of Annuities standing in the names of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt on account of unclaimed Stock and of Donations and Bequests; and to make provision, out of the Consolidated Fund, for any charge which shall arise in consequence of the said unclaimed Stock having been so cancelled.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Laws relating to the investments for Savings Banks and for Post Office Savings Banks, and to grant powers for the conversion of certain perpetual Government Annuities standing in the names of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt on account of the Fund for the Banks for Savings, and also on account of the Post Office Savings Bank Fund, into certain other Stocks and Annuities; and to provide for due payment thereof out of the Consolidated Fund.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

EXCHEQUER AND AUDIT DEPARTMENTS.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER presented a Bill to consolidate the duties of the Exchequer and Audit Departments, to regulate the receipt, custody, and issue of public monies, and to provide for the audit of the accounts thereof. He said, the course he proposed to take with regard to the Bill was to introduce it that night, and in consideration of its importance to allow a fortnight to elapse before he moved the second reading. He should next propose to refer it to the Select Committee on Public Accounts; and, as it was a Bill almost entirely relating to public accounts, it would receive a more impartial, authoritative, and searching examination before that Committee than it would in any other way. The object of the Bill was, first of all, to consolidate the departments of Exchequer and Audit, while the personal functions of the Controller of the Exchequer would not be interfered with. The next object of the Bill was to apply to what was called the Exchequer check the principles of modifications recommended by the very important Committee on Public Monies which sat some years ago, so as to preserve the constitutional form of the Exchequer check, but to introduce harmony into all proceedings subsequent to that operation so as to get rid of a great deal of unnecessary and expensive book-keeping now carried on. The third and most important object was this. During the discussion which arose last year out of Mr. Edmunds' case, it became known to Parliament much more fully than had formerly been the case, that there were many branches of public receipt and expenditure that were not subjected to audit, and that the whole system of audit was in a most unsatisfactory state. Some of the expenditure was audited by the Audit Board, which was quite right; some of it by the Treasury, which was quite wrong, for the Treasury was a department for controlling, and not auditing, the expenditure; and, lastly, a good deal of it was not audited at all. The Government proposed to substitute for that threefold irregular and anomalous method of proceeding an uniform method, by which the whole of the expenditure should be audited by the proper department appointed for the purpose—namely, the Audit Board. The appropriation audit would therefore be carried throughout the whole of the public expenditure.

MR. BOUVERIE said, that the system of audit had hitherto not been satisfactory. The ancient system had become obsolete, and lately had, in fact, been no check at all. Under these circumstances, he believed that the Bill now introduced would effect a very great improvement.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to consolidate the duties of the Exchequer and Audit Departments, to regulate the receipt, custody, and issue of Public Monies, and to provide for the audit of the accounts thereof, ordered to be brought in by MR. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and MR. CHILDERS.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 8.]

QUALIFICATION FOR OFFICES ABOLITION.

RESOLUTION IN COMMITTEE. FIRST READING.

Qualification for Offices Abolition—Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Moved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House that leave be given to bring in a Bill to render it unnecessary to make and subscribe certain declarations as a Qualification for Offices and Employments; to indemnify such persons as have omitted to qualify themselves for Office and Employment; and for other purposes relating thereto.—(Mr. Hadfield.)

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, he must express his regret that the hon. Member for Sheffield thought it necessary to moot this question again; but he hoped the hon. Member, as he proposed the Bill in his capacity as an independent Member, would name the second reading for a Wednesday. When the second reading came on he should move that it be read a second time that day six months. The Bill had been several times rejected by the House of Lords, and carried in that House by very small majorities.

Mr. HADFIELD said, he must remind the hon. Member that he had been invited to serve on the Select Committee to which the previous Bill had been referred, and that he had declined. The principle of the Bill had already been six times assented to by the House, and sought merely to repeal a qualification which had never been enforced. A noble Earl in another place (the Earl of Derby), had declared that the declaration, which had never been enforced for thirty-eight years, was not worth the paper on which it was written. He (Mr. Hadfield) was averse to having the second reading for a Wednesday, as he desired the Members of the Government to be present.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, that he had declined to act on the Committee, because he felt confident that it would find that which they did find—namely, that the Bill consisted entirely of principle, and that, with effect, they could not alter one word of the Bill. The explanation as to the majority on the previous Bill lay in the fact that the measure was brought on for third reading at so late an hour that its opponents were taken by surprise.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. HADFIELD, Sir MORTON L'ETRE, and Mr. BAINES.

RAILWAY TRAVELLING IN IRELAND BILL.

On Motion of Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, Bill further to secure to the Public the means of travelling by Railway in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, Major GAVIN, and Captain STACPOOLE.

PRINTING.

Select Committee appointed, to "assist Mr. Speaker in all matters which relate to the Printing executed by Order of this House, and for the purpose of selecting and arranging for Printing, Returns and Papers presented in pursuance of Motions made by Members of this House:"—Mr. BONHAM-CARTER, Sir JOHN PAKINGTON, Mr. WALFORD, Mr. HENLEY, Mr. SECRETARY CARDWELL, Mr. GASKELL, Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, The O'CONNOR DON, Mr. HASTINGS RUSSELL, and Mr. CHILDERS:—Three to be the quorum.

REIGATE ELECTION.

Petition of Electors, complaining of that Election [App. 8]; referred to the General Committee of Elections, and Mr. Speaker to issue his Warrants for persons, papers, and records.

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, February 9, 1866.

MINUTES.]—Several Lords took the Oath.

ROLL OF THE LORDS.

The Lord Chancellor acquainted the House, That the Clerk of the Parliaments had prepared and laid it on the Table.

The same was Ordered to be printed. (No. 3.)

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

HER MAJESTY'S Answer to the Address, reported as follows:—

"My Lords,

"I THANK you for your loyal and dutiful Address, and for the renewed Assurance of your affectionate Interest in every Event which tends to increase the domestic Happiness of Myself and My Family.

"I FEEL confident that the various Measures, which will be submitted to you, to improve the Law and promote the Welfare of My People, will receive your earnest and careful Consideration."

IRELAND—PAY OF THE CONSTABULARY.—QUESTION.

In reply to a Question of The Earl of LEITRIM,

EARL RUSSELL said, that there had been no Royal Commission inquiring into the subject of the Irish police; but, as a question was raised a short time ago with reference to the pay and emoluments of the police in Ireland, an official inquiry had been instituted, with directions to report what means, if any, could be devised for the greater efficiency of the police.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM asked if the noble Earl would have any objection to lay the papers relating to the inquiry before their Lordships?

EARL RUSSELL said, he could not undertake to produce the documents relating to the inquiry, inasmuch as they were of a confidential character; but the results of the inquiry would be laid before Parliament.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF GRANARD asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce the Bill carrying out the recommendations of the Dublin Commission, respecting measures for the prevention or localization of the cattle plague, or at least so much of them as had not already been embodied in the Orders of Council? The recommendations to which he referred were as follows:—

“That the owners of cattle should, in an infected district, be compensated out of an union poor rate of the union in which the infected district was situate, compensation in no case to exceed two-thirds of the value of the animal, or to amount to more than £12; that when that rate exceeded 6d. in the pound on the valuation of the union in such cases the Government should sanction a rate-in-aid to be charged equally on all the Unions in Ireland. That the constabulary should make a census of the cattle in each union, and that claims for compensation should be determined by the justices at petty sessions, upon whose certificate the clerk of the union would be empowered to pay the amount of compensation allowed at such sessions.”

These recommendations, he believed, had met with general approval in Ireland, and not only required no interference on the part of the central authorities but could be put in force by means of machinery which was already in existence.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the recommendations of the Dublin Commission were already in the hands of the Irish Law Officers, with a view to see how far these recommendations could be made the subject of a Bill.

THE EARL OF MANSFIELD presented petitions from the Chamber of Agriculture and Scottish Farmers' Club and others praying that their Lordships

“Would be pleased, by Act of Parliament, to stop the removal of all cattle from one place in Great Britain to another for a limited time, with the exception perhaps of fat cattle, sent, under stringent regulations, to slaughter—and, in connection therewith, to enact further, that all animals labouring under the disease shall be immediately slaughtered and buried in the skin—the owners thereof being compensated to the extent of one-half the value thereof out of the national purse, or from such other source as the wisdom of Parliament may devise; that all cattle which have come in contact with diseased animals, or which have been in the same enclosure with them, though yet showing no symptoms of the disease, shall also be immediately slaughtered on the premises, the offals to be disinfected and buried, the hides to be disinfected and sold, and the carcasses also, when duly certified by the inspector as fit for human food, to be sold for the benefit of the owners—one-half of the loss thereon to the owner, to be compensated, in like manner, out of the public purse, or otherwise as aforesaid; that full advantage be taken of this compulsory stoppage of transit of cattle in order that Parliament may carry out such sanitary measures as shall extinguish effectually all germs of the disease in every district in which it has appeared, so as, if possible, to prevent their development on the removal of the interdict; and in particular, that the whole premises occupied by diseased animals, or by animals which have come in contact, or been in the same enclosure, shed, or byre with diseased animals, shall be thoroughly cleansed and disinfected, and the manure, litter, and fodder, taken therefrom, also disinfected or burnt at the occupiers' expense—that, during the prevalence of the disease, all dogs, not under proper control, shall be liable to be destroyed if found off the owner's premises; that all local authorities shall see the provisions of the Act observed, and the penalties for the infringement thereof strictly enforced, and that every person offending against such enactments shall, for every offence, forfeit a sum not exceeding £20, which the Judge, before whom such person shall be convicted of such offence, may determine.”

Earl Russell

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH said, that there had been a correspondence at the Foreign Office with respect to the system employed by two Belgian practitioners for the cure of the cattle plague, and inquired if the Government would lay that correspondence on the table.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he had not had time to read all the correspondence, but he believed there was no objection to lay it on the table. With regard to those practitioners, they refused to appear before the Royal Commissioners, and the homœopathic treatment having been tried in this country, and having been found to be no more satisfactory than what had been done by other practitioners, that refusal did not appear to be of much importance.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH said, he had been informed by good authority in Brussels that the report disparaging the treatment of the two practitioners to whom he had alluded was drawn up by certain veterinary officers employed by the Belgian Government who were strongly opposed to homœopathy. He regretted, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government had published that report in this country. To say that the treatment pursued in Norfolk was the homœopathic treatment was not correct. The treatment of the plague by the practitioners in Belgium had some of the features of homœopathy, but was quite different from the homœopathic treatment which had been adopted in this country. He thought the Government was wrong in throwing cold water on experiments made with a view to cure this destructive disease.

EARL SPENCER said, he had been mixed up in the matter, and therefore rose to corroborate the statement of the noble Earl the President of the Council, that these gentlemen had refused to be examined before the Royal Commission, although the Commissioners were ready to examine their mode of treatment. He had subsequently received a letter from our Minister at Brussels suggesting that these gentlemen should be again brought over to this country; and his reply was that if they would come over to this country, and would consent to be examined by the Royal Commission, not only would their expenses be paid, but they would be handsomely rewarded for every animal they cured. This offer was declined. He believed that the Dutch Government had expressed an opinion that the treatment adopted in that country was not successful.

ABYSSINIA—IMPRISONMENT OF BRITISH SUBJECTS. QUESTION.

LORD CHELMSFORD, in rising to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs for the latest Information he has received as to the Condition of Consul Cameron and other Persons in Abyssinia; what progress Mr. Rassam has made in his Mission; and whether any and what Efforts have been made in addition to Mr. Rassam's Mission to procure the Liberation of the Prisoners, said: My Lords, I need not apologize for taking so early an opportunity of calling the attention of the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to a subject which should be interesting to every one who has the honour and dignity of his country at heart, and who can feel sympathy for the sufferings of his fellow-creatures. It is now more than two years since a British Consul accredited to the Government of

Abyssinia was thrown by the Emperor of Abyssinia into prison, loaded with chains, and subjected to the most cruel treatment. This long interval of his imprisonment has been filled up by a sad event, the death of his mother, which was greatly hastened by her grief and anxiety as to the fate of her son. My Lords, there was a time when the mere statement of such an indignity being offered to one in our Consular service would have roused the indignation of the people throughout the country; but it appears we are learning gradually to bear these outrages on our fellow-countrymen, in foreign countries, with patience and submission. The first occasion on which this subject was called to my notice was in the beginning of last year, when some friends of the Consul applied to me to bring the matter before this House, stating their opinion to be that the original imprisonment of their relation was entirely attributable to the fault of the Foreign Office, and that the prolongation of his sufferings was to be ascribed to the injudicious course afterwards adopted by that office. My Lords, I was reluctant for some time to bring forward such a charge, as I felt it impossible for me to do so without first obtaining all the information that could be desired from the papers in the hands of Government. I therefore applied to the noble Earl at the head of the Government, who was then the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to know whether he would grant me these papers, and I must say that the noble Earl then endeavoured, in every possible way, to deter me from bringing the matter forward. He warned me that if I attempted to agitate the question I should be answerable for the increased sufferings to which the unfortunate captives might be subjected. My Lords, with this heavy responsibility thrown upon me, I felt it to be my duty carefully to select such papers as would furnish me with all the necessary information, but which, at the same time, could not contain anything that could prejudicially affect Mr. Cameron. My Lords, the noble Earl, to my great surprise, still refused to grant me those papers without the consent of the House, and I was therefore compelled to trouble your Lordships with a Motion on the subject. Upon the discussion which took place upon that Motion, the noble Earl repeated his assertions that my interference in the matter, and my application for these documents, were calculated to increase the sufferings which had been inflicted upon these unhappy prisoners. My Lords, I entreated the noble Earl to tell me which of all the papers I had specified would be productive of that effect, and I received from him a most singular answer—namely, that he did not say that the production of any one of the papers would be likely to aggravate the sufferings of the prisoners, but that the production of all of them, taken together, and the comments likely to be made upon them in the newspapers would have that effect. The noble Earl resisted to the last my application for these documents; I was compelled to divide the House on the question for their production, and by a bare majority I succeeded in obtaining them. I examined the papers carefully, and I am of opinion that they fully justify the friends of the Consul in the opinion that his original imprisonment was attributable mainly to the fault of the Foreign Office, and that they had taken a most injudicious course to obtain his release. I therefore felt it my duty to bring the question before the House. On that occasion the noble Earl said that “I had then, as on a former occasion, shown myself entirely regardless of the safety of Consul Cameron and the other persons imprisoned by the Emperor of Abyssinia if I could only throw blame on the Government.”

My Lords, this is a very serious charge, and I trust the House will believe me when I utterly deny that there is the slightest foundation for it. I felt for the unhappy captives most deeply. Indeed, it was impossible that anybody could receive the statement of what these prisoners had to endure with the indifference imputed to me by the noble Earl; and, considering that the relations of the Consul felt they had a right to complain of the conduct of the Government, a complaint which I thought was justified by the papers before me, I saw no reason why I should shrink from the duty I had undertaken of calling your Lordships' attention to them. I think upon that occasion the noble Earl might have been better employed in showing that the judgment I had formed on these papers was not well-founded than in attributing motives to me, of which, if they had existed, he must have been entirely ignorant. I shall not, on the present occasion, trouble your Lordships with a repetition of the sad history of the sufferings of these unfortunate prisoners, but will confine myself to the proof, as it appears to me, that all which has happened to them is to be ascribed, shall I say to the neglect or want of judgment—I know not how to characterize it—of the Foreign Office; and that having been the original cause of those sufferings, the course taken is one which has proved, as might have been expected, an utter failure. When speaking of the Foreign Office your Lordships will understand that the noble Earl now Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (the Earl of Clarendon) is not answerable for any of these transactions. When they occurred the noble Earl was, I believe, not even a Member of the Government; he has only held the seals of the Foreign Office for a very short time. As I have always said, the whole of the misery which these prisoners have so long suffered, and which they are now suffering, is attributable to the fact of the Foreign Office having neglected to answer a letter which was sent by the Emperor of Abyssinia to this country, requesting that there might be mutual embassies between the two countries upon the footing of the Treaty of 1849, which was ratified and laid before Parliament. Consul Cameron in 1863 was upon the very best terms with the Emperor, and the Emperor thought it was a fit occasion to renew a project which he had long in view of cementing the friendly alliance between the two countries, and accordingly he sent the letter to the Queen to which I have already alluded, and which arrived in this country in February, 1863. That letter was unnoticed until the month of June, 1864—sixteen months afterwards. Upon the occasion of one of the discussions that took place on this unfortunate subject, the noble Earl (Earl Russell) said—may I say in a fit of unwonted candour?—he must admit there was some delay in answering this letter; but when I originally charged this delay upon the noble Earl, he rather smiled at my simplicity in supposing that a letter of that sort could be so easily answered. I will not, though encouraged by the noble Earl, do so much injustice to the united wisdom of the Cabinet as to imagine that a letter of any kind could take sixteen months to consider. I am rather disposed to think that the way in which the affairs of Europe and America were then pressing on the noble Earl occasioned him entirely to overlook a circumstance of such comparative insignificance as the indignities offered to a British Consul by a Sovereign to whom he was accredited. But be that as it may, it unfortunately occurred that the Emperor, about November, 1863, had his feelings strongly excited against two missionaries who were in Abyssinia, and they were imprisoned. I do not mean at all to enter into their case; I shall confine myself entirely to that of the Consul. The Emperor had been in a state of great excitement because the letter he had written a year before had received no attention whatever. He was incensed at the slight and affront offered to him; he let loose his feelings on the Consul, and caused him to be imprisoned. Now, I say, as far as these facts go, that I am entirely warranted in the judgment at which I arrived, carefully weighing and considering all the circumstances, that the original cause of the Consul's imprisonment was the omission to answer the Emperor's letter. But the Foreign Office was aware in the month of June, 1864, of the consequences of this unfortunate omission, and the important practical question now is, in what manner they set about to repair the mischief that had been caused. I have always maintained this—that under the circumstances in which the prisoners were placed, and with the irritated and excited feelings of the Sovereign, it would be necessary that a mission should be despatched from this country, at the head of which an Englishman of some mark should have been placed, and that he should not have gone empty-handed, but charged with presents, the customary mode of approaching Oriental princes. When I suggested this on a former occasion, the noble Earl said that the notion of sending presents to the Abyssinian Sovereign was absurd, and it would only be an inducement to him to believe that the best way of insuring respect and consideration was to imprison a British Consul. I did not think that a very good answer, but I was obliged to accept it at the time. Will it be believed that since it was given the person who has been employed in the mission has been charged with very considerable presents, which he was intrusted to deliver if he were permitted to approach the monarch? Instead of sending a subject of this country at the head of the mission, the Foreign Office, most unfortunately, as I think, selected for this office a Mr. Rassam, who was the Assistant to the Political Agent at Aden—a man I have no doubt of very considerable ability, who had, I believe, assisted Mr. Layard, the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in his interesting excavations at Nineveh; but to whom there was this most decided objection—even if he had ten times his ability and all the diplomatic skill any man ever possessed—he was an Asiatic, and for that very reason just the person who ought not to have been selected. Am I justified in the anticipations I formed at the time, that this was an unfortunate selection? Mr. Rassam arrived at Massowah in August, 1864, and he has never yet been permitted to approach the Emperor. Shortly after his arrival the Emperor, curious to know what sort of mission had been sent from England, despatched two of his subjects to Massowah, to examine and inspect, and there they found Mr. Rassam alone, with no presents. I believe an English medical man had accompanied him, but he had gone on leave of absence, and had left Mr. Rassam alone. The emissaries immediately returned with an account which certainly did not induce the Emperor of Abyssinia to respect the mission. If the Government had been driven to this selection, if there had been no one else to appoint to this mission but Mr. Rassam, of course that would be an answer to all objection; but various applications were made to the Foreign Office for permission to go out on this particular mission. Among others, there was one from a distinguished military officer who had been engaged on very delicate diplomatic missions in the East—Sir William Coghlan. There were also other persons I might mention; but I think it quite sufficient to say that the selection made was not likely to be palatable to the Sovereign of Abyssinia, nor to meet with his approbation. The Government, however, persisted in the selection of Mr. Rassam, and the consequence has been the failure of the mission up to this time, and from the last accounts received of the unfortunate prisoners it appears that they were still chained hand and foot. Whether there have been any occasional remissions in the severity of their confinement, I am not aware; but this was the account received respecting them down to so late a date as November last. I wish to know particularly what the Foreign Office has done for the purpose of supplying the deficiencies in the mission which they intrusted to Mr. Rassam. I understand that Mr. Palgrave has been sent out; but by the last accounts from him he had been at Cairo on six weeks' leave of absence, being satisfied that his services were not required to assist Mr. Rassam. With respect to Mr. Rassam, he has applied to the Emperor for a safe conduct, which he had not yet obtained. The Emperor of Abyssinia had gone on an expedition against rebels; therefore, many weeks or months must elapse before the safe conduct could be used, if ever it were sent at all. Now, I trust I have fairly stated the grounds on which I feel the deepest interest relative to this matter. I am most anxious to know what are the latest accounts relative to the condition of these unfortunate captives—for Consul Cameron is not the only captive—and whether Mr. Rassam has made any and what progress in his mission? I wish also more particularly to know whether any further effort has been made, beyond the mission of Mr. Rassam, from which we may indulge a hope of the liberation of these unfortunate prisoners at no distant day?

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: My Lords, I felt no surprise whatever that the noble and learned Lord, after the deep interest he has taken in the fate of these unfortunate men, should have, on the very first day of the Session, given notice of his desire to receive full information respecting the condition of these unfortunate men. He says very justly that the deep interest he feels is shared by a great many persons—we are all concerned for what has taken place; but I cannot help regretting the acrimony of the noble and learned Lord's tone, which I think uncalled for, and calculated to effect no benefit. The fact is, that up to this moment we do not know the real cause of Consul Cameron's detention. The noble Lord said it was on account of a letter not being answered in proper time, and we know that Captain Cameron has said that until the letter has received a civil answer he will not be liberated; and we know also that the missionaries and others have said that the cause of his detention is an alteration in the policy of this country towards Abyssinia. Now, though I admit there may have been delay on the part of the Foreign Office in answering the letter, the fact is that no great importance was attached to the letter, because the only essential part of it had been already answered by my noble Friend behind me (Earl Russell), who said that, before the Government could agree to certain things desired by the Emperor of Abyssinia, he must desist from the scheme of conquering provinces, and must ratify the treaty agreed to by his predecessor. The Emperor's answer was that he would not give up his schemes of conquest, and would not ratify the treaty.

the treaty had already been ratified by one of his predecessors, and there was no occasion for the present Emperor of Abyssinia to agree to it, as it was in force.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: It was not in force if the Emperor would not give force to it. Consul Cameron was directed to return to Massowah which were the head-quarters of his consulate, and to remain there until further orders. Unfortunately, Consul Cameron did not obey these instructions, or the instruction of the Emperor, but remained in Abyssinia; and it was to this his not having proceeded to Massowah as directed that all this distress and suffering have occurred. We know that the bearer of a letter from the Emperor of the French was thrown into chains because the letter was signed by M. Drouyn de Lhuys and not by the Emperor of the French. Our object was to prevent intermeddling in the affairs of the country, and when we found that Consul Cameron was mixed up with them a letter was written to him telling him to return to Massowah, and there to attend to his duties. This letter fell into the hands of the Emperor of Abyssinia, and, it is said, unfortunately caused the sufferings of the prisoners to be increased. The first we heard, not of the imprisonment, but of the detention of Consul Cameron, came by rumour through Egypt. It was, then, to be considered in what manner we should proceed—whether by force or negotiation, in order to effect the liberation of the prisoners. Now, to attempt to send an army across that deadly plain which separates Abyssinia from the sea, and to penetrate into the interior of the country through mountain passes and difficulties unknown, without any basis of operations or means of obtaining supplies, would have been a vain and idle endeavour. In such case the Emperor would have carried his prisoners further into the interior, or would have massacred them, while we should have sacrificed many thousand lives. Next came the question how should an attempt be made to attain the desired object by negotiation. The noble and learned Lord says that if he had been responsible for the matter he would have sent out an important mission, headed by a man of rank. Now I think that if he had been responsible he would have done no such thing, for it is likely that the members of that mission would have shared the same fate as Consul Cameron. We have evidence for believing that the Emperor of Abyssinia supposed that by keeping these men prisoners he would coerce the British Government into his policy. Therefore, I think that every man belonging to such a mission as the noble Lord suggested would have been thrown into chains; and I need not say how much the difficulties of the case would have been aggravated by such an event. That Consul Cameron had fallen into a state of captivity was his own fault; but if the Queen had sent from this country an important mission, and if all the members of it had been thrown into chains, it would then have been necessary to adopt every measure to obtain their release, or the prestige of England would have been at an end throughout the East. When, therefore, in the case of the present prisoners we had to decide on the selection of an efficient agent, our choice fell on Mr. Rassam. I am at a loss to account for the hostility which the noble and learned Lord has now, and in the previous Session, displayed towards Mr. Rassam.

LORD CHELMSFORD: I have invariably said that I had no doubt Mr. Rassam was a man of very great ability. My only objection to his appointment was—and I considered it a conclusive objection—that he was not a European.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: The noble and learned Lord may have said that, but he has also always contended that he was an unfit person to be sent out on his present mission.

LORD CHELMSFORD: Only on that ground.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: Only on that ground! The noble and learned Lord could have said nothing more decisive—such language, I maintain, calculated to lead the Emperor of Abyssinia, if his words reached him, to think that to send Mr. Rassam on this mission was an insult towards him on the part of this country. The noble and learned Lord and the press have thus, I am sorry to say, done their best to second the failure of that mission. One would suppose, too, from what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord, that Sir William Coghlan shared with him the opinion that Mr. Rassam was not a proper person to select, but I will read to the House what it is that Sir William Coghlan really thinks of that gentleman. He says—

“Mr. Rassam’s antecedents, his status, and his qualifications are greatly misunderstood and misrepresented by a portion of the press of this country. He has been variously styled Levantine, Greek, obscure Armenian, Turkish subject, non-descript, &c. In answer to these assertions it is but just to a very deserving public servant to say what Mr. Rassam really is. He was born at Muscat, of Christian parents (his brother is British Vice Consul there), he received his education in England, he is a gentleman in manners and conduct, and his qualifications for the peculiar line in which he has been employed during the last ten years cannot be surpassed. I speak with confidence on this point, for Mr. Rassam was my assistant at Aden during many years of trouble; a part of that time he held charge of our political relations at Muscat, and acquitted himself to the entire approval of the Government which placed him there. In short, Mr. Rassam’s whole previous career well justified the expectation which Her Majesty’s Government entertained in appointing him to the delicate and difficult mission on which he is now employed. The disappointment of that expectation is not attributable to any fault of his.”

I think your Lordships will scarcely, after that statement of Sir William Coghlan, be of opinion that Mr. Rassam was not a proper person to send on this mission. Besides, he was at Aden, near the spot, and much delay was obviated by his appointment. He was therefore ordered to go in charge of a letter from the Queen, and requested to put himself in communication with the Emperor of Abyssinia, and to ask for a safe-conduct. It was deemed necessary that he should do this; because if, being the bearer of a letter from Her Majesty, he happened to be put in chains and thrown into prison, an additional insult would be offered to this country. He, moreover, managed to place himself in communication with Consul Cameron, and was warned by him not to enter the Emperor’s dominions unless he had a safe-conduct. This he succeeded in getting; but the document was of a somewhat suspicious character, inasmuch as it was not signed by the Emperor himself. He was, however, advised by Consul Cameron to accept it. Considerable delay took place in Mr. Rassam’s departure for the interior while he waited for answers to the letters which he had written to the Emperor. The public at home became very anxious on the subject, and my noble Friend (Earl Russell) did accept the offer of Mr. Palgrave, who was, however, informed that his mission was not to interfere with that of Mr. Rassam. It was afterwards represented that the Emperor might feel insulted if the two missions were to go out at the idea of having what he might suppose to be an inferior person, not the bearer of a letter from the Queen, sent into his dominions, and it was decided that Mr. Rassam should proceed on his mission. I can assure the noble and learned Lord that Her Majesty's Government are as anxious as to the result of that mission as he can possibly be, and since he gave notice of putting a Question on the subject on the first night of the Session, I have received letters relating to it which I shall be glad to read to the House, although, I am sorry to say, they do not contain proofs of the deliverance of the prisoners. The first is from Colonel Merewether, and is dated Aden, January 21. It is as follows:—

"The Victoria returned from Massowah this morning, bringing news from Rassam up to the 8th of November, and from Cameron to the 28th of September. I enclose copies of Cameron's letters to Rassam; also one from Mr. Stern to Rassam. These letters from the prisoners were received by M. Munzengen on the 16th of December. The delay on the road was caused by the messengers being afraid of the cholera, which they were told was raging at Massowah. M. Munzengen adds that he had received no news direct from the prisoners later than the 28th of September. It was said that King Theodore had come to Godjan, and M. Munzengen thought the news was authentic. When the King had come so much nearer to Metemneh, Mr. Rassam could not delay to enter into communication with him, and M. Munzengen felt sure that decisive news would very shortly be received. It was given out that the King was taking the prisoners with him, but that required confirmation. Rassam will have told you all about his own progress in his letter to you. M. Munzengen reports that Rassam left Kassala on the 9th of November, and was expected to reach Metemneh by the 20th. Long ere this I hope he has had an interview with the King and effected the release of the captives. Dr. Beke arrived here on the 10th, and, as the Victoria was proceeding to Massowah on the 11th, I gave him and an Abyssinian priest he had with him a passage in her. Some of his stores had not arrived here yet, and he cannot go up country without them, he told me; so I hope before they reach him we shall hear of Rassam's complete success, so as to render any further attempts of Dr. Beke's unnecessary."

The next is from Mr. Rassam himself. Mr. Rassam, writing from Kasala on the 8th of November, says—

"The head cameleer, who has been ordered to get camels for me by the Governor, hopes that we shall start this afternoon, or at the latest early to-morrow morning; if so, I hope to be at Metemneh on or about the 20th instant, five days later than I calculated upon when I left Massowah, as I did not expect to have had so much difficulty in obtaining camels. . . . You may get this letter about Christmas time, when I hope to be enjoying myself with His Majesty of Ethiopia. [This letter was received on the 7th of February.] I trust that I shall yet succeed in accomplishing what is required of me, and I have not the least doubt of that end through the good wishes of my friends."

The Earl of Clarendon

The next letter which I shall quote is from Mr. Cameron to Mr. Rassam, and is dated from Magdala Prison, Abyssinia, September 18, 1865. It says—

"We have had some trouble in getting comfortably through the winter, owing to the difficulty of getting provisions, but there has been no one ill except Rosenthal, who has been shut in for about ten days with neuralgia and sore eyes. I am stronger and better than I have ever been since leaving England. Please God, all may end well. Pray send the two accompanying letters to England, and God bless you, my brave Rassam, and grant that we may leave this horrid country together."

Although, therefore, I cannot communicate to your Lordships the gratifying news that these prisoners have been set at liberty, it is still some satisfaction to know that they are in better health than could have been anticipated. I think the policy which has been pursued by Her Majesty's Government in sending Mr. Rassam, who is as fitted for the task as any could be, is better than would be the tempting of Providence by sending out agents who would probably share the fate of the captives already in the Emperor's power.

LORD CHELMSFORD, in explanation, disclaimed having said anything in hostility to Mr. Rassam, but quoted the opinion of Sir William Coghlan, to the effect that Mr. Rassam's endeavours had failed; that there was nothing for it but to make another effort from England; that the long delays which had taken place had added to the difficulty incident to this matter, but that that difficulty must be encountered.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE—DEPUTATION FROM THE CONFERENCE AT ST. JAMES' HALL.—QUESTION.

LORD BATEMAN rose to put the Question to the noble Earl at the head of the Government of which he had given notice, but said that he desired to preface it by a few observations on the subject to which it referred. A very large and influential meeting, composed of eminent agriculturists from every part of the kingdom, with a deputation from forty-four or forty-five counties in England and Scotland, had been held on the previous day in St. James' Hall, in order to confer together on the subject of the cattle plague, and to determine what representations they should make in regard to it to the Government. Certain resolutions of the strongest nature were passed at that conference. Although all parties and shades of opinion, as well as all classes interested in the cattle trade, were represented at that meeting, and although there might have been some slight difference of view manifested on certain minor points of detail, yet he thought he was justified in saying that there could not possibly have been greater unanimity displayed than was exhibited at that conference. It was arranged that a deputation should wait upon the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary on that morning; and the object of his present Question was to ascertain from the noble Earl the nature of the reply given by Sir George Grey to the members of that deputation. He wished to impress on the noble Earl that that deputation was not the first by a great number which had already attended at the Home Office. The county with which he was connected—one of the largest cattle-breeding counties in the country (Herefordshire)—had made representations of the same kind to the Home Secretary without the slightest result. He therefore now desired, if possible, to extract from the Government some indication of what their policy with reference to that fearful scourge was likely to be. There had already been far too much delay, and the great interests involved could not continue to wait while the Government were hearing this person and that person, and making a party question of that subject. It was not a party but a national question. Those with whom he acted did not wish to make it a party question, but to press their views with respect to it upon the attention of the Government, and to elicit some answer to the representations daily being made to them from all parts of the kingdom. If he was not misinformed, the Royal Agricultural Society of England applied a few days ago to be received as a deputation, and the Government told them that they must put it off till Monday next. Now, they had had too much putting off; and that was the very thing they complained of. There was, certainly, the promise that a Bill should be introduced into the other House. It might not be in strict accordance with the usages of Parliament that some idea of the nature of a measure about to be brought into the other House should now be given to their Lordships; but on a vital question of such extreme urgency as that, he really thought the Government might, without impropriety, afford some intimation of their probable policy. The noble Lord concluded by asking the noble Earl the First Lord of the Treasury for the Answer of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the Deputation from the Cattle Plague Conference held at St. James' Hall?

EARL RUSSELL: 'In reply to the Question of the noble Lord, I have to say that my right hon. Friend (Sir George Grey) has not given any formal answer to the deputation this morning. He received them, but he did not state what was the intention of the Government. The better and certainly the more regular and convenient course to pursue when a measure is about to be proposed to Parliament is to allow the Minister who is charged with the introduction of that measure to explain its provisions, and state the views of the Government on the subject to which it refers. It is, no doubt, important that there should be no unnecessary delay; but it was only last Tuesday that Her Majesty delivered Her Speech from the Throne, and the interval between that day and Monday is, I think, not unreasonable. The noble Lord says, and I agree with him, that the measure of the Government ought to be discussed with an absence of party spirit, and I trust it will be discussed in such a way that the Legislature may come to a right decision. In France and Belgium measures have been adopted by the Governments of those countries which have been in a great degree successful. I hope that the proposals made by Her Majesty's Government will be equally wise, and in the meantime I trust that the delay from this day to Monday will not be productive of inconvenience to the interests concerned.

THE EARL OF DERBY: There is one very good reason, as it seems to me, why this question should not be considered a party question, and that is, because the feeling seems to be unanimous—even the general supporters of the Government concur—in deprecating the course which the Government have pursued. I cannot help adverting to what seems to be an inconsistency in the course taken by the noble Earl at the head of the Government. During the whole of the autumn and winter the various Orders in Council have been justified by saying that it was necessary to ascertain the views of the country, and that the Government had to feel their way in order to know how far they might go—so that if they found the feelings to be strong and general they might adopt more stringent measures. Now, if there is anybody able to speak with authority on this question and represent the opinion of the country, it is the Royal Agricultural Society of England. If, however, I understand aright, they requested the honour of an interview with the noble Earl at the head of the Government in order to lay before him the unanimous opinion of the Society. I should have thought that the noble Earl would have been glad to receive such a body ; but the noble Earl, I am informed, has told them that although he will be very glad to hear what they have to say, he cannot receive them until two o'clock on Monday—that is, two or three hours before the measure of the Government, which will then be cut and dried, is submitted to the House of Commons. If the noble Earl was really desirous to obtain the opinion of the Royal Agricultural Society, it appears to me he ought to obtain it before Monday, so that if desirable the Government might act upon their representations. Seeing them on the very day the Government measure is to be brought in does not, I confess, seem to me a very advantageous mode of profiting by the advice of the Royal Agricultural Society.

EARL RUSSELL: With regard to the first observation of the noble Earl, I am informed that a very distinguished member of the Royal Agricultural Society, the hon. Member for Aberdeenshire, has expressed an opinion that Her Majesty's Government have done all that they ought to have done. No doubt others are of opinion, on the contrary, that the Government ought to have taken more vigorous measures. I have this very day presented a petition from an association in that county—Aberdeen—which has shown so much vigour and energy in taking measures against the cattle plague, suggesting that the measures adopted in that county are worthy of consideration. If the Royal Agricultural Society had come to me a fortnight ago I might have appointed an earlier day to receive them, but when they applied to me I was unable to see them before Monday next.

EARL SPENCER said, he would endeavour not to weary their Lordships, but he hoped to be allowed to make a few observations upon the subject introduced by the noble Lord (Lord Bateman). He was of opinion that we had come to a great crisis in the matter of the cattle plague. In a very short time the grass would begin to grow, and it was necessary to act with great vigour during the short interval that remained, unless their Lordships made up their minds to see this terrible plague ravage the country during the whole of the summer. During the discussion in the other House of Parliament, frequent remarks had been made upon the Report of the Royal Commission. He thought it his duty to make a few observations upon those remarks, and he only regretted that their Lordships had not the advantage of hearing some member of the Commission better able to explain their views. It had been asserted that the Government were justified in not taking more stringent measures by the very great division of opinion that existed among the members of the Commission. It was true that as many as four reports were appended to the Report of the Commission ; but if these reports were examined it would be found that there were not such great and important differences as were alleged to exist. It was true that Mr. M'Clellan, an eminent engineer and a member of the Commission, differed from his colleagues in not attaching so much importance to the cattle plague as they did. With regard to the other eleven Commissioners, they agreed as to the identity of the disease with the rinderpest, which was so well known in Germany, Prussia, and Russia, and known not only to history, but by sad and constant experience every year. All the medical men and veterinary surgeons abroad had studied the disease, and the only thing they were agreed in recommending was the adoption of the most repressive and stringent measures. As to the cure of the disease, when it once broke out they gave it up. The Commissioners were, therefore, of opinion that strong and stringent measures must at once be adopted in this country to stop the disease. They did not wish to leave the adoption of these measures in the hands of the local authorities, believing that the Government were better able to carry them out and to instruct the country in regard to what was necessary to be done. On this point they were all agreed ; and they were also unanimous in thinking that the only measure likely to be really efficacious was in putting a total stoppage to the movement of all the stock in Great Britain. Then came the difference between the Commissioners to which he had adverted. The minority of the Commission—and he was one of that minority—shrank from advising the Government to adopt a measure so novel and so gigantic in its proportions as the majority thought the Commissioners ought to recommend. The minority were of opinion that they were called upon to recommend some practical measure which the Government could put into execution. The arguments that weighed with them were that to stop the trade in cattle was impossible, that there were many parts of the country in which the disease had not appeared, and that the country at that time was not aware of the importance of the subject. The minority considered that the course and custom of so important a trade could not be revolutionized by a stroke of the pen under such circumstances. They, therefore, recommended measures which he admitted were not so efficacious, but which they thought were more useful because they would be carried out. It was thus only as to the degree of stringency that the Commissioners differed. This was in the month of October. He must say he still entertained the opinion that the minority of the Commissioners were right in the view they took and the recommendations they made at that time. But matters had now changed. On the 4th of November the total number of cattle that had died of the plague was not more than 10,000, while the number of deaths was now 11,000 a week, and the deaths altogether amounted to 120,000. The country was now thoroughly alarmed. Another circumstance favourable to the re-consideration of the subject was, that a change was taking place in the meat trade. There had been of late an enormous increase in the dead meat of the country, and the result was that, if it were indispensable to stop the movement of stock in the country, the trade would be able to accommodate itself to the change, while in October they would have been unable to do so. Another point was deserving of consideration. In two months' time the grass would be growing, and the farmers would be obliged to purchase their stock and replenish their herds. After that had been done the adoption of restrictive measures would be almost impossible. Was it, therefore, too much to ask the large towns to put themselves to some slight inconvenience for only six weeks? He conceived that a vast difference existed between that proposition and what was contemplated in October last, when the large towns would have had to submit to stringent measures for six months without having any very clear idea as to what the result would be upon the supply and price of meat. Still, he was bound to confess that a measure restricting the locomotion of cattle could not now be recommended with the same confidence as a cure for the cattle plague as it could have been six months ago. He especially doubted very much whether the total stoppage of cattle traffic would put an end to the disease in Cheshire, because he believed the air of the district was so thoroughly impregnated with it as to be past cure, until the infection actually died out of itself; he felt, therefore, that this measure alone would not be sufficient. He would, therefore, ask the Government seriously to consider the proposals of so large and influential a meeting as that held yesterday. He thought it would be necessary to go as far as to cleanse all the places where any diseased animals had been. He agreed with Dr. Lyon Playfair who had stated that if the recommendations of the Commission were to be carried out with the intention of doing good, it would be absolutely necessary for Government to give the strictest instructions to disinfect every shed where diseased cattle had been. In referring to Dr. Lyon Playfair, he must allude to what had fallen from the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) on a previous occasion, with reference to a letter which Dr. Playfair had written to Lord Grenville on this subject; and which the noble Duke stated had influenced the Government in not acting on the Report of the Commissioners. He felt certain that Dr. Playfair had written that letter not to deter the Government from adopting the Report, but, on the contrary, to incite them to greater exertion. But time was wanted to do this, and the proposed suspension of all cattle traffic would give time for the cleansing not only of the market places and sheds, but also of the railway trucks, so that in the spring there would be no fear of animals catching the infection by being placed in infected places. He had had considerable difficulty in bringing himself to see the necessity of such stringent measures; but when he saw an influential meeting such as that of yesterday, representing all the counties in England, agreeing upon the question, he was willing to waive his own opinion, and consent with the rest to the course proposed. And even if the stoppage of cattle traffic and other measures for the period suggested failed to accomplish the one great object all had in view, still the advantages which would result from the arrangement would be very great. The disease would certainly be very much decreased for one thing, and much future distress prevented. He had sanguine hopes that if the Government would take the question in hand with vigour and determination, the disease would be eradicated as it had been from France and Belgium by the respective Governments of those countries. He would, in conclusion, press upon the attention of the Government the resolutions come to at the meeting yesterday, and say that although he did not desire to see them all embodied in the Government measure exactly as they stood, yet they were all worthy of the consideration of the Secretary of State, and he would be glad to see the spirit of them imported into his Bill.

LORD WALSINGHAM said, he was very anxious, as a member of the Royal Agricultural Society, to remind their Lordships that a deputation from the Society had waited upon a Member of the Government two months ago, and that the proposed deputation was not the first. He said this because he feared that some of their Lordships might be led to believe that the Society had been backward in pressing their views upon the Government. As he would have an opportunity of expressing his opinion upon the subject when the deputation waited on the noble Earl, he would not now say more than that he agreed with the noble Lord who had last addressed the House.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I regret very much to find that some remarks which I thought it necessary to make in reference to the recommendations of the Commission have been construed into an attack upon it. But the idea of attacking the Commission never entered into my head. On the contrary, I think Her Majesty's Government owe a deep debt of obligation to the Commissioners. At a time most inconvenient to themselves they devoted their energies to a most difficult task, and although they put the Government to some inconvenience in recommending a course which the Government, from other reasons, did not think it right to adopt, yet I do think the country has been most deeply benefited by their able Report, especially in respect to the immense mass of information which they have analyzed and condensed, and which they have presented to Parliament in so clear a form, and he thought he should have been wanting in respect to the Commissioners and the country if he had not stated why their recommendations had not been followed. A very able and intimate friend of his, one of the Members of the Commission (Mr. Lowe), thought that this explanation was an attack upon the Commissioners; but he was sure that his right hon. Friend would be glad to learn that he had been misinformed in the observations which he had made with reference to the Privy Council. My right hon. Friend has complained of the Privy Council for not having summoned Dr. Simonds, while the fact is Dr. Simonds was the first person we saw upon the subject, and he with good reason declined to act in behalf of the Government. And with reference to another charge, I have to say that the Order in Council issued on the authority of Lord Palmerston and the noble and learned Lord upon the Woolsack was simply an extension to Scotland of the first Orders issued. Then we were charged with not having found out speedily enough whether the disease was the actual rinderpest or not. That is not the case. Sufficient doubt existed among professional men as to the nature of the disease to render it inadvisable to mention the name "rinderpest." Accordingly, the word "rinderpest" did not occur in the first Order; but it was inserted in the second Order issued on the 11th August. Some complaint, too, has been made that the appointment of the Commission was delayed unnecessarily; but the fact is that there is a great difficulty in appointing a Commission in the dead season of the year, so many gentlemen are away from home. The addresses of some were not known; others were in Switzerland; and, of course, endless delays from such causes were experienced. I think that your Lordships will agree with me that my noble Friend the Prime Minister is right in asking your Lordships not to anticipate the measure which is to be introduced on Monday. The noble Earl opposite alluded to the unanimous opinion of the House.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I said there was a very general expression of opinion on the part of the House.

EARL GRANVILLE: Yes, and the speeches in the House bore out that impression; but I found, in the course of conversation, that even leading Members on the Opposition side of the House entertained the opinion that there would have been a very strong opposition to a uniform Order, and some noble Lords considered it absolutely impracticable. I cannot acknowledge that in our conduct we waited to be guided by a little rise or fall in public opinion. We found that we really had not the power of enforcing arbitrarily upon the whole country measures which could only be carried out by the acquiescence of local opinion, and this feeling dictated our conduct as far as possible. The great advantage which an Act of Parliament possesses over an Order in Council is that the proposals before being accepted are well discussed, and different opinions upon the matter find expression and are read in every part of the country. But I earnestly hope the Bill will not be treated as a party measure.

EARL FORTESCUE said, that from personal experience, he felt bound to express his conviction that any attempt to enforce stringent uniform orders throughout the country would not only have been generally unpopular, but perfectly unworkable. There was in this country no gensdarmérie to enforce measures even when sanctioned by Orders in Council framed under the provisions of an Act of Parliament, and such measures could not be carried out unless the people generally concurred in their advisability. He knew that in his own neighbourhood, Devonshire, he had heard gravely-entertained propositions of evading even the very limited and certainly not too stringent operation of the notices given by a majority of the magistrates in the petty divisions. There had also been the grossest carelessness in many districts, even on the part of the farmers themselves, owing to the general indisposition to inform and enforce the penalties against the neighbouring farmers who had evaded the prohibitions. The state of public opinion would certainly in October and November not have sanctioned the introduction of too stringent measures; and he even now doubted whether some latitude ought not to be allowed in any Act of Parliament about to be framed respecting the movement of cattle in districts quite remote from infection. Orders could not enforce themselves, and unless they were generally acceptable to the people, there was no machinery in this country which could secure the enforcement of any orders. The enforcement of penalties would not, he felt convinced, secure obedience to orders unless partial compensation were made to those whose cattle were to be slaughtered, as he believed they ought to be slaughtered. His experience of voluntary and mutual insurance associations had shown them to be failures, and he felt convinced that terror alone would be quite insufficient to induce men rendered desperate by losses to obey the law in such a manner as to save their neighbours' property from destruction.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, he quite agreed that no measures could have been effectually enforced if they had not met with the concurrence of the local authorities. In his opinion, instead of stamping out the disease they were only spreading the infection by sending the butcher to the ox, as the effluvia arising from the slaughter of an ox apparently sound, but really diseased, must be very dangerous in a home-stead. The case of Aberdeenshire had been held up as a very bright example of what should be done to stamp out the disease. Still, even in that county the cattle traffic, although under restrictions, had never been entirely stopped, sound cattle being permitted to travel on the sanction of the committee being obtained. That sanction, however, was only given on the express understanding that the cattle so removed were not to return, but were to be slaughtered at the market. He did not know whether their Lordships were aware of the very singular manner in which the cattle plague had again broken out in Aberdeenshire. From a statement in The Times newspaper of that morning it appeared that Mr. Hay, the inspector for the county, had discovered that the disease had been communicated by means of a pack-sheet used for wrapping up the carcasses of beasts slaughtered for the London markets. If the statement was correct, that was a strong case to prove the danger of slaughtering at home, and in favour of allowing cattle to be removed under certain restrictions. The disease had arrived at such a stage that they could only hope to free the country from it by slaughtering all diseased cattle, and isolating all suspected animals until they could get a clean bill of health. He was glad to learn that the Government were going to introduce a Bill on the subject on Monday night, and he trusted that they would press it forward as rapidly as possible.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, the question was whether the Government were to put a stop to all cattle traffic, or were to permit it to take place under certain restrictions. His noble Friend (Earl Spencer) himself, at the time that the Report of the Commission was made, was distinctly opposed to an entire stoppage of the traffic; and he was supported in that opinion by three distinguished Members of the Commission. His noble Friend was also decidedly against prohibiting the carriage of cattle on railways for the supply of large towns ; and although he might have changed his opinion since, the judgment he came to in the first instance was supported by a very important minority of the Members of the Commission. He saw from a report in The Times of that day that at a meeting which was held on Thursday, over which a noble Lord present (the Earl of Lichfield) presided, the representatives of the Agricultural Societies of Edinburgh and Glasgow protested against a resolution being carried prohibiting the bringing of live cattle into large cities, and that was a circumstance worthy of consideration when Government had to determine whether the large populations of the kingdom were to be deprived of their supply of live meat by railway. That was a matter which could not be determined by any resolutions passed at a public meeting, but was a question for Parliament.

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD said, that at the meeting referred to an amendment in favour of excepting large cities from the operation of the prohibition was rejected by a large majority. He was much pleased to hear that the views of his noble Friend who had acted on the Royal Commission (Earl Spencer) with regard to the necessity for the suspension of the cattle traffic had changed since the publication of the Report of the Commission, and he thought that the reasons given by the noble Lord for the change in his opinion were perfectly satisfactory. He thought that the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), in remarking upon the important difference of opinion between the majority and the minority of the members of the Commission, had somewhat exaggerated that difference of opinion. As far as he understood the two Reports, the opinion expressed in both was in favour of applying uniform regulations to the whole kingdom, whether those measures were to be of the stringent character recommended by the majority, or of the milder character recommended by the minority ; and he thought when he read the Reports that nothing could be stronger than the advice they contained, that whatever regulations were adopted should be applied uniformly throughout the country. It was clear that it was utterly impossible that any regulations could have been applied throughout the country generally without an Order from Government to that effect ; and, although he was not in the least inclined to blame the Government for not having acted with more decision up to a certain point, he did think that at a later period, when there had been a very strong and a very universal expression of opinion throughout the country with regard to the necessity for uniformity of action, it was unfortunate that more stringent regulations were not adopted by the Government. Had Government desired to have a general expression of the feeling of the country upon the subject, nothing would have been easier than to have sent circular letters to the chairmen of quarter sessions in October last, requesting information upon the matter. It was true that no suggestions had been offered by those bodies ; but it must be recollected that when they assembled in the early part of October the Royal Commission had just been appointed, and that it was looked up to with great confidence by the people, who believed that any Report issued by that Commission would be acted upon by the Government. It must also be recollected that at that time the public generally throughout the country were not sufficiently well-informed upon the subject either to have given any recommendations to the Government or to have acted for themselves in the matter ; and he must say that nothing had astonished him more than the difficulty there was at one time in persuading the farmers of the imminent danger of the disease. He was, therefore, disposed to think that up to a certain time it would have been difficult, if not impossible, for the Government to have acted otherwise than they had done. But when the Orders in Council were issued, leaving it open to the local authorities in the different counties to act as they thought best for their local interests, it was to be expected that they would, to a certain extent, be guided by the action taken by the Government in the particular case which came under its immediate control—namely, the movement of cattle from the ports into the interior of the country. Now certainly the action of the Government in that case was not in the direction of putting a stop to the traffic, for since the issuing of the Orders in Council the movement of cattle from the ports to the interior had been unrestricted, and, as far as the public were aware, no precautions whatever had been adopted to prevent the evils likely to arise from such traffic. It was his earnest hope that the strongly-expressed opinion of so many practical agriculturists who were present at the meeting referred to, coming as they did from all parts of the kingdom, and representing so many agricultural societies and the most important agricultural interests, would have great weight with the Government when framing the Bill to be laid on the table on Monday next.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE.

POSTPONEMENT OF QUESTION.

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE said, he should postpone till Monday his Question as to the intention of the Government in respect to giving compensation for stock, hides, horns, &c., destroyed or buried by direction of Cattle Plague Inspectors, acting under Orders in Council.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he thanked his hon. Friend. It would be more convenient to postpone the Question till he made a general statement as to the intentions of the Government.

LAW OF HYPOTHEC.—QUESTION.

MR. CARNEGIE said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether it is his intention to bring in any measure in regard to the Law of Hypothec in Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it was the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill in conformity with the recommendation of the Commissioners.

THE REFORM BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in conjunction with the information recommended to be procured in Her Majesty's Speech in reference to the rights of Voting in the Elections of Members to serve in Parliament, it will not be deemed necessary by Her Majesty's Government to inquire into the causes which at present prevent so large a portion of the Electors from Voting, and encourage so large a portion to traffic with the Franchise; and whether such an inquiry be not necessary previous to the creation of a Reform Bill?

SIR GEORGE GREY: I can only say that Her Majesty's Government have called for such information as they think necessary in order to lay before the House a Bill on the subject.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether he will state to the House the exact nature of the Returns upon the subject of the rights of voting, which are in course of collection by the Government? I hope I may ask Her Majesty's Government to give an answer in detail, as my object is to enable hon. Members to move for supplemental Returns in case those produced by the Government should not be deemed sufficient.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Those Returns will, I hope, be soon completed; and it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to lay them before the House when they shall be completed. It is better, therefore, to wait for the Returns themselves, as it would be very difficult to give in detail correct information on the subject referred to by the noble Lord. Before communicating the Returns to the House we wish ourselves to be assured of their accuracy.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: Will the right hon. Gentleman lay the circulars on the table?

SIR GEORGE GREY: It will be better to lay the Returns, and all the papers connected with them, on the table at the same time.

LORD ELCHO: I wish to ask the right hon. Baronet whether the Returns referred to by the noble Lord the Member for Stamford will be laid on the table before the Reform Bill is introduced by the Government?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Those Returns will be laid on the table as soon as they are in a condition to be laid before the House. I am not in a position to say when the Reform Bill will be introduced; and, therefore, it is impossible for me to say what the interval may be between the production of the Returns and the introduction of the Bill.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is not by accident and inadvertence that, in giving notice lately of intended Motions, by Government precedence, he fixed one of them for a Members' ballot night, Tuesday, the 13th; and, whether he has any intention of claiming any right on the part of the Government to give such notice for Tuesdays, without taking their chance of the ballot in common with other Members?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he could assure the hon. Member that he had no intention of claiming any precedence for the Government on Tuesday nights. He gave his notice without reference to the fact of that particular day being the ballot day, and it was not until he knew of the hon. Member's notice that he had observed the coincidence. He had communicated privately with the right hon. Member for Droitwich to state that he should be quite willing that the right hon. Baronet's and hon. Members' notices should take precedence of his. [SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Hear, hear!]

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that the right hon. Baronet's explanation was perfectly satisfactory.

LOSS OF THE "LONDON."—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade a Question of which I have not given him notice—namely, Whether it is true that counsel, who appeared on behalf of the relatives of persons lost in the London, at the inquiry into the melancholy circumstances of the loss of that ship, retired from the investigation on the ground that he was forbidden to cross-examine witnesses; and I beg further to ask, whether, if it be true, the right hon. Gentleman is of opinion that such an inquiry can be attended with beneficial results as regards the future safety of Her Majesty's subjects travelling by sea?

MR. MILNER GIBSON: I have not received any information on the subject to which the right hon. Baronet refers. I shall, however, make inquiries, and give the right hon. Baronet a full reply on a future day.

Sir George Grey

COLLECTION OF TAXES.—QUESTION.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved that the House at its rising do adjourn till Monday. He said that, Committee of Supply not being yet appointed, it was necessary he should do so in order to give hon. Members an opportunity of bringing certain subjects under the notice of the House.

Moved, That the House at rising do adjourn till Monday next.

MR. CHARLES FORSTER said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is his intention, in the present Session, to re-introduce the measure which he proposed in the Session of 1864, relating to the collection of taxes? There was considerable grievance, both to taxpayers and collectors, under the present system, and gentlemen were often nominated to the office of tax collectors when such a nomination was not in accordance with their social position. In 1864, a measure had been brought forward with the view of providing a remedy, and though the measure was not successful, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had expressed his readiness to apply a remedy on an early occasion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: My hon. Friend who has put the Question to me is already aware that I take the same view of the merits of the case as he does himself. In my opinion the present system of assessing and collecting the Queen's taxes is a most defective one. To the local jurisdiction relating to the adjudication of the taxes my observation does not apply. This, I think, is not only not inconvenient, but most advantageous and essential as an auxiliary to our system of taxation; but as to the assessment and collection, I have always held it would be most desirable that those functions should be taken directly into the hands of the Queen's Government. The present method is hard upon the taxpayers, and in a large majority of cases upon the persons who discharge the functions of the collection, it being in general a laborious office, of a vexatious character, with small remuneration; the discharge of its duties, which is compulsory by law, amounting in many cases to a serious grievance to those on whom it is imposed. My hon. Friend has likewise alluded to the present state of the law in regard to the liability of parishes to re-assessment where the taxes are collected under the responsibility of officers not appointed by Her Majesty's Government. It is impossible to relieve them from that liability so long as the officers are appointed by the local authorities. At the same time, that is a strong additional reason for the alteration of the law. But I was careful, on the part of the Government, to state to the House that the alteration of a law of this kind, in order to be satisfactory, must be effected with very general concurrence. I hoped that the Bill which was introduced in 1864 would have met with very general concurrence, inasmuch as it passed through the early stages without the appearance of any serious opposition. A difficulty, however, arose with regard to metropolitan collections. There was at that time a great reluctance on the part of the metropolitan districts to be included in the provisions of the Bill, and we who were responsible for it found out that there were many reasons which rendered the Bill greatly desirable, if not urgently necessary throughout the country which did not apply to the metropolis. In Committee, therefore, we propose to exempt the metropolis from the operation of the Bill. If we had not done that we should have had great opposition in the metropolis, but then the omission we had made raised up other opponents, who said they would oppose the Bill if the metropolis were not included. The force of their arguments I failed to perceive, though I was very sensible of the force of their votes. Others at a later stage objected on broader grounds, saying that it was a measure of centralization, that it would unduly augment the power of the Government, and that they were opposed to it on that account. The result was that the Bill was rejected by a majority of four votes, though it would hardly have been more satisfactory had it passed by a majority equally narrow. Now, what I really wish is that Gentlemen would, if they can find time, examine this subject; because, though not in the least degree likely to become one of political or party importance, it is one which greatly affects a number of local communities as well as individuals. I think there will be a general desire to change the present system. With regard to the intentions of the Government, all I can say is that indications of such a state of feeling would lead the Government to introduce a measure founded on the same principle as the last, and that it would be a matter of satisfaction to them if, at an early period, such an indication should be made.

FENIANISM IN THE ARMY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH said, he rose to ask the Judge Advocate General, Why Drum-Major Farrell, 1st Battalion 2nd Queen's Regiment, and Sergeant Butler, 99th Regiment, have not been brought to trial, either before a military or civil tribunal, for the alleged offence of drilling parties of Fenians? It might, he said, be in the collection of many hon. Members that at the very outbreak of the Fenian movement these non-commissioned officers were arrested and charged with having drilled Fenian recruits. To show the magnitude of such an offence on the part of a soldier, he would read to the House a portion of the oath of allegiance which these men took upon entering the army—

"I—do make oath that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty, her heirs, and successors, and that I will, as in duty bound, honestly and faithfully defend Her Majesty, her heirs, and successors, in person, crown, and dignity, against all enemies, and will observe and obey all orders of Her Majesty, her heirs, and successors, and of the generals and officers set over me. So help me God."

Now, what greater enemy could Her Majesty have than a rebel in her own army? He would also read to the House an extract from the 15th clause of the Mutiny Act—

"If any person subject to this Act shall, at any time during the continuance of this Act, hold correspondence with or give advice or intelligence to any rebel or enemy of Her Majesty, either by letters, messages, signs, or tokens in any manner or way whatsoever, or shall treat or enter into any terms with such rebels or enemy without Her Majesty's licence or licence of the general or chief commander, shall suffer death or such other punishment as by a court-martial shall be awarded."

If the outrageous rebels to whom he had referred did not come within this or some other clause of the Mutiny Act, he hoped his right hon. Friend would insert some clause in it which would embrace crimes of such a description. On being shown the documents which contained conclusive evidence of their guilt, they acknowledged the offence with which they were charged. It was expected every day that an example would be made of these two men, yet day after day passed without any sign of a court-martial being ordered. Knowing the determined character of the gallant officer at the head of the army in Ireland he could not understand why such a step had not been taken. This being perhaps the most heinous offence a soldier could commit it was then supposed that the case was left in the hands of the Commander-in-Chief of the army and not in that of the Commander of the Forces in Ireland, and every one was perfectly assured that the honour of the army would be safe in the hands of his Royal Highness. Week after week, however, passed until it was supposed that the delinquents were to be tried by a civil instead of a military tribunal. At last the special Commission was issued for the trial of the Fenians, and many wretched men had been tried and were undergoing punishment for having attended the drills while those who drilled them remained to the present moment untried and unpunished. The army was at a loss to understand why these men had been kept under arrest for nearly five months, during which time no proceedings had been taken against them, and he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that no class in the army felt more on this subject than that honourable class, to which these men belonged, the non-commissioned officers. He hoped his right hon. Friend would give the House some information in reference to this matter.

Mr. HEADLAM said, that the men alluded to would be put upon their trial by court-martial in the course of a very few days. One man, indeed, was put upon his trial yesterday, and another was to be tried to-day. It might be true that a longer delay had taken place than would have been right under ordinary circumstances; but, at the same time, the circumstances surrounding the Fenian conspiracy were quite exceptional. The delay had arisen in consequence of the authorities in Ireland having considered it desirable that the trials should be postponed. Some time ago he had written a letter to Ireland to state that he thought it desirable that the trials should take place as soon as possible, and the following was the reply he received:—

"I have the honour to state that the delay arises from the circumstance that the witnesses whose evidence is material to prove the existence of the Fenian conspiracy, including a man named Warner, and a number of other witnesses, are at present in attendance before the civilian commission sitting in Dublin, and therefore cannot take part in the proceedings before the court-martial."

He hoped that his hon. and gallant Friend would be satisfied with this statement, and that he would say nothing which would fetter the action of the authorities.

COLONEL NORTH: What is the date of the letter?

Mr. HEADLAM: The 31st of January.
Colonel North

COLONEL NORTH said, he was not satisfied, and he was sure the army would not be, at this delay.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

Mr. NEWDEGATE asked, When the second Report of the Cattle Plague Commission would be in the hands of Members? It was very desirable that hon. Gentlemen should have an opportunity of reading it before the discussion on the subject which was appointed to take place on Monday next.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that a copy of that Report had been laid before Her Majesty, having been received by him only the day before yesterday. He had received a letter from the secretary to the Commission, stating that the Appendix, containing the opinions referred to in the Report, was not yet ready, but that it would be in a very few days. He had requested the secretary to send the Appendix without delay; but if that were not done, perhaps it might be convenient to place the Report itself in the hands of Members without waiting for the Appendix.

Mr. WALPOLE: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the first Report of the Commission is not yet in the hands of Members?

SIR GEORGE GREY: I presented the first Report on the first day of the Session, but I am not responsible for its circulation.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman who is responsible for its circulation?

SIR GEORGE GREY: That question should be addressed to the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair. Of course, I do not mean that the right hon. Gentleman is personally responsible for its circulation, but some officer of the House under the right hon. Gentleman's direction must be so.

Motion agreed to:—House at rising to adjourn till Monday next.

REPORT OF ADDRESS.

Report of Address brought up and read.

On Motion, to agree to the Address—

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I readily assented to the suggestion made to me last night by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because I felt the force of the appeal which he made to me with regard to the possible postponement of that interesting question of the cattle plague on Monday night. Most sorry, indeed, should I be if any course taken by me should have the effect of postponing for one single hour the action of the House with regard to that most terrible affair. On the contrary, Sir, I do entertain a most earnest hope that the Government are at last about to grapple with this calamity; the present magnitude of which I am sorry to say I, for one, am disposed to attribute to their neglect and to their selfish fear of assuming that responsibility which, in my opinion, it was the bounden duty of Her Majesty's Government, as the Government of this country, to incur. I look forward, therefore, to the measure of Monday night in the earnest hope that the Bill will include those provisions on which I may say now there is really very little difference of opinion existing. If that Bill should not appear to satisfy the just and reasonable expectations of the country upon this most important subject, I hope that, independently of party considerations, general support will be given to the Bill that has been announced by my hon. Friend the Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt). As the debate upon the Address concluded last night, I hope that I shall not be considered as unduly occupying the attention of the House if, for a few minutes, I advert to one or two subjects of great importance in the gracious Speech of Her Majesty that have not been touched upon at all. Let me say that I make no complaint of the debate that has occupied the House for two nights upon the Address. The course of that debate has been unusual, but I think I may say it has been highly beneficial. Two subjects of extreme importance have been debated upon these two nights, one of those nights being given to each subject, and I think that I may add that those subjects have been discussed with a degree of ability and of practical talent that has been highly creditable to the first debate of this newly assembled House of Commons. But there are one or two subjects in Her Majesty's Speech, the importance of which is so great that I think it would be hardly right, and, indeed, hardly respectful, if we should pass them over without some further comment before these debates are brought to a close. One of those subjects are the unhappy occurrences which we all unite in deploring—the unfortunate occurrences in Jamaica. The occurrences in Jamaica have been in the debate entirely unnoticed except in the two speeches to which I am sure we all listened with the greatest pleasure, those of the Mover and Seconder of the Address, and which were so full of talent and of promise. Both of those speakers adverted to the Jamaica question, as it was, of course, indispensable to the position they occupied that they should; but I think that I should not do justice to the noble Lord and to the hon. Gentleman if I were not to admit in the broadest manner that the tone and temper in which they referred to the unfortunate occurrences in Jamaica showed a degree of forbearance, and moderation, and justice that left nothing to be wished for. ["Hear, hear!"] I hear that observation cheered on the other side of the House, and I, for one, say that I heard the observations of the Mover and Seconder of the Address with sincere gratification and pleasure; and in no part of their speeches did I more entirely concur than in the portions in which they stated their opinion that it would be now premature and improper for any Member to rise in the course of the debate and enter into anything like a discussion of the Jamaica question, or the conduct of the officers concerned in it. I subscribe entirely to that opinion, and it is with that feeling that I am bound to say that I think that it would now be premature and improper to enter into any discussion of the merits of the Jamaica question or of the conduct of the officers or others connected with it. This being so, I do think that this is eminently the moment when it behoves independent Members of the House to give expression to the regret—I had almost said indignation—with which we have observed that this reserve has not been practised out of doors during the recess. That by a portion of the public press, at various public meetings, and I am sorry to say by some Members—some eminent Members of this House—the conduct of the officers in Jamaica has been discussed, prejudged, and condemned. This has been done by men who had not the means of judging in their possession, who had not before them the evidence upon which alone a sound and candid judgment could be formed, and in reference to whom, therefore, it was impossible for the Government and the public not to have felt deep regret when they heard the opinions which have been expressed. I see the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) opposite, and I say frankly, that I think that none of the expressions of those who commented upon these transactions during the recess are open to so much censure—which I, for one, read with so much regret

—there are none as those used by the hon. Member for Birmingham. I hold in my hand an extract from a speech of the hon. Member, made last month in the town of Rochdale, and in it I find this sentence. Speaking of the trial and execution of Mr. Gordon, the hon. Gentleman used this language—

“ I say from the beginning to the end it is a mass of illegality, and I believe there is not a Judge who sits upon the bench in the United Kingdom, who, speaking in his private capacity, would doubt for one single moment that Mr. Gordon was murdered.”

This might, perhaps, have been said in the warmth of public discussion. [Mr. BRIGHT: Not at all.] But I am sorry to say that I hold in my hand distinct proof that it was not, for on another occasion he used language to the same effect. At a meeting at Bradford, the hon. Member said—

“ I take my opinion only from documents furnished here by those whose interest it is to put the most favourable interpretation on their conduct, and I say that murder is foul, and that there is no murder more foul than that done by men in authority under the pretence of law; I say if murder has not yet changed its name, and be yet a crime visited with punishment in this country, then I hope that the Governor of Jamaica and his accomplices will have to stand at the bar of justice for the murder of Mr. Gordon.”

[Mr. BRIGHT: Hear, hear!] The hon. Gentleman cheers, but I am glad to find that he is not supported in that cheer. I feel with deep regret that a Member of this House, a man of the just eminence of the hon. Member for Birmingham, should have allowed himself, by party or other considerations, to be led into the use of language that is, in my opinion, absolutely unjustifiable. The use of such language by any man, before the evidence arrived in this country, and before anybody could know the facts of which he was judging, the general, the universal opinion, I say, of dispassionate men must be that the use of such language was not only indecorous, but grossly unjust. Who and what is the man whom the hon. Member brands with murder? The hon. Gentleman says murder is foul. So also are false accusations. Who is the man thus branded with the horrible crime of murder? I have not the honour of a personal acquaintance with Governor Eyre. I think he was not in the public service when I, for a short time, held the seals of the Colonial Office. At all events, I have no personal acquaintance with him. I speak of him wholly without any personal bias. But he is known by reputation. He is known to many friends and acquaintances of mine, and I never heard any report of him but one—namely, that he is a highly honourable public servant, and that if there be one quality for which he has been distinguished more than another, it is for the humanity and kindness and good feeling with which he has treated and considered the welfare of the native races in various colonies. I say that such a man is not one who ought to be branded with the crime of murder, unless upon the very clearest evidence and most ample demonstration. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Graham), in seconding the Address, said that justice must be done; and I entirely concur with him, and so will every dispassionate man upon both sides of the House. But, on the other hand, let us all remember—and I can hardly believe that there is a man sitting listening to me in this House who will fail to remember—that if Governor Eyre did err, if he was led into any conduct of which we sitting calmly and safely in England may feel ourselves compelled to disapprove, he acted in a most grave and trying emergency and from a zealous desire to do his duty to his Queen, his country, and the colony committed to his charge. He was led into an error, if error it be, upon reasons which whether they are well founded we do not yet know; and let us be cautious how we form a premature opinion. He acted in the full persuasion and belief that the lives of the handful of Europeans who inhabited that island were not safe from attack by the 400,000 of half-civilized and infuriated negroes. I say, under these circumstances, it is cruel and unjustifiable for any man of eminence in the country, before large bodies of his countrymen, to endeavour to excite them and lead them away from a calm decision upon this question by charging Governor Eyre with a crime such as that which the hon. Member for Birmingham has laid to his charge. I hope that the House will agree with me that these discussions should not close without some voice being raised to protest against this premature decision, and to assure Governor Eyre, that there is at least a portion of the Members of the House, and I hope that I may say that that portion includes in it Her Majesty's Ministers, who will not shrink from censuring any part of his conduct if it should be necessary, but who will do him justice, and who do not sympathize in premature and harsh allegations that ought never to have been made. With regard, Sir, to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in having issued a Commission of Inquiry into the massacres in Jamaica, I feel bound to say that I am not disposed to censure or find fault with them in that respect. I do think that they were somewhat premature in issuing that Commission, and that they would have done better, would have acted with more fairness and prudence, had they waited for further explanations from Governor Eyre, and for the real facts that occurred during these unhappy transactions. I own I am not free from the fear that Her Majesty's Ministers may have been unduly influenced by that scandalous scene that is said to have occurred in the Colonial Office between the Secretary for the Colonies and a deputation from the Anti-Slavery Society. But be this as it may, I think that sooner or later the Government must have been bound to issue a Commission to inquire into these unhappy matters. I am very glad, further, to bear my testimony to the fact that I think that the Government having decided to issue a Commission I doubt whether it was possible to exercise a better discretion in the selection of the persons who are to carry on that inquiry—I say I feel perfect confidence in the gentlemen selected, and I, for one, shall yield the utmost possible attention to their decision. I do not wish to detain the House, but having adverted to one paragraph of the Speech from the Throne that I think it was really right should be noticed by discussion, I will take leave to trespass upon the House for a few moments with reference to another subject of importance, Parliamentary Reform. I think I may add that, under all the circumstances in which that question stands, we have a right to expect from Her Majesty's Ministers some declaration upon the subject. I am not sure whether I may not say that the right is strengthened by what passed this evening. We should hear something, at least, in reference to this most important subject. During the recess—especially since the death of Lord Palmerston—this question of Parliamentary Reform has occupied rather an unusual degree of public attention. It has been made the subject of discussion at several public meetings, and of speeches from several hon. Members of this House of more or less political eminence. Some of the most remarkable of the speeches delivered on this subject of Parliamentary Reform were those which proceeded from the mouths of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), and the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster). The hon. Member for Birmingham, in addressing various meetings on this subject of Reform, intimated very plainly, with great openness—and I think with great justice too—what he thought the minimum degree of the alteration of the franchise which could possibly be proposed by Her Majesty's Government. The hon. Member for Bradford also delivered a speech to his constituents on the same subject. He held very strong and decided language. The hon. Member for Bradford said—I am quoting from memory, but I believe correctly—that he thought it absolutely indispensable for Her Majesty's Government at the earliest possible moment after the meeting of Parliament to come forward with a comprehensive and satisfactory measure of Reform. The hon. Gentleman then proceeded to advise his friends and constituents on the course they ought to take under such circumstances. He told those who were in favour of the Reform Bill not to prepare a Bill themselves but to go to the Government, and tell them that they had pledged themselves as men never were pledged before—as men of honour—to legislation on this subject; and, being so, they (the constituents) would not insult them by supposing that they would bring forward anything but a comprehensive and satisfactory measure. Well, Sir, in the very same paper in which this speech was reported, I saw also announced the hon. Member's appointment to the office of Under Secretary to the Colonial Department. In what light, then, are we to regard the hon. Gentleman now? Are we to regard him as the ultra-reforming Member of Parliament, or as the meek and submissive Member of Her Majesty's Government with his teeth drawn? I beg to say with all sincerity that I do not intend to imply any disrespect to the hon. Member for Bradford. During his occupancy of his seat in this House, the hon. Member for Bradford, I am bound to say, has shown much ability and great familiarity with the many subjects on which he has spoken. The hon. Gentleman has also taken a manly and decided course of action, and I do not believe that the hon. Member has entered into any intentional compromise upon those questions in respect to which he has expressed strong and decided opinions. Well, I am not quite sure whether the hon. Member for Birmingham has not also joined Her Majesty's Government. If he has done so, his accession to office will complete the number of the happy family who now enjoy the sweets of office. If they are to be guided by the opinions of the hon. Members for Birmingham and Bradford, I am not quite sure but that it would be better that the hon. Member for Birmingham should be also a Member of the Government, in order that that hon. Member should bear his share of the responsibility of the measure of Reform to be introduced by Her Majesty's Government. This might have the possible effect of clipping the wings of the hon. Member for Birmingham. In addition to these facts, we have had a declaration from the Government that it is their intention to bring in a Reform Bill; and I think on one occasion the noble Earl at the head of the Government intimated a determination to stand or fall by that Bill. Under these circumstances, the Members of this House, and the public generally, naturally looked with the utmost anxiety and curiosity to Her Majesty's gracious Speech for an indication of the measure in question; and astonishment must have been very generally felt upon finding the terms in which the subject of Reform has been alluded to. The language of the Royal Speech is—

"I have directed that information should be procured in reference to the rights of voting in the election of Members to serve in Parliament for counties, cities, and boroughs. When that information is complete, the attention of Parliament will be called to the result thus obtained, with a view to such improvements in the laws which regulate the rights of voting in the election of Members of the House of Commons, as may tend to strengthen our free institutions and conduce to the public welfare."

Now, I think we have a right to suppose that the information of Her Majesty's Government upon this subject was complete before the meeting of Parliament. But there is nothing whatever in the language of Her Majesty's Speech that can give us the slightest intimation of the time when the measure will be introduced, or enable us to judge whether the information required is to be given immediately, or to be postponed until next year. And there can be no doubt whatever that the intimation given us this evening by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department on this subject has contributed in no degree to remove the uncertainty that prevails as to the period when this measure of Reform will be introduced by Her Majesty's Government. Under these circumstances, I feel I am fully justified in making this inquiry as to what are the intentions of Her Majesty's Government. I do not think that this is a proper moment for a general discussion of Reform, or to enter into the question what that measure of Reform ought to be. I think, however, that this is a proper opportunity for expressing a strong opinion that this Reform question should not be dangled before the public for party purposes from year to year; but that we should know where we really stand, and what the intentions of Her Majesty's Government really are upon this subject. The information which we have this evening received does not appear to me to harmonize with the statements made by Members of Her Majesty's Government in other places; and, therefore, it becomes necessary that we should be informed by the Government what are really their intentions upon this most important question.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that I do not feel in the slightest degree sore at the censure which he has just passed upon me with regard to observations which I have made upon the events which have taken place in Jamaica. I am a good deal used to the criticism of the right hon. Gentleman. In fact, I believe there is nothing which I have said anywhere—hardly anything which I have said in this House or in the country for the last twenty years—which the right hon. Gentleman has not found it necessary to condemn. I can assure him that he is very much mistaken if he supposes that I was actuated by any party feeling in anything which I said upon this distressing subject. If I had any party feeling, as the right hon. Gentleman interprets that phrase, I presume I should have been rather disposed to have said nothing that would be unpleasant to the Government and to the Administration, with whose general policy I hope to agree. The right hon. Gentleman might just as well be charged with having made a party attack upon me, standing, as he does, on the other side of the table, and cheered, as he has been, by the party of which he is one of the recognized leaders. But he charges me with having prejudged this question. Does he recollect that nearly every paper which advocates his politics in this country has been writing strongly in favour of Governor Eyre, and applauding the sanguinary transactions which have taken place in Jamaica? Does he know, further, that several speakers, well-known Members of his own party, have spoken at different meetings in the same sense? I did not prejudge Governor Eyre. I took Governor Eyre's own statement—and I said then what I repeat now—that there is not a Judge on the bench in the three kingdoms who will undertake to say, either in private or in public, that Mr. Gordon was not clearly murdered. The right hon. Gentleman, perhaps, desired further evidence. I was content to take Governor Eyre's own statement. If it had been the statement of some paper in Jamaica, or some paper in New York—as news from the West Indies often comes to this country by New York—I should not for one moment have thought of condemning Governor Eyre, or even of discussing his proceedings. But it was when I saw his own despatch of four-score paragraphs, written with the greatest deliberation and the greatest precision, in which he stated his own share in the transaction, that I condemned him; and I put it to the House (the country knows perfectly well) whether any evidence which has since been received has in the slightest degree lessened the gravity of the charge against Governor Eyre. I recollect in this House some years ago, when the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) sat here as Minister for India, that an hon. Friend of mine, the Member for Northampton (Mr. Gilpin), brought forward a case where an officer in the English army shot 500 Sepoys in cold blood. The noble Lord got up, not to defend it, for he knew that was impossible. He never in his life had—and he never will have in the course of his life—a more difficult and unpleasant undertaking than he had that evening, to appear to offer some sort of excuse for an atrocity unparalleled, I hope, in the history of Englishmen. There are persons in this country, many of them, who would have been glad that this matter could have been hushed up. They have not learned, after thirty years of Parliamentary legal freedom existing in Jamaica, to regard those unhappy negroes as subjects of the Queen of African descent. They were brought to that country not by their own consent. They or their forefathers had suffered every species of oppression and wrong; their cries finally ascended to Heaven, and the people of this country, outraged in their consciences by the continuance of that wrong, forced Parliament to give freedom to that black population. From the hour of their freedom until this hour it has been merely the freedom granted by Parliament. It has not been sanctioned and guaranteed by the Assembly and Government of that island, and there are now many persons in this country, I am satisfied—I grieve to say it, I think it is a hideous thing amongst us—who do not feel the same sense of wrong and injustice when anything like this happens if it be inflicted only upon those unfortunate “niggers,” as they would if white men had suffered in a similar manner. Now, I regard every life among those men—and it is right I should so regard them, every man of them, before the law and before the sovereign authority of the Queen—as important as any life in this country or in this House—and it is idle to tell me that when I stand on a platform before thousands of my countrymen, when this great question is in the balance, I am to consider, because they are black, the lives of 2,000 subjects of the Queen as nothing in comparison with the feelings of Governor Eyre and his accomplices. I tell the right hon. Gentleman that it would want a very much stronger censure than his; and I tell those who sit behind him that it will want something more appalling than their cheers to keep me silent after the atrocities recently perpetrated in Jamaica. I believe, Sir, that at this moment there is not a civilized and Christian country in the world in which all thoughtful men are not directing their eyes to this country, to observe what will be the course of the Government on this question. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the Government was right in appointing the Commission, but not that they appointed it too soon. They delayed its appointment too long. I complained, in one of these speeches to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, that my right hon. Friend the Colonial Secretary allowed three weeks to pass from the time when he read that despatch to the time when it was announced to the public that that Commission was to be issued. I have understood that there were reasons for that delay with which I was not then acquainted. I did not conceive for a moment that the Secretary of State for the Colonies was a man hard and cruel, and unmindful of the interests of those whose interests he has been appointed by the Queen specially to guard; and now when the Commission has been appointed, and when the circumstances have been before the public, I have no complaint to make of him or of the Government. I am content now, and leave the matter for the thorough examination of the Commission. I have no doubt that a thorough inquiry will be made and full justice done. There are others gone to that island from this country, Commissioners appointed by the public. Why, Sir, if such transactions as these could take place in the island of Jamaica, and there was no man to point a finger at them in this country, what might happen in all our other colonies and all the other dependencies of this wide Empire? And if law be not law to the negro in Jamaica, how long will law be law to the working people or to any of their friends in this country? I say, Sir, that the right hon. Gentleman has allowed, it may be, an official sympathy for Governor Eyre to weigh with him in this matter, and he has thought it necessary to give me notice that he would come down to the House and pronounce a solemn censure upon my conduct. I tell him that in all the public speeches I have ever made—and they are not a few, as the House knows—there are no passages in those speeches to which I will to my last hour more firmly adhere than to those which the right hon. Gentleman has commented upon. There is nothing in them that I have to condemn myself for—there is nothing in them that I retract—and if the same circumstances happened again, I would repeat those passages, and, if God gave me power, with a more burning indignation would I condemn atrocities which have cast a foul blot upon the character of English Governors.

MR. MARSH said, that he was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington) bear testimony to the high character of Governor Eyre for moderation, justice, and humanity. He was glad that the right hon. Baronet had brought forward the subject, as he himself knew that Governor Eyre was remarkable for his kindness and humanity to the Natives of Australia. As to the question of Reform, he believed that no Bill would be passed that Session, and that it would be useless to bring one forward. For his own part, he was quite satisfied with the Bill of 1832, and with its marvellous results. Since the passing of that Bill a vast number of measures had been adopted by the House, calculated to improve the condition of the working man. At present, the taxation of the country was so arranged as to lean as lightly as possible on the working classes. While an income tax has been imposed on the upper and middle classes, the labouring man paid no taxes, with a few trifling exceptions, for what he ate, for the clothes which he wore, or for his house; and he was sure that the House was not about to stand still in the course on which it had entered. He believed that it would continue to do all in its power to forward the interests of the working classes. He was sure that every demand which those classes might make would be dealt with in a fair and liberal and generous spirit. He did hope that if a Reform Bill came before the House there would be no coquetting with such an important subject, but that hon. Gentlemen would fairly and fully speak their minds. For his own part, he would oppose any measure by which the present franchise would be lowered; he had seen the effects of democracy in Australia, and he hoped and trusted that England would not adopt a system which at the other side of the world had had such deplorable results. He could see no good result that could be effected by the introduction of such a measure, and if brought forward he could only again repeat that it should receive his most humble but determined opposition.

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE said, he congratulated the Government on the very modest position which the question of Reform occupied in Her Majesty's Speech. In common with the great mass of his countrymen, he had had some apprehensions with reference to the Reform question, and the manner in which Her Majesty's Government were likely to deal with it; but those apprehensions were in a great degree removed when he saw the distant and modest manner in which the matter was alluded to in the Speech from the Throne. He knew that men of experience and tried patriotism may have taken the place of the veteran statesman they had been accustomed to; but, at the same time, they feared that a shadow behind the Treasury Benches might prove fatal to them. Those apprehensions were not entirely groundless; for there were certain indications which led men to fear that the Members of Her Majesty's Government might drift into the arms of the hon. Member for Birmingham, and that the offspring of this union might be the ruin of the Constitution. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bright) had told the great Whig party that, if they shrunk from this question of Reform they would become extinct. Now, he believed that the Whig party would become extinct—that a Whig in England would be as rare an animal as a wolf if that great party listened to the behests of the Member for Birmingham. He congratulated Her Majesty's Government on having received into its ranks so valuable an acquisition as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for London (Mr. Goschen); but, while he felicitated the Ministry, he should condole with the right hon. Gentleman himself. At a meeting in the City the other night the right hon. Gentleman seemed to consider it a case of very serious hardship that he was compelled to give up his occupation as a merchant, for a position so humble as that of a Cabinet Minister of England. Like the Lycian Prince—

"When Glaucus of his judgment Jove deprived,
His armour interchanging, gold for brass,
A hundred oxen worth for that of nine,"

he might apply to him the epigram of Martial—

"Tam stupidus nunquam nec tu, puto, Glauce, fuisti,
Chalcea donanti Chrysea qui dederas."

As had already been remarked in the course of the debate, nothing more strongly showed the importance of the Session on which they were about entering than the fact that up to this only three of the topics touched on in the Queen's Speech had yet been discussed.

Mr. CARDWELL: Sir, I can assure you that I have no desire to continue the discussion which has been raised with regard to Jamaica. The object which I have in view is identical with the course which Her Majesty's Government have endeavoured to pursue, and that has been, while insisting upon full inquiry into all matters which appeared to them to call for inquiry, to avoid prejudging any part of the question. I should ill fulfil that intention if I said anything which continued the discussion of the subject beyond the point to which it has been the pleasure of the House to entertain it. All, therefore, that I rise to say is, that like the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Pakington), I have known Governor Eyre only by the reputation which he has obtained and preserved in the service of the Crown. When I first heard, by telegram through the United States, that these deplorable occurrences had taken place, I sent for the Governor of Barbadoes, who happened to be in this country, and asked whether he could give me any assistance in explaining what these transactions meant. His reply was, "I can give you no assistance in reading this enigma. But this I can tell you, that if the circumstances have been such as seriously to alarm Governor Eyre, they must have been circumstances of great moment." He went on to speak of Governor Eyre as a man of great courage and of great humanity. Although, therefore, I feel it my bounden duty to say nothing which shall prejudice the question, either in his favour or against him, I do think it right, in the meanwhile, to state what is a fact in the case, and that the knowledge of the reputation which he has heretofore borne should not be kept back from the House. The course which the Government have pursued has been spoken of both by the right hon. Baronet and by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, but there is nothing that has fallen from them which I think calls for any reply or remark from me. They agree on the main in approving the course which was pursued by the Government, though the right hon. Baronet thinks we were too precipitate, and my hon. Friend thinks we were not quite rapid enough. I am willing not to enter on that part of the question, but to leave it to the future consideration and judgment of the House. There is one point, however, on which I wish to set the right hon. Baronet right. He says—what has frequently been said—that he feared too much influence had been exercised, and that in the course which we pursued pressure had been put upon us particularly by a certain deputation to which he took occasion to refer. Now, the fact is that when that deputation waited on my noble Friend, who was not able to be present, and was received by me, Sir Henry Storks was at that moment on his way from Malta to this country, having received from me an intimation of the purpose for which he was sent for to this country, and of the appointment which has been so much canvassed.

SIR GEORGE GREY: One word before the Question is put. In reference to the construction which the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich has placed upon an answer given by me to a question on the subject of Reform, it certainly never was the construction which I intended it should bear. The right hon. Baronet said it was very undesirable—and I entirely agree with him—that the question should be kept dangling before the House and the country as a party question from year to year; and I think he said the answer which I had given left it in complete uncertainty whether the Bill founded on the information to be obtained would be presented in the course of the present or of the next year. I certainly intended to give rise to no such uncertainty. What I intended to say, if I did not say it, was that until the day for the introduction of the Bill was fixed, and until the Government were in a condition to lay the information on which that Bill would be founded before the House, it was impossible to say what the interval would be. As to the general principles of the Bill the Government are agreed; but as to its details the Government cannot, of course, lay them before the House until the information on which they are acting is complete. Of course, if that information had been complete when Parliament met the paragraph in Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne would have been in different terms. That paragraph pledges the Government to communicate the information when complete to the House. It is intended to express—and does, I think, clearly express—the intention of the Government at the earliest period at which they can do so to lay a Bill before the House founded on that information.

Mr. T. B. POTTER said, he had taken part in the great meeting held in Manchester on the subject of the Jamaica massacre. The antecedents of Governor Eyre were laid most fully before that meeting, and every credit was given to him for his conduct when he was in Australia. All that the meeting asked was for investigation, and the deputation to Earl Russell, of which he had the honour to be a member, preferred the same request. They judged Governor Eyre purely by the evidence contained in his own despatches. The meeting wished to do nothing condemnatory of him; they merely wished that the name of England might be vindicated from what they considered a blot on the national escutcheon.

Mr. BOUVERIE: It is quite clear, from the very oracular and mystical paragraph which closes Her Majesty's Speech, that there is to be a Reform Bill. That fact, at any rate, seems to be established. But as the information is not complete on which that Reform Bill is to be founded, I presume that Her Majesty's Government have not completely made up their minds as to what the nature of that Reform Bill is to be. Taking that to be the case, we had two glimmerings of light thrown upon this subject in the course of the last week. The noble Lord at the head of the Government (Earl Russell) stated in another place that this Bill would be brought before Parliament before the Easter vacation—I think he said he hoped before the end of the month. He has also stated, on another public occasion, that by that measure his Government intended to stand or fall. Now, that appears to me to be a sound and proper resolution. There has been a great deal too much paltering with this question. But what I am anxious about, and the point which I wish to urge on the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, is this:—If the measure is to be one by which they are to stand or fall, by which the fate of the Liberal Ministry and by which the domination of the Liberal party in the politics of this country for some time to come is to be determined, it should be a measure which will be worth standing or falling by. Now, there is some reason to suppose, from rumours and from utterances out of this House, that this measure—incomplete as it is declared to be by my right hon. Friend (the Secretary of State)—is simply to be a measure for the lowering the franchise in boroughs and counties. On behalf of a great portion of the Liberal party in this country—and I think of no insignificant portion of the Liberal party in this House—I venture to say that such a measure would not be a satisfactory adjustment of the great question of Parliamentary Reform. I feel satisfied the great body of earnest Reformers in this country are convinced, that one of the principal evils of the existing state of things with which they must grapple is the distribution of political power in this country. None of us—if I except some extreme theoretical politicians—wish to see political power simply distributed in this country according to heads of population; but we all know that there are in existence a number of wretched boroughs, which, for some reason or other, were retained at the time of the Reform Act, but which ought now no longer to be retained. These are either purely nomination boroughs, or else what are still worse—boroughs known to be the sinks of corruption. I say no Reform Bill will be satisfactory to the people of this country unless it attempts to grapple with this evil. But it is not the mere question of the existence of these small nomination and corrupt boroughs—there is at the bottom of this question something much more important, and that is the question of the distribution of political power in this country. Those who look at the present state of that distribution, and see where the weight of the representation lies, will perceive that where the wealth, the industry, the activity, the intelligence, and the ability of the United Kingdom lie, the weight and preponderance of the representation are not to be found. I see at the bottom of this desire for Reform—particularly with the middle classes, with the manufacturing, shipbuilding, mining, and industrial classes—the people who make the greatness of this country—I see that much of their dissatisfaction arises from the fact, that the preponderance of political power is not in accordance with the industry, the intelligence, and the wealth of the nation, but is distributed according to some method which in old times was in harmony with these things, but has long ceased to be so. Take the county with which I am most intimately connected by property and residence—Wilts. There are returned from that county and its boroughs eighteen Members—exactly the same number, I believe, returned by South Lancashire, which contains more than five times its population, and to which it cannot for a moment be compared in respect of wealth, activity, and energy. Great as is the regard which I entertain for my native county, nobody could say if the two districts were compared that the representation of South Lancashire ought not vastly to exceed that of Wilts. Take, for another example, the part of the country with which I am politically connected—the county of Ayr? It is populous, wealthy, active, and industrious—industrious in all respects that make Great Britain what she is; it has a thriving population busily engaged in mining, shipbuilding, manufacturing, ploughing, delving, and weaving; and what is the representation of Ayr? It has one county Member, the one-fifth of one borough Member, and two-fifths of another borough Member, or an aggregate of one Member and three-fifths. Well, I say that these anomalies, if there be a Reform Bill, must be grappled and dealt with. And this consideration must be borne in mind—that if you are going to lower the county franchise to £10 or £15, unless there shall be a new distribution of power as between the occupiers of houses and the owners of land, you will throw the whole power into the hands of the householders, and deprive the landed proprietors of that weight in the country which hitherto they have possessed, as representing property. I am not going to discuss the Reform Bill before it is laid on the table, but while there is a chance—while the measure may not be yet settled—while the information is incomplete on which it is to be founded, I wish to urge this on Her Majesty's Government—that if they make their attempt with what the late Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) called “a single-barrelled Reform Bill,” they will be defeated, and they will only perpetuate the evils which they seek to remedy. This will be the result if they shall listen unwisely to the charming of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), who, if I understand his utterances out of doors, has endeavoured to persuade his countrymen that it is desirable to take a one-barrelled Bill rather than wait for a reform of all the electoral abuses now complained of. I think we ought to do this thing en masse and in the whole, and not bit by bit. It may suit my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, for whom I have a great respect and regard—to profess admiration for his ability would be on my part simply impertinent—loving, as he appears to do, public appearances and platform oratory—it may suit him to keep this subject alive, for if the Bill were a one-barrelled Bill, he would still have one barrel left to load if he pleased and to discharge in this House; but this is exactly what does not suit the country, and will not suit this House. Let me assure my hon. Friend and the Government that the desire of the people of this country will be to have this question settled and done with, and not kept up as a source of uneasiness and discontent, preventing the introduction of other measures—measures for the improvement of the condition of our countrymen, which it is the duty of Parliament to pass, and which, after all, it is the whole object of those constitutional arrangements to promote. Therefore, I emphatically say—and I am sure I speak the sentiments of a great many in this House and out of it when I say so—that if the Government introduced such a measure as it is supposed they contemplate, not only will their Bill not be satisfactory—not only will it not receive the general support of the country, but they will make a shipwreck of the opportunity, now within their reach, if they seize it, of settling for the present century the question of Reform.

SIR HENRY HOARE claimed the indulgence of the House, whilst addressing a few observations to them for the first time. While deprecating the idea that he was about to prejudge or impugn the scheme of the Government, he desired to say that he cordially agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmar-nock (Mr. E. P. Bouverie) in what he had said with respect to no measure of Reform being satisfactory which did not present, at least for the present time, some prospect of finality. It was, however, to be feared from what they had heard, that the measure of the Government was one borrowed from the archives of the hon. Member for Birmingham. Whatever the Reform Bill might be he (Sir Henry Hoare) hoped it would not be such an one as would serve as a stepping-stone to future arrangements of a revolutionary character. He should be prepared to vote for such an alteration in the franchise as would admit a large accession of intellect and honesty; but not for such an one as would allow the influence of property to be outweighed by numbers. There were in that House a majority of sixty or seventy Members returned at the last general election to support the late Prime Minister, and it might be supposed that those hon. Gentlemen would remember the injunction, Nimum ne crede colori—that they would not follow blindly in the wake, or support the propositions of the Minister of the day. A great and eminent man, the late Sir George Lewis, when speaking some four or five years ago observed that it was the duty of the Minister who proposed a Reform Bill to adduce the evils which he sought to remedy, and to show that the remedy he suggested was likely to be attended with the results which it was intended to bring about. In framing a Reform Bill, population, intelligence, and property should be combined, and he must say that, in his opinion, the important agricultural counties had a right to look for increased representation.

Mr. NEATE said, he concurred in the belief that the question of Reform would not have been satisfactorily settled until there was a re-distribution of seats, and an extinction of a considerable number of the smaller boroughs. Whether the measures for a complete Parliamentary Reform should all be brought in at one time was, however, quite another question. He thought the Ministry were acting rightly if they separated the question of an extension of the franchise from that of its re-distribution; because, before Parliament proceeded to re-distribute the franchise it ought to know what the increase of the constituencies would be. Again, he thought it would be well to have a separate measure for the counties and a separate one for the boroughs. The county franchise was different in important respects from that of the boroughs; and a man might be inclined to vote for the extension of the one though being of opinion that there was no necessity for an extension of the other. Such a person might vote against the second reading of a Bill embracing the extension of the two. Sir Francis Baring once announced in the House that it would be most convenient to deal separately with the two branches of the great question of Reform. He quite concurred in that opinion, and, indeed, he thought it might be beneficial to subdivide the question even to a greater extent.

Mr. P. A. TAYLOR agreed entirely with what had been said by previous speakers with regard to the unsatisfactory character of any Bill which should deal with the franchise only, and leave to the future the question of the re-distribution of seats. In his opinion, the coming Bill should be large enough to settle the question for some years to come. He quite admitted that there was an inconsistency in bringing in one Bill which should lower the franchise in certain boroughs and another which should deprive them of representation altogether; but he endorsed the opinion of the hon. Member for Birmingham, that the people who had waited so long and so patiently for Reform should be content with any step that was definite and positive, and not wait for any Utopian scheme of perfect Reform. He did not believe that any Bill dealing with the franchise only would be entirely satisfactory; but he would accept it, because he believed, with the hon. Member for Birmingham, that in the present constitution of the House it would be impossible to carry one of a more satisfactory character. There were, unfortunately, on our side of the House a number of men calling themselves Liberals, but who talked mere Toryism, and contended that legislation should be "for the people, not by the people." Again, there were Gentlemen on the opposite Benches who were unwilling to sacrifice the seats of nomination boroughs, or boroughs of corruption. He had no doubt that the hon. Member for Birmingham had been agreeably surprised at the exhibition of sentiment which had been made in the House that evening, every speaker having tacitly implied that there was a necessity for a Reform Bill, and that a Reform Bill, to be worthy of the acceptance of the House, must be a comprehensive and searching measure, and deal not only with the suffrage, but also the re-distribution of seats.

SAVINGS BANKS AND POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK ACTS.—REPORT.

Resolution [Feb. 8] reported.

MR. AYRTON asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he had any objection to lay upon the table the accounts relating to Post Office savings banks in a somewhat more satisfactory form than that in which they were now given. They appeared to show a profit of £40,000, whereas, in fact, there was a loss to that amount; for, as he understood the accounts, it appeared that the whole of the annuities and interest received from year to year was credited as income, while nothing was deducted for the depreciation of those annuities, which were terminable, and would soon come to an end. If, however, the amount of that depreciation, which was estimated at £80,000, was placed against the apparent profit, it would show a loss, instead of a profit, of £40,000. It was extremely to be regretted that the accounts were made up in such a manner that there should be room for misapprehension. Certainly, they were not presented to the House in the form adopted by joint-stock banks and other institutions which carry on business of a similar kind. It was necessary that there should be placed upon the table a proper annual account of profit and loss. Unless hon. Members saw that all charges and deductions were fairly set off against the income, they would be unable to ascertain the amount of profit and loss. He was anxious that the right hon. Gentleman should take into consideration the expediency of remodelling the form in which these accounts were presented.

MR. HENLEY hoped that when the Bill had been brought in a reasonable time would be allowed to elapse after it was printed, so that Members might have a fair opportunity of considering it before the second reading. The matter was in some of its parts very technical.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am always desirous to bring forward Bills of this nature, which I have no reason to suppose would call forth much criticism, before the business of Parliament becomes crowded. What I will do is this. I will have the Bills printed, naming rather an early day for the second reading. The Bills are short, and the right hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity of looking at them; and if, on looking at them, he should think it desirable that more time should be given, I will accede to any opinion he may express on the subject. With regard to the Question put by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, I am not sure that I distinctly gather the precise nature of his objection to the form of the accounts, because not having that form before me I cannot lay my finger on any particular part of it, and therefore I cannot say absolutely what is my judgment as to any power of presenting the accounts in a different form. In point of fact, there will always be certain facts open to discussion with respect to funds which are represented in the form of Government Annuities; and, perhaps, there will be more room for 'discussions of that kind in proportion as we convert perpetual annuities into terminable annuities, because terminable annuities are not commodities suited for immediate conversion except at an unfavourable rate of interest. That consideration has hitherto prevented the Government and Parliament from attempting any large conversion of the National Debt into the form of terminable annuities. Now that we are becoming recipients on a larger scale of the savings of the people, it does seem convenient to apply more extensively this system of converting perpetual into terminable annuities. At any rate, I wish it to be understood, and borne in mind by the House, that it introduces elements of difficulty with regard to the precise computation of the value of a commodity which can only be brought into the market on unfavourable terms. It may be laid down as a principle that we should never convert into terminable any perpetual annuities, which we may be called upon to replace to meet our obligations. With respect to the expense of Post Office savings banks, I have no hesitation in expressing perfect confidence, that an investigation of figures, on a fair and just valuation of the assets of the National Debt Commissioners, and the Government savings banks, will show, notwithstanding the extensive security required, and the large number of branches all through the country, everyone of which is, in point of fact, an agency for the central Post Office in London, that we are a perfectly solvent concern. We do not seek to make, and it would not be right to aim at making a profit; what we do aim at is to give the depositing public every possible facility, and the State absolute security. With respect to the precise forms in which the accounts are now laid before the House, if the hon. and learned Member will kindly suggest to me the points which he thinks are weak and require explanation, I will take an opportunity of attending to them.

Resolution agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and Mr. CHILDERS.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

RAILWAY COMPANIES' BORROWING POWERS.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF BELMORE, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government whether it was the intention of the President of the Board of Trade to introduce during the present Session any measure to give effect to the recommendations of the Select Committee of that House (1864) on the subject of Railway Companies borrowing powers, said, the subject was one which, though not of any great popular interest, was nevertheless of considerable importance, and he desired to bring to their Lordships' recollection what had already taken place concerning this matter during the last three Sessions. In the Session of 1863, a noble Earl (the Earl of Donoughmore), who was unfortunately too unwell to be present that evening, brought to the notice of their Lordships the Special Report and Evidence on the West Hartlepool Harbour and Railway Bill, by which it appeared that the directors of that company had greatly exceeded their borrowing powers; and a Select Committee was appointed by their Lordships

"To inquire and report as to what legislative measures are desirable for the purpose of restraining the directors of railway companies from exceeding the limits of the borrowing powers fixed by their Act of Parliament."

The Committee which sat in two Sessions, made two Reports, to the effect, that it was very desirable that railway companies should be compelled to make annual returns to some public officer, and that there should be a system of compulsory registration of railway obligations. As the Government did not take up the matter, and his noble Friend was prevented from following up the subject, he (the Earl of Belmore) took the liberty last Session, at the suggestion of his noble Friend, of introducing a Bill (the Railway Debentures, &c., Registry Bill), embodying the recommendations of the Commissioners. That Bill passed their Lordships' House, but went down to the Commons late in the Session, and was withdrawn after a first reading, as it was felt, notwithstanding that it had met with the approval of the then Lord Chancellor, who had added an important Amendment obliging companies to register all their obligations, that it would receive severe opposition from the powerful railway interest in the House of Commons. The objections were very fairly stated in a newspaper which devoted itself to financial questions. They were four in number. In the first place, it was said that a system of compulsory registration would give to railway debentures and obligations an apparent validity which they did not intrinsically possess, and that the registrar whom the Bill proposed to intrust with receiving the annual returns and registering the bonds could not possibly ascertain whether any bonds submitted to him were or were not within the limits of the borrowing powers of the company presenting them. All, however, that his Bill proposed to do was exactly what had been done for the last 150 years with regard to the registration of deeds relating to land in Ireland; every deed had to be registered in the Rolls Office in Dublin, and the deed took priority according to the date of registration. That was precisely what he had proposed to do with regard to the registration of railway obligations, and registration would no more make the debenture valid than would the registration of a false deed in Ireland make it a good one. The only object of his Bill was to show the numbers and amount of the securities issued by the company, so that proposing lenders might be able to ascertain what was in priority to them. The second objection was that the Bill would take from the directors of railway companies the sense of responsibility which they were now supposed to possess; but the writer himself went on to say that he knew something of the borrowing operations of railway companies, and that directors often did not know the extent of their responsibilities, and the same objection might be urged against any Bill proposing to restrict the powers of railway companies. The third point was that the Bill if carried would interfere with the proper conduct of business. He would be the last to propose anything which would interfere with the action of railway companies in conducting their business, or obstruct trade in any way; but he was of opinion that the increased value of their securities would have gained if the proposed Bill had become law, would have more than compensated them for any minor inconvenience they would suffer. The fourth objection was that these debentures would take a priority over other debts to which they were not entitled, and which the shareholders had never supposed that they possessed. The law provided, however, that certain borrowing powers should not be exceeded, and it might fairly be presumed to have been the intention of Legislature that those who lent their money under the several Acts were entitled to priority over other obligations. He believed it had been decided that the holder of Lloyds' bonds, so long as they were bond fide, that was to say given in payment for work done, could enter an execution against all the effects of a railway company. The whole subject was a matter of great importance, so much so that he thought it should not be taken up by a private Member of their Lordships' House, and he hoped he should hear from the Government that the President of the Board of Trade intended to introduce a Bill on the subject, and the more so, because he understood that when the Registry Bill was in the House of Commons last Session, the President of the Board of Trade had (he did not say in his plan, because there was no discussion on the Bill), informed the noble Lord who had charge of it in that House that he should probably deal with the subject. He would now ask, Whether it is the Intention of the President of the Board of Trade to introduce, during the present Session, any Measure to give effect to the Recommendation of the Select Committee of this House (1864) on "Railway Companies' Borrowing Powers;" and 2, Whether, if such a Measure should be introduced, it would be framed so as to meet the Case of the Obligations of Joint Stock Companies generally?

EARL RUSSELL was understood to say that he had consulted his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, who had informed him that he was engaged upon the subject, but was not prepared to say that he would at present bring in any measure dealing with it this Session.

LORD OVERSTONE said, he regretted to hear the answer which had just been given by the noble Earl at the head of the Government upon that subject. By the Legislature of the country power was given to railway companies to borrow, under certain conditions, large sums of money on the security of their bonds. But the investors in the bonds had no means of verifying whether or not those conditions had been complied with, and, consequently, whether the security thus offered was not utterly worthless. That was not a mere theoretical objection. It was one which had actually been realized upon several remarkable occasions. If he was not mistaken, even since the question had last been under the consideration of their Lordships an important case had arisen, in which a great company had gone far beyond its legal power of borrowing, and the directors had defended their conduct by alleging that they were driven by pressure to adopt the course they had followed. They were under an obligation at a certain period to meet a large amount of claims on them, whatever might then be the state of the money market, and they thought it desirable to raise money beforehand in an easy state of the money market, so that they might be prepared to meet their engagements. Fresh bonds were accordingly issued beyond their legal powers; and upon that a serious question might arise whether the security had not thus been invalidated. Under these circumstances, it was reasonable that the public should look to the Legislature to afford them the means of exercising that precaution with regard to the validity of those securities which the Legislature itself had made necessary. They had had a Committee of that House sitting upon the subject; that Committee had examined witnesses, who represented some of the largest railways in the kingdom, and those witnesses made no objection to the adoption of such a measure as that suggested by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Belmore); but, on the contrary, they expressed themselves ready to welcome it. They had also had before them the solicitor to the Bank of England, which establishment is supposed to be a large investor in those securities, and he had expressed a similar opinion. The Committee themselves were all but unanimous in favour of the proposal, the only dissentient being the noble Earl the President of the Council. He hoped that the attention of the President of the Board of Trade would be directed in a more serious and earnest manner to the matter, and that he would be prepared to grapple with its difficulties before the conclusion of the present Session. He was certainly sorry that a more satisfactory answer had not been returned by the noble Earl.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, he wished to express his belief that a measure of the kind suggested by the noble Earl (the Earl of Belmore) would not be injurious to any company that conducted its business upon legitimate principles.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM.—QUESTION.

LORD HOUGHTON rose to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether they intend to introduce any measure respecting the administration of the British Museum and the disposition of its contents? He was induced to put the Question in consequence of two events which had lately occurred. One of these was the resignation of the Principal Librarian of the British Museum, who was really at the head of the whole of that establishment, and was the life and soul of its administration. That resignation, he believed, had taken place several months ago, and yet the vacancy had not been filled up. The other consideration by which he was influenced was the existence of a rumour that certain proposals had been made by the Government to the Trustees of the Museum for a change in their constitution, but which had not been accepted. With regard to the first of these points, he should say that the resignation of Mr. Panizzi must of itself lead to considerable changes in the constitution of the British Museum. When that gentleman was appointed to his office, several years ago, he (Lord Houghton) called attention to that appointment in the other House, and he did so because, notwithstanding the respect which he entertained for the character and abilities of Mr.

Lord Overstone

Panizzi, he thought that in the present dearth of honours and emoluments for literary men in this country such an office ought to have been conferred by Her Majesty's Government on some gentleman not of foreign extraction. He still adhered to that opinion, although he believed that the administration of that gentleman had been one of considerable efficiency. He was also aware that a great deal of heart-burning and discontent had prevailed among the officers of the establishment during the period of his administration, and that his resignation was not regretted by those gentlemen. The question of appointing his successor could not be much longer delayed, and he hoped that among the officers of the establishment some gentleman would be found for the office in whom the country would place confidence. He believed that the delay in filling up the vacancy had been caused by some distrust in the present administration and constitution of the British Museum. The question had not only been frequently discussed in the other House, but scarcely any question had been discussed with so much unfairness and injustice to individuals. In 1847, a Commission, on which he himself had the honour of being appointed, went into the subject at great length, but he could only regret that their labours had been futile, and that no action had been taken by the Government upon their recommendations. That Commission proposed that a Chairman, a person of distinction—should be appointed by the Crown, four members should be elected by the Trustees from among themselves, and two members should be paid by the Government, one of them being a man of high literary, and the other of high scientific attainments. He should add, however, that he believed those suggestions would at present require considerable modification in consequence of the great additions which had of late years been made to the establishment. He thought that a fair trial had been given to the present constitution of the British Museum; he also believed that there could not be a body of men more honourable or more desirous of doing good service to the literature and science of the country than the present Trustees; and if the constitution of the Museum was still unpopular, it was only natural to suppose that the time had come for effecting in it some alteration. The noble Lord concluded by asking Her Majesty's Government, Whether they intend to introduce any Measure respecting the Administration of the British Museum and the Disposition of its Contents?

EARL RUSSELL could only say, in answer to the noble Lord, that he had a short time since made certain suggestions to the Trustees of the British Museum, which he thought would conduce to the better conduct of the establishment; but the Trustees themselves did not think it desirable that those proposals should be adopted, and they had declined to carry them into effect. No regular official communication had passed upon the subject, and he would rather not enter further into the details of the question. As matters at present stood it was not the intention of the Government to introduce any measure of the kind to which his noble Friend had referred. With regard to the appointment of Mr. Panizzi, to which the noble Lord had referred, he believed that it was a wise appointment. He was a man of great ability and acquirements, and had conducted the affairs of the Museum, as far as they belonged to his department, under the direction of the Trustees, very much to his own credit and to the advantage of the public. He had been obliged to tender his resignation in consequence of the state of his health; that resignation had been accepted, and he (Earl Russell) believed that very little delay would now elapse in the appointment of his successor.

LORD TAUNTON said, he scarcely thought it consistent with the famed hospitality of this country to object to a gentleman of ability on the ground that he was a foreigner. Although a Trustee of the British Museum, he was by no means wedded to its present system of management. Having regard to the enormous magnitude of the collections and the difficulty of arranging them, and the likelihood of that difficulty being increased by the scientific researches in contemplation, it might become necessary to consider whether the affairs of the British Museum might not be managed more efficiently than they were at present, and he had no doubt that some important alterations might be advantageously introduced. He might add that it was not the fault of the Trustees that sufficient space was not provided for their various collections, and that the difficulty in that case arose from the fact that the House of Commons refused to grant the necessary supplies for the purpose. Any changes to be made must be dealt with in a large spirit and must embrace the whole administration of the Museum.

EARL STANHOPE said, he also desired to bear his testimony to the great merits and services of Mr. Panizzi. He thought it was impossible for any man to have applied himself to the duties of his office with more zeal, more ability, and more unremitting attention than that gentleman had done. He should add that he could not but think that in the selection of such an officer all that the Government had to do was to look out for the most competent person, and that the fact of a man being a foreigner ought to be no reason for not accepting his services.

LORD HOUGHTON said, he did not call in question the merits of Mr. Panizzi, but he still thought that the appointment ought not to have been given to a foreigner. It had been said by a celebrated Frenchman that a Government that attempted to appoint a foreigner to the management of the Bibliothèque Impériale at Paris could not stand for a day.

EARL STANHOPE inquired whether the noble Lord wished them to suppose that the management of the Bibliothèque Impériale was a perfect model of liberal administration?

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolutions in Committee—Cattle Diseases; Cattle Plague.

Ordered—Cattle Diseases; Cattle Plague*; Pensions; Labouring Classes' Dwellings; Public Offices Site.

Select Committee on Standing Orders nominated:—Colonel WILSON PATTEN, Mr. BONHAM-CARTER, Mr. DUNLOP, Mr. EDWARD EGERTON, Mr. GREGORY, Mr. HENLEY, Mr. HANKY, Lord HOUGHTON, Mr. LEFROY, and Mr. WALPOLE.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN moved that the Committee of Selection consist of the following Members:—Mr. Bonham-

Carter, Mr. Dunlop, Mr. Gregory, Lord Hotham, Mr. Mowbray, and the Chairman of the Select Committee on Standing Orders.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, it was generally admitted that the present power was insufficient to cope with the private business of the House. There were two modes by either of which the difficulty might be met. One was, strengthening the machinery; the other, lessening the amount of the work. He was of opinion that the private business had increased in consequence of the Rules of the House not having been strictly observed. If hon. Members examined the Bills now being promoted, they would find that a number of them were continuance Bills; they would find that Bills had been granted to parties who were unable to carry them out; and they would also find that Bills were being promoted this Session to repeal parts of Bills passed last Session. A recurrence of such a state of things might be prevented in a great measure if the rules relating to private Bills were rigidly enforced. If the House did not agree with him as to the expediency of applying that remedy, there was the alternative of more powerful machinery. He thought the matter was one deserving the attention of his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Wilson Patten) and of the House.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN observed, that it was quite impossible to look at the list of Private Bills before the House without feeling that, in the present Session, there would be very great difficulty in dealing with private business. He did not think they should take any other than the usual course in proceeding with the Bills; but, seeing that there were 633 Private Bills to be disposed of, he thought it was for the Speaker's consideration whether one Court before which these Bills came ought not to be strengthened—he alluded to the Court of Referees. He believed it must be admitted that this Court had saved the time of hon. Members during last Session; and as there were at present in the House nearly 200 Members inexperienced in the transaction of private business, he asked whether a second Court of Referees ought not to be appointed to sit at the same time with the other. It was customary with the Committee of Selection to send out circulars inquiring of hon. Members at what period of the Session it would be most convenient for them to give their services on Committees. He would request of hon. Members to send in their replies to those circulars at the earliest possible time.

MR. WALPOLE said, he could not but think that the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman was well worthy of consideration, regard being had to the state of the private business. He must say, however, that increasing the numbers of the Referees would be virtually doing that which, though it had been more than once recommended, the House had not sanctioned—namely, taking the Private Bills out of the hands of the House. If this should be done, and those Bills handed over to other tribunals, he thought there ought to be a more general measure. He thought that during the present Session they must go on as usual; but the matter ought to be attentively considered in time for next Session.

MR. SANDFORD said, he must remind the House that with the view of facilitating the despatch of private business the number of Members on Committees had been reduced last Session.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said, that he, for one, thought that the House was fully competent to discharge its own business. Last Session he was so struck with the alarm expressed on the subject of Private Bills that he went to his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Wilson Patten) and said that, in order to facilitate business, he was ready to serve twice during the Session; but instead of any such additional service having been required of him, he had not been called upon to serve even once.

Motion agreed to.

Committee of Selection nominated:—MR. BOWHAM-CARTER, MR. DUNLOP, MR. GREGORY, LORD HOTHAM, MR. MOWBRAY, and the Chairman of the Select Committee on Standing Orders.

LICENSING OF THEATRES.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. LOCKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the present state of the Law as to the Licensing of Theatres and other places of amusement in the Metropolis, and whether it is his intention to bring in a Bill on the subject?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that his attention had been called to the subject, which was a very complicated one—the more so because the law rested upon old statutes, which, to a certain extent, had become obsolete. His hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Home Department intended to move that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the law before any proposal was laid before the House on the subject. That Motion his hon. Friend would make on an early day.

THE POOR IN THE METROPOLIS.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE asked the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether it is his intention to introduce any measure for more effectually securing the execution of the Laws relating to the Poor in the Metropolis?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS: In answer to the inquiry of the noble Lord, I beg to say that it is my intention to introduce a measure for more effectually securing the execution of the laws relating to the relief of the poor in the metropolis, and that this measure will be substantially based on the Report of the Select Committee appointed by the last Parliament to inquire into this matter.

THE SUEZ CANAL.—QUESTION.

MR. SANDFORD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the award of the Emperor of the French in the affairs of the Suez Canal has been definitely accepted; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government adhered to that award, and whether they will lay the papers relating to it upon the table of the House?

MR. LAYARD: In reply to the Question of my hon. Friend, I have to state that the award of the Emperor is not yet complete. Certain inquiries have yet to be made, aided by a Commission appointed by the Turkish, Egyptian, and French Governments, and the Suez Canal Company. Those Commissioners are engaged in their inquiries; and when those inquiries are completed, I shall be in a better position to speak on the subject.

KING'S COUNTY RETURN.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. AYRTON: I claim the attention of the House for a short time whilst I bring under its attention a question which concerns most deeply not only the privileges of the House in its collective capacity, but also the rights and privileges of individuals elected to sit in this House. I believe that there is some misapprehension in the minds of some hon. Members as to the case which I desire to submit to the judgment of the House, and therefore I will state what is my view of the privileges that I think have been grievously violated on the present occasion. From the earliest time the House has always claimed, and for two centuries at least, has exercised, the most complete power over every question affecting the election of Members of this House, whether those questions affect the rights of voters, the conduct of returning officers, or any transaction connected with the election itself; and it has always claimed and exercised the right of determining as to the position of any Gentleman sitting in this House and of any person claiming to be a Member. But these rights and privileges are of a twofold kind. There is the right of the House itself to vindicate its own privileges and the privileges of its Members, which it has exercised upon the Motion or suggestion of a Member of the House. And there is also another right—namely, that of individuals who consider themselves aggrieved, and who have always enjoyed the power of petitioning the House to complain of any mistake or error in an election. Such petitions have always been treated like a suit in a law court—examined and decided upon by the House as a court of justice. It is obvious that these two powers are necessarily separate and distinct. The one has been asserted by the House for the maintenance of its own rights, and the other has been asserted by individuals for the vindication of theirs. It was, however, found that so much inconvenience arose from the House in its collective capacity acting as a judicial tribunal, that it became necessary a century ago to transfer that power of adjudicating upon petitions to special Committees selected for the purpose, who proceed according to the provisions of the statute then in use. This procedure has continued with some modifications from that day to the present time. I think it was in 1848 that the law relating to election petitions was completely and comprehensively reviewed, and a general Act was passed by which undoubtedly every case of individual complaint of grievances that could be brought under the notice of the House by petition was referred to the tribunal constituted to try election petitions. This Act was repealed and another was more recently passed, but there is no substantial difference between them, except perhaps that the last Act is not so complete and comprehensive as the former one.

But I am not going to raise a question under these Acts. My case is entirely independent of them; but in considering their effect, I think I may state that it is a sound and true principle that the privileges of the House are to be treated like the Prerogative of the Crown, that they cannot be taken away by any intendment of language, but only by most express and precise terms. In this way alone can the Prerogative of the Crown be affected. The House has to consider whether these Acts have in any way diminished or abrogated its own inherent privileges; and I think that a moment's reflection will show us that nothing that has transpired in legislation has in the least diminished the supreme power of the House to vindicate and maintain its own privileges and those of its Members. In considering what the House should do when any question is brought under its notice in reference to the maintenance of the privileges of Members arising out of an election, I think that the House will recognize the wisdom of the distinction that has been maintained by a solemn judgment of the House. Some years ago a gentleman having been elected came to the table and took the oaths and his seat without any return having been made of the election. Upon this the question naturally arose in the House whether it was competent for a gentleman to sit by his election and not by his return. The House was struck with the gravity of the question, and it was referred to a Committee of the most distinguished Members of the House, and they came to a Resolution. The case, I may say, was that of Mr. Hawes, in 1848, and the Committee solemnly determined, by Resolution—

"That although the return of the indenture to the Crown Office has always been required by the House as the best evidence of a Member's title to be sworn, yet that the absence of that proof cannot affect the validity of the election, nor the right of a person duly elected to be held a Member of this House."

This Resolution was accepted by the House, and it was held that Mr. Hawes had been properly sworn, and no further step was taken in the matter. This decision being recorded, we at once understand the numerous precedents that have occurred consequent upon the election of Members when the House itself has taken the initiative. Cases have arisen in which the House has been informed by a Member in his place that an election had occurred, and that a Gentleman was unable to take his seat, because the return was not of a character to permit of his being recognized as a Member. Sometimes the return has not stated accurately the place for which he was elected, and sometimes there has been another name differing from that which the Member bore, and on all these occasions the House has received information of the fact of the election, and then proceeded on its own authority, without any election petition, to see that the form of the return corresponded with the fact of the election, and amended the return. This being the practice of the House, it is my duty to state that I hold in my hand a letter from the Under Sheriff of the King's County, which I will venture to read, rather than to state its effect; but I may state, in the first place, that at the last general election three gentlemen were proposed as candidates for the King's County, and one of those gentlemen, who is stated to have been elected, does not appear in the return. Consequent upon this state of things the gentleman communicated with the returning officers, the sheriff and his under sheriff, by a letter to the under sheriff. This letter is dated the 9th of February, 1866, and is signed "John Pope Hennessy," and is in these terms—

"With reference to your communication to me this morning, to the effect that Mr. Longworth authorized you to tell me that he had inspected the King's County poll book since the election, and was now satisfied that I had the majority of votes over Sir Patrick O'Brien, may I trouble you to let me know whether you have also cast up the books, and can corroborate the statement of the high sheriff that I have the majority."

To this letter Mr. Hennessy received the following reply, dated February 10:—

"My dear Sir,—I have just received yours of yesterday's date, asking me if I can corroborate the statement of the high sheriff that you had a majority of votes over Sir Patrick O'Brien, and in reply beg to state that I myself inspected the poll books at the Hanaper Office on the 31st of July last, and was then satisfied that there had been a mistake in the totting up, and that you had a majority of votes. My conversation with the high sheriff to which you allude took place only a few weeks ago."

It is therefore that I communicate to the House the startling fact that although this gentleman's name does not appear upon the return, yet that, according to the undoubted facts of the election, he was elected on that occasion. He is now unable to present himself at the table of the House, though he has been duly elected according to the statements both of the high sheriff and of the under sheriff, in consequence of his name being omitted from the return; and the question which I desire to submit to the consideration and judgment of the House is, what step it ought to take when it finds that its own officer has so erred in the conduct of his duty that the right to sit in the House which has been conferred by the election cannot be exercised in consequence of the mistake which has been made. I am not standing up to advocate the taking measures against the high sheriff or the under sheriff. I am willing to believe that it is an unintentional error, though one that any decent school boy ought not to have been guilty of. I am only here to consider whether it is in the power of the House, and, if so, whether it be not its duty to take some steps to repair this singular error. Undoubtedly, we ought to regard the sheriff without any feeling of vindictiveness, because the House will remember that he is not a volunteer acting for hire and profit, but a gentleman taking upon himself a most onerous office for the public good; and, therefore, it is the practice in all courts of justice to consider any error of which the sheriff has been guilty most leniently, and to give him every opportunity of correcting it, so that no interests should be compromised by his error. If we are to treat the sheriff, who for this purpose is an officer of the House, upon the same principle, it seems to me that we ought to give him an opportunity to correct the error in his return. It may be said that this is not an error merely, but a matter of substance vitally affecting the interests of others; but I have read the Resolution of the House that draws a clear distinction between the right of election and the ceremonial of return. In dealing with this question, the House will not deal with any question of right to sit. On all occasions when the House, acting upon its own authority, has interfered to amend a return, it has at the same time recognized the right of individuals to petition, and it has always accorded to them the right to petition the Commons, when the return was amended. A Resolution to that effect has always accompanied any Resolution amending a return, which not only shows that no question of right was involved, but also that the distinction I have drawn has been recognized. Therefore, if the House were to order this return to be amended, it will be entirely without prejudice to the ultimate right to the seat; and, if any gentleman think himself aggrieved, he will be entitled to petition to have the question adjudicated upon under the Elections Petitions Act. It will be a very grave thing for the House to admit that it can be in the power of a returning officer, when an election has taken place, in fact, to send any one he pleases into the House, and that, on the mere return, any gentleman can sit here to the exclusion of one duly elected. If party feeling were to run high in this country, the leader of the House might be elected beyond all question, and yet a returning officer, who was not skilful in arithmetic, might choose to suppress a hundred or a thousand in his addition, and might return some one else; and thus we might have the leader of the House, upon a mere act of the returning officer, kept at bay for two or three months during a contest on an election petition. It seems to me that it would be most dangerous to the privileges of the House and the rights of every Member if we were once to allow that, where an unquestioned election in fact has taken place, the returning officer may put any name he pleases in the writ. If, when we have it on that officer's authority that he had made a mistake, we were to say that our hands are tied, and that we are unable to remedy that mistake, we should not have the authority which every court of justice in the country claims to exercise for itself, where right is on one side and form and ceremony on the other. I have deprecated the Elections Petitions Acts, because their terms are so stringent, and I have thought it would be desirable if the House would legislate to qualify some of their provisions; but, apart from that question, I maintain that wherever right is shown in fact, and where form does not correspond with right, it is in the power of every tribunal to take care that the form shall coincide with fact and right. And I further say that the House has the same power, and that this is a case in which it ought to give effect to it. I am not willing to draw the House into any controversy about the facts. [Sir PATRICK O'BRIEN: Hear, hear!] The hon. Member cheers, and I hope that he will stand up and give effect to that cheer, for if the hon. Member can stand up and say upon his honour that he was in fact elected, I am quite content to withdraw the Motion with which I shall conclude, and to move the House that the doubtful question of fact shall be referred for solemn investigation upon oath before an election committee. But until I hear the hon. Member stand up and say that in point of fact he was and Mr. Hennessey was not elected, until he is prepared to say that the representations of the sheriff and the under sheriff are erroneous, I must be entitled to ask the house to proceed upon the substantial justice of the case. In the absence of any such representation of fact, I feel it my duty to bring this matter under the consideration of the House, so as to enable the House to vindicate its privilege. I move that the high sheriff of the King's County be called to the Bar of the House to be examined touching this return; and when that Motion has been assented to, it will be for the House to consider what is the proper course to be taken in vindication of those rights which I submit have been violated on this occasion.

THE O'DONOGHUE seconded the Motion.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he should not for a moment attempt to put forward his own personal opposition against the wish of the House; but having been elected by a large number of the King's County constituency, he should be forgetting his position as their representative if he did not venture to address the House after the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ayrton), of course with the kindest possible view—being connected with himself (Sir Patrick O'Brien) in politics—had brought forward this Motion. He recollected some nine years ago, when a young man in that House, he had the honour to differ from the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, and on that occasion he said a thing to that Gentleman which in those days was considered to be inappropriate. The hon. Member seemed not to have forgotten that occurrence of nine years ago, and had selected him (Sir Patrick O'Brien)—he being a Member of the Liberal Party—for his (Mr. Ayrton's) attentions on that occasion. [Cries of "Oh, oh!" from the Opposition.] He could understand that hon. Gentlemen opposite approved of that course; but how the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, who called himself one of his (Sir Patrick O'Brien's) people, could pursue such a course, was difficult, except on the supposition referred to, to understand. He believed the hon. Gentleman was looking in the balance, and that perhaps something connected with the Council of India loomed before his vision. He merely rose to make this statement, and this alone, and he should at once retire from the House, inasmuch as the Question before it was his own. He pledged his honour as a gentleman that he believed on his honour as a Member of that House that he was in a majority for the King's County.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, I must say I am somewhat surprised that the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets should have lent the influence of his authority to the course he has proposed. I have great respect for the abilities of my hon. Friend, and I am quite sure on all occasions he is actuated by a desire to discharge his duty faithfully. Yet, speaking for my own part, I must say I think it would be a matter most deeply to be lamented if the House of Commons gave its sanction, even for a single moment, to such a course. It is equally opposed to all the principles upon which we ought to act; to the rules which guide the proceedings of the House; and to all the interests of every Member of the House, which are, as I think, involved in its rules and practice, as well as in the law on the subject. My hon. Friend has attempted to draw a distinction between the privileges of the House and the law of the land. He says this House is not to consider itself debarred from exercising its powers of interference with matters of election, and that those powers cannot be taken away except by the most express terms of an Act of Parliament. Sir, I venture to say, when this House is a party to the passing of an Act of Parliament to regulate its own practice, in matters connected with its own privileges, which experience has shown to be most delicate, liable to abuse, and liable also to the suspicion of abuse, the House is best consulting its dignity, and best preserving its own privileges in the truest sense of the word, by showing the highest degree of jealousy in maintaining those several rules and regulations which have been established by that Act of Parliament. The real question, viewing it on this and on all like occasions as one of principle, is, whether the course upon which you are now invited to enter is or is not in substance an evasion of the laws which we have laid down for the government of our proceedings, and by which we are bound, even although there be no authority to compel their observance except our own sense of what is due to ourselves and to the law. For what is the principle involved in this case? The Act of Parliament enacts that every complaint of any improper election or any improper return with respect to an election, whether preferred by a candidate or an elector, shall be received only under certain conditions, and investigated only in a certain way. The conditions are that certain recognizances shall be entered into, and then there is the mode of proceeding in the House with which we are all acquainted. Is any gentleman to escape from these obligations? Is the House to be deprived of those securities because a gentleman, instead of going through the form of a petition, thinks fit to enter into a private communication with the Sheriff of the County, and then make a private communication to an hon. Member of the House, complaining of an improper return? I think the House would enter upon a most dangerous, a most unwise, and a most unworthy course if it gave its assent to any such proposition. The practice in the cases referred to by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets has nothing whatever to do with the case before us. They were not cases of an alleged improper election or return. They were cases in which hon. Members who took their seats had been returned as Members. About the return there was no question. The question was whether the forms by which the return ought to be communicated to the House had been sufficiently complied with. There was no case in which a return had been made and in which an hon. Member had been permitted to take the oath and his seat in the House and that return had been challenged. There is no precedent for such a course, but there are precedents to the contrary. In the case of the Dundalk election in 1826, and the elections of Dublin and Rye in 1831, petitions were presented complaining of the conduct of the returning officers, and because they were considered to be in the nature of election petitions, though not directly assuming that form, the House refused to receive them. But if the House had taken the singular view advanced by my hon. Friend, that the returning officer is to be considered an officer of the House, the House, in all those cases, would have received the petitions. But the House acted in those cases upon this most salutary rule, that it would not suffer that to be done indirectly or by evasion which could not be accomplished directly according to the rules which regulated its proceedings; and I hope the House in the present case will adhere to that rule. Let me say one word as to the manner in which the information in the present case has been given to the House. If the House were, under any circumstances, to entertain a question of this kind on the ground that a sheriff had made a mistake, one would have expected that the sheriff would have forwarded his communication to the Speaker, who is the authorized representative of the House. But what has been the course pursued in this case? I am now speaking with the utmost respect for my hon. Friend and for the gentleman from whom he has received his information. A private letter is written by a person complaining of an erroneous return, and then an individual Member of the House say he was told certain facts in conversation by Mr. So-and-So. But if the House is to act on private letters written to individual Members complaining of erroneous returns, and stating that the writers had been told by Sheriff A or Under Sheriff B that they were satisfied that a mistake had been made, no one could tell how far this would go or where it would end. There are a great many other modes of making mistakes at elections besides casting up the votes erroneously. Votes might be taken after the poll had closed. Votes might be wrongly taken down at the poll; it would be as easy to allege that the polling papers had been falsified, as that the numbers had been wrongly cast. The fear is that this evasion, once admitted, would never stop; and therefore it must not be admitted at all. The statement of the under sheriff, that there was a mistake, may be true or not. The House knows nothing about it, and we have no right to assume that an hon. Member who has taken the oath and his seat has been returned in an irregular way. These matters can be investigated in the proper way. The sheriff has made his return, he has no more to do with the subject, and neither he nor the under sheriff can, by unauthorized information, impeach the accuracy of the return made. In all cases in which the accuracy of the return is questioned the proper mode of proceeding is by petition in the regular way. It is then quite possible that when you come to deal with the poll-books there will be a majority found for the party who claims it, but the majority must be a real one, and that it is so can be proved only by showing that the votes recorded were good and valid. The result of such an investigation, conducted in the ordinary way and according to law, may be to show that the hon. Gentleman who now sits as Member for the King's County has been duly elected. I would ask the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets what would take place if there should be an election petition presented and it should be investigated in the regular way. Would the duty of the Committee be confined to the recasting of the numbers in the poll-book? No. The investigation having been opened, it would not stop until the Committee had decided who ought to have been returned. If the investigation should be made in the ordinary way the result might be that, notwithstanding an arithmetical inaccuracy, the hon. Member has been duly elected. The hon. Member has stated to the House, upon his honour, that he believes he has been duly elected. I think my hon. Friend will be satisfied with that. At all events, I should be greatly surprised if the House is not satisfied that the course proposed ought not to be adopted.

MR. AYRTON said, after the statement of the Attorney General, he would not adhere to his proposition. He had proceeded upon what he considered unquestionable matter of fact. He asked leave to withdraw his Motion.

CATTLE DISEASES BILL.

COMMITTEE: BILL ORDERED: FIRST READING.

SIR GEORGE GREY, in rising to move that the Cattle Diseases Act be considered in Committee, with the view of asking for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to contagious or infectious diseases in cattle or other animals, said: Sir, the object of the Bill which I have given notice that I shall ask leave to introduce is one which, in the terms of the Speech from the Throne, "deeply affects the interests of the people of this country;" and when I speak of the interests of the people of this country, I do not mean the interests of one class or another, but of the interests of the whole community. That virulent distemper which has appeared within the last few months in this country affects, no doubt, primarily and immediately the agricultural interest, in so far as they are the producers of that great supply of food with which the country is furnished. But it is quite obvious that the supply of food intimately concerns the interests in the future of the great consuming population of the country. It cannot, therefore, be a matter of surprise that a great change of public opinion has very recently taken place in the estimate formed of the danger arising from the spread of this disorder. The steady progress of the cattle plague, the extensive ravages which it has committed in a great many counties and districts, although there are still a considerable number either absolutely free from the disease or very slightly affected by it—notwithstanding that, the progress, I say, made by the disease, and its extensive ravages, amounting almost to the desolation of certain parts of the country, form a sufficient cause for that alarm which now exists, and for that desire which has been evinced within a short period that the most stringent measures, compatible with a due consideration of the interests of all the parties concerned, might be taken in order to check, if possible, the progress of the disorder. As I have stated, on this subject opinion has been greatly changed, and that within a very limited period—I do not say even within the last few weeks, but since the week preceding the meeting of Parliament. If we look back to the public meetings held in agricultural counties with reference to this disease, only two months ago, or even less, we shall find the tone of expression very different from that with which we have recently become familiar. We shall find, indeed, that in many places a strong desire was expressed that Government should take the entire management of this matter into their own hands; should lay down all the rules and regulations which they conceived to be conducive to the check of the disease; and that they should by officers of their own, taking away the responsibility from the local authorities, undertake the execution of those measures which every one now desires to see put in force. But if we look at the suggestions emanating from these meetings or from any public bodies, we shall find in them very little of that unanimity of opinion with respect to the measures to be taken which, to a great extent, has been arrived at within the last fortnight. Take, for instance, the case of slaughter. The Government, in the exercise of the powers vested in them by law—that is, the Members of the Privy Council whose names are attached to the Orders on the subject, and who acted on the responsibility of the Government generally—the Government, from a very early period, doubted the probability of any effectual check being given to the disease by means of cure.

They thought it their duty, therefore, to authorize, as the most effectual means of repression, the slaughter of the diseased animals by inspectors appointed by the local authorities acting under the authority derived from Orders in Council—the Privy Council deriving their authority from an Act of Parliament—in order to prevent the possibility of the disease being propagated by keeping the affected animals alive. But it will, I am sure, be in the recollection of the House and of those who have attended to the subject—and who is there among us who has not had his attention called to it from its extreme importance?—that the power thus given produced the greatest dissatisfaction throughout the country; that the strongest remonstrances were addressed to Government against that power of slaughter, and that throughout the press there was universal objection to adopt what was called a barbarous mode of extinction of this disease by means of the poleaxe, derogatory, it was said, to our veterinary skill and science, and unbecoming a civilized people, who ought, at all events, to try whether some mode of cure might not be discovered. For three months that Order of the Privy Council was in force, from about the 23rd of August to the third week in November. The Order was then not absolutely withdrawn, but it was modified to this extent—the power given to slaughter animals simply because they were affected by the disease was taken away, and it was limited to those cases in which the isolation of infected animals had been ordered and the order had been neglected or violated. Evidently the owner could not complain if, having neglected those orders, the animals were destroyed as a penalty for the violation of those Orders. It will be remembered that the Royal Commission reported against the power of slaughter. At that time the Royal Agricultural Society, I believe, entirely concurred in the opinion that that power ought not to be continued. Deputations, both from the Royal Agricultural Society and from the Farmers' Club, were received at the Privy Council Office, and I think both—I am certain that one—of those deputations expressed its entire concurrence in the limitation which was placed at that time on the power of slaughter, in deference to public opinion and to the recommendations of the Royal Commission. In speaking of the recommendations of the Royal Commission, I do not wish to be understood to say that they expressed an absolute opinion that slaughter was not the most effectual means of checking the disease; but they stated that, though it might have been effective at the early period of the disorder, they doubted its efficacy at a time when it had attained the head which it then had, and they thought it impossible to retain the power without giving compensation to the owners of the cattle slaughtered, and compensation from the public Treasury they deemed wholly impossible. Under those circumstances that Order was withdrawn, and I only allude to it now to show that there has been a very great change of opinion among those whose authority ought to have weight with this House.

Now, the main points upon which representations have been lately addressed to the Government, and by bodies entitled to the greatest consideration, are these—1. Compulsory slaughter, with compensation; 2. Absolute or qualified prohibition of the removal of cattle throughout Great Britain; 3. Isolation of suspected animals, and disinfection of infected premises; and 4. Regulations as to cattle brought by sea. There are, of course, many minor matters upon which it may be necessary to legislate, and to which the Orders of the Privy Council relate, and which those bodies hold to be of great importance; but these were the four principal points in their recommendations.

Now, let me call attention to what these recommendations are. I have had, as you may suppose, passing through my hands a great mass of correspondence both with public bodies and individuals on this subject; and I have had, during the last few days, the great advantage of receiving deputations of gentlemen who have come to state their views, and who have, I believe, been actuated by a sincere desire to assist in the solution of a question which they admitted was one of great difficulty. I now tender to them my thanks for the opinions which they have expressed to the Government, for the results of their own experience which they have communicated, and for the readiness with which they underwent a sort of cross-examination, which was resorted to in order that the Government, for its own information, might elicit with the greatest accuracy the opinions which they entertained. And, first, I will advert to the resolutions passed on the 7th of the present month—five days ago—by the Royal Agricultural Society. I may say that these resolutions were not formally brought to me by a deputation ; but, having been informed that members of the Agricultural Society had a meeting on that day, and had come to some resolutions, I requested that they, if there was no objection, would place the resolutions in my hands. That request was complied with—I think on the 9th. They have only this day been formally presented to the Government, but they have been in my hands for several days. With respect to slaughter, the Royal Agricultural Society, after adverting to the great evils of the cattle plague, and the insufficient measures hitherto adopted, state—

“ That no method of dealing with the cattle plague at the present time will be of any avail unless it provides for—1. The immediate slaughter and burial at least six feet deep of all cattle suffering from the disease, making compensation to the owners in such mode and to such extent as shall be considered advisable.”

About the same time—on the 8th of the present month—what was termed a conference of gentlemen connected with a large number of counties in England, and with some parts of Scotland, was held at St. James' Hall, where this subject was fully discussed. Previously to the meeting of that conference, the gentlemen by whom I believe it was convened wrote to me to know whether on the 9th of the present month, the day after the conference, it would be convenient for me to receive a deputation who would state the result of their deliberations. I was very glad to have the opportunity. They came, and were received by the President of the Council and myself, and they placed in our hands a series of resolutions which had been agreed to at the meeting. The third of their resolutions, relating to the slaughter of diseased animals, was—

“ That the immediate destruction of all plague-stricken animals and those in direct contact with them, and the complete isolation and official watching and control of all animals that have been within the influence of contagion, ought by Act of Parliament to be provided for.”

Another resolution passed at the conference was the following :—

“ That the partial remuneration of the owners of animals affected by those measures be provided by Act of Parliament.”

It will be observed that the resolutions passed by the Royal Agricultural Society and those adopted at the conference are identical, save in one particular. While the conference held that not only the animals suffering from disease, but also such animals as have been in contact with them ought to be slaughtered, it is the opinion of the Royal Agricultural Society that only the animals actually affected by the disease ought to be destroyed.

The next authorities to which I will refer are the Highland Society, and the Chamber of Agriculture and Scottish Farmers' Club. The Highland Society, the most influential association of the kind in Scotland, has at a recent meeting passed resolutions to the effect that killing the cattle actually diseased, and also those that have come in direct contact with them, was the only mode of extirpating the plague. The Chamber of Agriculture and Scottish Farmers' Club, another most influential association, has passed resolutions similar to those adopted by the Highland Society, and they have in addition sent a deputation to London, with a printed statement of their opinions, as the great importance of having all animals attacked by the plague destroyed at once. Another authority, and one of a different kind, is the opinion of the Association of Fleshers of Edinburgh. The third resolution, adopted at a general meeting of their body, is—

“ Should the plague break out in a farm, at once kill and bury the animal affected ; slaughter, also, all cattle that have been in immediate contact with any beast affected with the plague. Let the inspector in whose sight these operations are conducted make an inventory of the number and value of the remaining cattle. The inventory will afford means of preventing the removal of cattle affected, and may be useful in assessing future compensation if necessary. No cattle ought to be allowed to leave the affected farm alive until the lapse of such time from the last case of plague as may be considered safe.”

The paper embodying the opinion of the Chamber of Agriculture of Scotland is dated 13th December, but there is not the slightest doubt that they entertain similar opinions now. The agriculturists of several Scottish counties have also endeavoured, by the slaughter of all infected animals, to check the progress of the disease. This has been done, for instance, in Aberdeenshire, where a fund has been raised by voluntary assessment, by means of which all persons whose cattle have been slaughtered in consequence of the resolutions come to by the gentlemen and tenant-farmers of the country, are recompensed, thereby adopting a practice which they thought most conducive to their own interests and those of the public in checking the disease, and showing an example recommended by its success to the rest of the United Kingdom. There can be no doubt whatever that up to this period human skill has devised no method by which it can be asserted with any confidence that the cattle disease can be cured. I do not say that at a future period some means of cure may not be discovered; but what I say is that at present the disease has generally proved incurable, and that, therefore, the only possible course, by the adoption of which we can hope to check this most contagious disease, is the destruction of all animals affected by it. I shall now quote a few authorities with reference to the second question—a question of very great importance—the absolute or qualified prohibition of the removal of cattle throughout the country. The Agricultural Society say in their fifth resolution—

“That simultaneously with the destruction of diseased cattle the transit of all animals, whether by rail or road, be entirely prohibited, with,” they add, “such exceptions only as may absolutely be necessary.”

The expression of opinion on the part of the Conference at St. James' Hall, is contained in their first resolution. It would seem that the opinion of the meeting differed somewhat from that of the gentleman who proposed the resolution, and that, yielding to that opinion, he altered his resolution from its original form to that in which it now appears—

“Resolved, that the removal of all live cattle from one place in Great Britain to another over highways, and that the removal of all live cattle by railways through Great Britain, ought to be prohibited for a limited time.”

In the original resolution, after the word “highways,” occurred the words “except in uninfected counties,” but these words the proposer had expunged from the resolution at the wish of the meeting. On this point, I understood from the deputation that it meant that in no case should cattle be removed by road or railway, from the Land's End to the northernmost extremity of Scotland, not even in crossing a highway in going from one part of the farm to another. Upon this point the Scotch Chamber of Agriculture differs from the two English authorities I have quoted. They say they do not agree with the proposal made by the majority of the Royal Commissioners, that the butcher should go to the ox instead of the ox coming to the butcher (the necessary consequence, be it remembered, of the absolute prohibition asked for); and they think that such a course ought never to be adopted except in cases of urgent necessity. It is right to add that the gentlemen forming the deputation stated to me that, without being in any way authorized to qualify the opinion come to by the body which they represented, their individual opinions had since been, to a certain degree, modified. They accordingly added to the petition from the Chamber of Agriculture and Farmers' Club the following memorandum:—

“With reference to the question of the removal of healthy cattle for slaughter, the opinion of the Chamber of Agriculture and Scottish Farmers' Club, when assembled in Edinburgh on the 13th of December last, at a special and general meeting called to consider the cattle plague, and upon the resolutions passed at which their petition to Parliament was framed, was that healthy cattle which had not been in direct contact with diseased animals might be allowed, under proper certificate, to be sent to the Metropolitan or other licensed markets, or to slaughterhouses to be licensed for the purpose, and that no animal so sent should ever be removed alive from the police boundaries of the said licensed markets or slaughterhouses. The deputation believe that this is at present the opinion of the great majority of the practical farmers of Scotland. Since coming to London the deputation has had repeated interviews with the feeders and breeders of the midland counties, who maintain that the transit of live cattle without exception should be stopped for a limited time. The chief arguments in support of this are—1. That so long as live animals are allowed to be sent at all the risk from evasion of the regulations is great; 2. That disinfectant measures in connection with railway trucks, &c., cannot altogether be trusted to, and that no complete security can be afforded without the entire stoppage of transit for a time. The deputation is disposed now to think that more weight ought to be given to these arguments than has hitherto been done in Scotland. The deputation, on their part, think that all danger will not be avoided even were this course adopted, as slaughtering in general on the farms in Scotland will be carried out by the employment of butchers and material from the towns, who may be the means of carrying infection along with them. No doubt there is considerable difference between England and Scotland in the arrangement of farms and public highways, which last are more numerous, and in general intersect the land much more in England than in Scotland—thus exposing the English stockowner to greater hazard from the movement of cattle than the Scotch stockowner. But it is extremely desirable that any restrictive measure with regard to transit should apply to the whole of Great Britain without exception, as such would be more likely to be successful. The deputation have stated these views to the members of the conference, but did not consider it necessary to move an amendment to the resolution themselves, although they voted for the amendment moved by Mr. Snow, and seconded by Mr. Duncan (Scotland)—‘That healthy fat cattle, under proper restrictions, be allowed to go to market for immediate slaughter.’”

With regard to the prohibition of fairs and markets, I need not specially refer to that at present, because it is necessarily involved in the prohibition of removal. It is quite obvious that, if Parliament should decide that for a limited period the country must submit to the inconvenience of a strict prohibition of all removal of cattle from one place to another, no cattle fair or market could be held within that time.

The next point, in respect to which opinions have been expressed, I need not trouble the House with for a moment, because it only affects the steps to be taken for the cleansing and disinfecting of places where there has been disease, and for adopting precautions for preventing such places spreading the disease, upon which all are agreed. Very strict regulations are enforced by Order of the Privy Council on that subject, and we also propose that the Bill should contain regulations with reference to it.

The next point is one of considerable importance. It relates to cattle brought by sea into Great Britain. When we speak of cattle brought by sea into Great Britain, the House must remember we are speaking not of the importation of foreign cattle alone, as is generally understood, but of the introduction by sea of cattle from any place whatever, including Ireland, on which we are dependent for a very considerable portion of our supply. Therefore, when it is asked that cattle brought into this country by sea should be dealt with in a peculiar way, the communications made to the Government, or the resolutions expressing an opinion touching that subject, cannot be considered as relating exclusively to foreign cattle, but as embracing all cattle whatsoever coming by sea into the ports of Great Britain. But as, I am happy to say, Ireland at present is free from the disease, the restrictions proposed by this Bill will not apply to cattle imported from that country. The Royal Agricultural Society, in their sixth resolution on this question, recommend—"That during the existence of the cattle plague, all imported cattle, sheep, or swine shall be slaughtered forthwith at the port where they are landed; and their hides, skins, and offal disinfectured there."

The resolution passed at the conference held in St. James' Hall on this point was, "That all imported cattle be prohibited moving inland." I need not trouble the House with extracts from the statement embodying the views of the Scotch Agricultural Society, but I may say that they seem to doubt the possibility of this absolute prohibition of removal being effected immediately. I understand them to desire that it should be adopted if possible, but they intimate that if it should be found impracticable at the present moment, they think it would be expedient that imported animals should not go from place to place throughout the country, but that they should be allowed only to go to one market for the purpose of being slaughtered. There is another point to which I wish to advert before I state the proposals of the Government, and that is the agency by which it is proposed that this measure should be carried into effect. The resolutions of some of the bodies to which I have referred are silent on this head; but the Scotch agricultural body express their opinion fully on this subject, and suggest what appears to me to be a very sensible and judicious mode of enforcing by local agency whatever regulations may be made. The Royal Agricultural Society asks that the Government should bring before Parliament a Bill directing and empowering quarter sessions to assemble immediately in order to carry out such regulations.

Now, Sir, before I state the provisions of the measure I am about to propose, I will first state what is its principle—a principle to which I hope the House may be disposed to assent. It is that we should lay down by law certain general rules applicable to the whole country, from which no local authority should be empowered to depart. Next, that we should make use of the local authorities throughout the country for the purpose of enforcing these rules and others that may be made under the powers which I am about to mention; and, thirdly, that we should give the local authorities a discretion as to regulations to provide effectual means for dealing with this matter, according to the varying circumstances of the different parts of the country of which circumstances those local authorities possess a knowledge which the Government cannot possibly possess, and which the Government could not acquire even if it sent agents of its own into the country. We must depend, if we would grapple effectually with this evil, upon the zealous, cordial, and intelligent co-operation of the local authorities throughout the kingdom. First, then, we propose that the local authorities shall give effect to the provisions of the Bill, and shall consist, as now in England, of the quarter sessions for counties, and in boroughs of the mayors and town councils; while in Scotland they will be the body of magistrates who manage the affairs of the Scotch counties very much in the same manner as is done by the quarter sessions in England, modified, however, in accordance with Scotch opinion, and a suggestion which we think a sound one, which will be embodied in a clause prepared by the Lord Advocate. It is proposed to make it imperative on those local authorities, having appointed officers to give effect to the regulations to cause to be slaughtered all infected animals within their districts. On this point we do not propose to allow them to exercise any discretion at all, but we require them directly, through their own officers, to cause every animal ascertained to be infected with this disease to be slaughtered. With regard to animals not actually infected with the disease, but which have been in contact with others that are infected, or in such contiguity with them as to raise the presumption that they may probably be attacked by the disease, and be the means of conveying it to other animals, we do not propose to make it imperative on the local authorities that they should be slaughtered, but, taking a middle course between the recommendations of the Royal Agricultural Society and that of the conference at St. James' Hall, we propose that power should be given to the local authorities, acting upon the special circumstances of each case and according to the probability of the infection being spread, to direct that animals of that class also shall be slaughtered. We propose, likewise, to adopt a recommendation which I believe has been unanimously made—namely, that the principle of compensation for the animals so slaughtered, whether belonging to one or the other of these two categories, should be admitted. But we propose to adopt a difference in the amount of compensation given in respect of animals ordered to be slaughtered when infected, as the disease must materially affect their value, and that given in respect of animals not infected, but only slaughtered by order of the local authorities to prevent the possibility of contagion. It is proposed that the rate of compensation should in the first case not exceed two-thirds of the value of the animal, provision being made by which the local authorities may ascertain the value, and that in no instance should the amount of compensation exceed £20. In the second case, we take the same scale as has been adopted in Aberdeenshire with respect to healthy cattle—namely, that the compensation shall not exceed three-fourths of the value of the animal, or a maximum sum of £25. As to the fund from which the compensation money shall be derived, I pass that point by for the present. I may state that we make it compulsory on the local authorities by officers of their own to require all animals, either slaughtered by their order or dying of the disease, to be buried with certain precautions stated in the Bill, and with any others superadded to prevent the spread of contagion, and likewise to require the places in which such animals have been kept to be disinfected, and no fresh beasts to be taken there until such places have been declared to be free from risk.

I now come to the question of removal of cattle. It is not easy to frame regulations which, with a due regard to all the interests concerned, and different circumstances in the country, we think we can recommend to the House. We have, after much consideration, come to the following resolution:—The principle which we propose to the House with respect to removal from one place to another, is not the principle of an absolute and unqualified prohibition of removal to the extent which I said just now the Government have been asked to adopt throughout the whole of Great Britain—not to impose a certain statutory prohibition of universal application on removal, but to leave it open, subject to this statutory restriction, for the local authorities to make regulations varying according to the varying circumstances of different parts of the country. It is impossible to apply one iron rule to the whole of Great Britain, from the Land's End to the North of Scotland, which would of course be the effect of Parliament's laying an absolute interdiction upon all movement of cattle along any high road, even although that high road divided different portions of the same farm, involving also the shutting up every cattle market throughout the kingdom. Why, there are—thank God!—large districts of the country which are yet quite free from the disease; and regulations which may be right and even essential in districts where the disease is rife, or adjoining districts where it rages with virulence, would be an intolerable vexation and an unnecessary interference in counties situated perhaps 100 or even 200 miles away from any centre of infection. Take the case of Cheshire, one of the counties which have been most severely visited by this plague. From the accounts we have received parts of that county have been nearly desolated. But surely you would not have one and the same inflexible rule applied to such counties as Cheshire and counties wholly free from the disease, such, for example, as Caithness, Sutherland, Ross-shire, Orkney, and others? We have therefore come to the conclusion that this is a course which we could not recommend to the House for its adoption. I have said that this proposal, too, involves the stoppage of every market throughout the country. It involves, in point of fact—to put it in another way—the immediate—for there is no time to be allowed—substitution throughout the whole of Great Britain, in every city, town, and village, of a supply of dead for a supply of live meat. Absolute prohibition implies, also, as a necessary consequence, the slaughter of healthy animals, not with those professional appliances and that professional skill which make the operation, on sanitary grounds, safe, but without the means of effecting that slaughter properly, or of having the carcasses duly hung up to dry. This must be the case if it were provided that the animals should be killed on every farm, whether large or small, or on the premises, in which they may be in towns. On this subject I am anxious to read a portion of a letter to which I referred the other night, and which was addressed to me some little time ago by Mr. Henry Thompson, a gentleman well known to many of us for his having sat in this House as representative for the borough of Whitby. He was one of the deputation of the Agricultural Society, to the Privy Council in December, and he urged that very stringent regulations must be made throughout the country with reference to the removal of cattle. In this letter he says—

“Having been elected Chairman of the Committee appointed to draw up a Report containing suggestions for the regulation of the cattle traffic in the West Riding, and having carried our Report, which was based on the recommendations submitted to Lord Granville and yourself last month by a deputation from the Royal Agricultural Society, I think you may like to hear briefly the reasons for our decisions, especially as you will be strongly urged to issue a general Order of the Council placing the whole country under one uniform system. In the first place I may mention that, as Chairman of the Cattle Plague Committee of Magistrates, I have placed myself in communication with the mayors of all the corporate towns in the West Riding, and have received numerous letters from them, as well as from secretaries of local agricultural associations, farmers, butchers, &c. As chairman of a railway company permeating a great part of all three Ridings, I have also great facilities for ascertaining the feelings and opinions of all classes on this question, and I have taken some pains to turn those facilities to account. The result of my inquiries is a strong conviction that, notwithstanding the widespread panic which exists, and has in many cases led even sober-minded men like the magistrates of the North Riding to pass very extreme restrictions, the bulk of the thoughtful, business-like men of this county are in favour of the system which we have adopted in the West Riding, and which may be briefly characterized as a system which gives every facility for sending cattle to slaughter both to public markets and to private slaughterhouses, but does not allow them to leave such market town, or butcher's shop, alive. The check which we have applied consists in requiring that a licence should be obtained from one magistrate before the cattle can be moved at all; but it is clearly understood that these licences will be freely granted where there is no reason to suppose that the cattle to be moved are from infected farms. If, instead of such a system as this, the rigidly prohibitive system now in force in the North Riding be adopted, all cattle must be slaughtered at home, and this I am persuaded will greatly tend to spread the infection. There are numerous other objections to the prohibitive code, such as the great additional loss inflicted on farmers by being compelled to sell their cattle at home, and the entire absence of all check on the slaughtering of diseased cattle, and the sale consequently of diseased meat to the public, which are the inevitable results of private slaughtering in detached farmhouses. I have had a case already within five miles of my house in the North Riding, where a butcher from one of the sea-ports slaughtered all the cattle still alive on a farm where more than half of the herd had already died of the plague. The meat was carried to a distance, and if challenged when brought to market for being soft and discoloured the answer would be ready, ‘The animals had to be killed at a farmhouse without any proper conveniences, and where the carcasses could not be left to cool, but were obliged to be cut up and carried over bad roads before they had time to stiffen; the meat must consequently be soft and bruised.’ I will not occupy your time by discussing the numerous other objections that might be urged, but press as strongly as I can the objection to killing at home—namely, that butchers will wander from farm to farm in search of cattle, that a perfect army of inspectors could not prevent their occasionally killing diseased cattle, either knowingly, in consequence of their cheapness, or unknowingly being taken in by the almost unlimited power of deception possessed by farmers on their own premises. After killing these animals they will visit other farms and spread the infection far and wide. I trust, therefore, that if Government decide to adopt one uniform system for the whole country they will leave the markets in our great towns open for the sale and slaughter of cattle under reasonable restrictions, enacting, however, that they shall not leave the place alive. The masses in the West Riding are well employed just now at good wages, and working men with money in their pockets will have good beef.”

This letter is dated the 13th of January; but I have since then been in communication with Mr. Thompson. He was a member of a deputation which waited on me on Friday last, from the West Riding. After that deputation withdrew he came back into the room, and when I told him that I proposed to read the substance of his letter to the House, his answer was that he had not in any way changed the opinion there expressed. I will now, with the permission of the House, refer for a moment to the practice adopted by the different local authorities on this point; and I speak in particular of the local authorities in counties, because I know it is supposed that the inhabitants of towns have a great interest in keeping the markets open. The magistrates at quarter sessions have, by the regulations they have made, in most instances, shown the most earnest desire to take effectual measures to stamp out the disease, but they have in almost all cases allowed the movement of cattle, under certain restrictions, and in some cases have allowed markets to be held in certain places for the sale of fat cattle. What, for example, has been done by the magistrates of the West Riding of Yorkshire, which is not only a great agricultural district, but which also comprises a large commercial population? They have adopted this system of having open markets in particular towns. They have themselves singled out certain places—such as Huddersfield and a few others, which, not having corporations, are under the jurisdiction of the justices—to which, as possessing all the appliances for slaughtering cattle, they allow fat cattle to go to be there slaughtered. From these towns the meat finds its way into the consumption of the surrounding country, while the evils generated by a system of unskilful slaughter are obviated. Again, the Scotch Chamber of Agriculture have expressed their opinion on the subject, and that opinion is, I believe, approved by Scottish agriculturists generally. [Sir JAMES FERGUSSON: The Highland Society.] The Highland Society may wish for absolute and universal prohibition for a limited time; but, if so, they differ from the Chamber of Agriculture. If that system be adopted what will happen? Liverpool is a great port of entry for Irish cattle, and one effect of the adoption of such a system would be that the whole of those cattle would be slaughtered in Liverpool immediately upon their arrival. I asked one of the deputation which I received the other day if any member of it represented the great manufacturing towns? No such gentleman was present; but a gentleman who attended on behalf of one of the agricultural associations of Lancashire, admitted that there does not exist in Liverpool at the present moment the requisite means for slaughtering animals, with a due regard to the public health and the quality of the meat, to such an extent as to enable it to supply the wants of all those districts which are now supplied by the live meat which passes through it. What we propose, therefore, is as follows, and will be applicable to the whole country. At present no prohibition or restriction exist with respect to the removal of cattle, except where measures are taken by the local authorities. We do not think that is right; we think that every local authority, under the present circumstances of the country, ought to be called upon to take some action, and to carry out certain regulations. We propose, then, in the first place, to adopt a provision which has, I believe, been almost universally adopted by the magistrates at quarter sessions—that no cattle shall, for a limited time, be removed along the highway by night throughout Great Britain. We are told that there have been evasions of the regulations as to removal, and the only way to avoid that is to make removal by night penal. We also propose to enact a general prohibition against moving cattle at all, either along the highway or by railway, except by virtue of licences to be granted by the local authorities, and under general rules calculated to insure safety against the propagation of infection. That system is already in operation through the agency of courts of quarter sessions in counties, and has worked extremely well. The course adopted in some counties is, that if a farmer proposes to move his cattle he must apply to a magistrate, who only gives his licence on the production of a declaration signed by the owner of the animals proposed to be removed, and also by two farmers whose rental shall not be less than £200 each, certifying that they have within a limited period—two or three days—inspected the animals and the premises in which they are kept; that the cattle are perfectly healthy; that no disease exists at or within a certain distance of the place from and to which it is proposed to remove them, or within a certain distance from the line of the route along which they are to be moved. The cattle under the licence can only be moved along that line of route, and the person in charge of them is bound to produce the licence to any proper authority demanding the same. If he removes the cattle by any other route, or fails to produce the licence, he is treated as if he had none. We purpose to adopt the principle of these regulations. Great inconvenience has been produced by the state of the law with regard to the violation of these Orders. The Act of Parliament under which Orders of the Privy Council are made impose a penalty of £20 upon those who violate them, but the only mode of enforcing the Orders is by summoning the offenders, in order that they be dealt with according to law. Cases, however, have arisen in which persons who have been found driving cattle along the highways have refused to give their names, and the police being unable to follow them in all cases to their place of destination they have escaped, although there could be no doubt they were violating the Orders in Council. We propose to give power to arrest persons who are found violating the law and to take them before the nearest magistrate. The cattle, too, may be detained, and the magistrate may order them to be destroyed without any claim for compensation. We trust that by this summary power we shall better enforce obedience to the law. We further propose to give certain statutory powers to the district authorities to declare by public notice any place in which the disease exists to be an infected place; but when that district is declared to be infected no discretion as to the rules to be enforced will be permitted—there is to be no ingress or egress of cattle, hides, manure, and certain other articles which might carry infection to other places, until such place has been declared by the same local authorities to be free from disease. As to all other places, we propose to continue the power of the local authorities to prohibit the introduction of cattle subject, of course, to the general regulations applicable to the whole country.

I now come to the question of fairs and markets. If the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) should raise the question of absolute prohibition, it will be easy to do so at the end of the clause referring to this subject. If that should be adopted no markets would be held. Assuming, however, that the scheme we propose with qualified prohibition will be adopted by the House, I will state the course we propose to take in regard to fairs and markets. All fairs and markets of lean and store cattle for a limited time are to be absolutely prohibited. [An hon. MEMBER: Everywhere?] Yes, throughout Great Britain. [An hon. MEMBER: In the metropolis?] The Metropolitan Market is already closed against store cattle, and has been so for some months. The proposed enactment will have little practical operation, because I believe there is not a market in the country for lean and store cattle which is not closed by the action of the local authorities. The only markets at present open are those for the sale of fat cattle. We also propose in this case that the local authorities shall act in the first instance, and that no market for fat cattle for immediate slaughter shall be held without the licence of the local authorities. One condition we propose as indispensable, that fat cattle brought to any market shall not be allowed, whether sold or not, to leave the place alive within which the market is held or to which it belongs. We propose, in fact, that there shall be only one removal. The cattle are to be marked on entering the market, and whether they are sold or not, they will be detained until they are killed. This Order is now in force in the Metropolitan Cattle Market. The number of animals sent to the Metropolitan Market is very much diminished, and we are satisfied that this Order may be safely made in the metropolis as well as elsewhere. We propose that it shall be put in force as to the metropolis within the limits of the Metropolitan Board of Works, that being the area over which, if a corporation existed, its jurisdiction would probably extend. An Order was made last week that no cattle should be removed from the metropolis alive, and the effect of this provision will be that, whether the animals are sold or not, they can only be removed to the slaughterhouse. The whole traffic in live cattle from the Metropolitan Market by railway—which has been much complained of—has been stopped, and this prohibition will be retained in the Bill. We did not make the same Order for all the markets in the country, as we thought it better to make the proposal to Parliament, in the presence of representatives of all the interests concerned. The effect of the regulations we propose is, that markets may still be held in certain places, from which the surrounding districts may be supplied with dead meat, but that no cattle sent to any such market shall leave the place alive.

Sir George Grey

One of the resolutions of the Royal Agricultural Society refers to the necessity of insuring some co-operation between the authorities of counties and boroughs. Representations have been made, which are entitled to great weight, of the interference with the regulations of the magistrates of counties as to fairs and markets by the separate and independent jurisdiction exercised in towns by mayors and town councils. In certain cases where the boroughs are not large, or where the area of the borough jurisdiction extends a considerable way into the country, the regulations made by the magistrates are rendered comparatively useless by the continuance of markets and fairs within these boroughs. The question is a very difficult one to deal with. There is a sensitive feeling on the part of the municipal authorities on this point; but we think that the representations made are well-founded; and to correct this evil without interfering with boroughs having large populations, such as Liverpool, Manchester, and others, with a population exceeding 40,000, we propose that fairs and markets shall not be held in a borough without the concurrent licence of the magistrates of the county in which the borough is situated; and, where the borough adjoins several counties, without the concurrent licence of all the counties adjacent. [Mr. HUNT: What do you propose to do with respect to railways?] We propose that railways shall be subject to the general regulations as to removal, so far as relates to cattle taken to or brought from stations. If an owner wants to remove his cattle by railway he must comply with the same regulations as if he removed them to any other place. But, when the cattle are upon the railway, the owner may remove them through one jurisdiction to another, no intermediate authority being empowered to stop animals going with a licence from the proper authority from one place to another, which is open to their reception.

The removal of cattle by sea is a matter of great importance, not merely in a temporary but in a permanent point of view. It is impossible to trace the actual origin of the disease in this country, but from its similarity to the disease which ravaged our herds in the last century, and to that which now prevails in some parts of the Continent, it is probable it was brought to this country from some part of Europe by cattle brought into London or other ports. Therefore, this is a matter of permanent importance. It may be necessary hereafter to lay down permanent rules with respect to cattle brought by sea into this country, but I will now state what we propose to do at present, and for a limited period. The amount of importation just now is smaller than at other times of the year. As a temporary measure, we propose that the other ports in the country into which cattle are brought from any part of Great Britain or from abroad should be placed on the same footing as London as to the prohibition to remove the cattle from the place where imported. With regard to that prohibition, the remark I made just now as to Liverpool occurs again—there may not perhaps be the necessary facilities at some of those ports to slaughter all the animals brought into them; but it must be remembered that the importation into other ports is small. London is the great port of importation, and in London facilities for the purpose I have mentioned exist. Therefore, we think that for a limited time the House may be asked to sanction the regulation that cattle should be slaughtered at the port to which they are brought, and that the dead meat only should be removed. If the owner should be unwilling to agree to such a regulation, he would be at liberty to re-embark the cattle; but if they should be re-embarked and taken to another port, they would, of course, be subject to the same regulation there. We do not intend, however, that this regulation should apply to Irish cattle, because we know that Ireland is free from the disease. The Irish cattle come chiefly to Liverpool and ports near it, or to Bristol; and if they go into the markets where there are other beasts they must be subject to the general regulation as to slaughter, but if not taken into the market, they may be taken by rail to other places where there are licensed markets for slaughter. By this means a large amount of meat is conveyed to towns in Lancashire and Yorkshire which depend much on Irish cattle for the supply of that food.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU asked, with regard to store cattle from Ireland, if they would be allowed to be sent to the graziers in England?

SIR GEORGE GREY: There is no provision expressly applying to that subject, but the restrictions in force in any district will apply to this class of cattle. The Bill will be limited as to the time of its operation, and will continue in force until the 1st of July, 1867. Some of the provisions, however, will be limited to a shorter period—namely, two months, with power given to the Queen in Council to extend by Order in Council those special provisions from time to time. At present we propose that they should continue in force until the 15th of April. It is impossible to speak with any certainty as to the effect of these regulations, but we hope they may produce the desired effect. If, unhappily, it should be necessary to continue them for a longer period, it would be inconvenient on every occasion to apply to Parliament for power to continue them, and therefore we think that Parliament would do well to give to the Queen in Council the power to extend any of these special regulations for a longer period.

I will not detain the House by specifying the various regulations to which I have referred respecting, among other matters, the disinfection and cleansing of railway trucks in which beasts are carried. I must, in justice to the Government, say that the Bill introduced in 1864, which was prepared in the Home Office, and which was referred to a Select Committee, which contained provisions for ensuring the proper treatment of cattle and proper care in their movement failed, in consequence of the opposition of the agricultural interest and of those concerned in the cattle trade. ["No, no!"] The hon. Gentleman the Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) says "No!" and I must certainly do him the justice to say that he was not a consenting party to its being dropped, but he was unfortunately absent when this course was taken, in consequence of the nearly unanimous wish of the Committee. My hon. Friend will, at a later period, introduce a Bill on the subject, and I hope that it will receive a favourable consideration, and that the regulations made on the subject will be of a permanent character. There are also regulations to be enforced with respect to the destruction of manure and other articles which have been connected with diseased cattle. They are included in the Orders of the Privy Council, but will also be embodied in this Bill. There is also a power given to local authorities to extend the regulations in their districts to other animals besides cattle. On this point there is great difference of opinion, and there is a difficulty in acting uniformly in the matter, owing to the different circumstances of different parts of the country. For instance, the effect of subjecting sheep to the same stringent regulations as cattle would be in some parts starvation to the flocks and ruin to the farmer. We therefore leave that matter, as now, optional with the local authorities, believing that they will act with a due regard to the different circumstances of their respective counties. We propose to remove the doubts which have arisen in reference to the penalties, under the existing Act of Parliament. Under that Act there is a penalty of £20 for every breach of the Orders of Privy Council; and the question has arisen, whether the penalty is cumulative—whether in the case of a herd driven on a road, or a truck load conveyed by railway, it is leviable per head for each beast, or only leviable for the whole number. The advice given to magistrates has been that they might lay a separate information for each separate head of cattle, convict upon each, and leave the persons fined to ask, if they chose, for a case to be stated to the Queen's Bench. We propose in the present Bill to retain the penalty of £20 in the case of any number of cattle not exceeding four in number; but if the herd should consist of a greater number, then the penalty of £5 should attach to each head of cattle. The case, I am told, has actually occurred of the drover of a large quantity of cattle crossing the border from Scotland to England tendering payment of the penalty of £20, which he thought it worth his while to pay, to enable him to move the cattle. It is to meet such cases that this provision has been introduced.

We propose, also, to afford facilities for holding general sessions for the purposes of this Bill. I addressed a circular to the chairmen of quarter sessions, suggesting that, in order to obviate the inconvenience which might arise from the transfer of powers from the petty to quarter sessions, owing to the infrequency of the meetings of quarter sessions, they should exercise the power of adjournment from time to time, as has been often done in some counties. From one county I had a letter addressed to me almost immediately after the holding of the quarter sessions, telling me that they had not adjourned, and asking for an Order of the Privy Council to correct an error they had committed. I said, in reply, the proper course would be to convene the general sessions, as they had not adjourned. But the law on the subject of convening general sessions is obscure. I believe the law is that a notice of a fortnight or three weeks must be given before they can be held; they must be convened on an application to the lord-lieutenant; and they must be subject to all the incidents of an ordinary session; so that it would be necessary to summon jurors from all parts of the county, as if they were about to deal with ordinary sessions business. We propose, that for the purposes of this Bill, permission should be given to two magistrates to convene a general sessions. We further propose that local authorities should be enabled to form committees, with power of performing the duties imposed on the local authorities by virtue of this Act. This has been proposed in Scotland, and it has already been adopted in some counties, among others, in the county, I believe, which you, Sir, represent. It has been suggested, and I think it a useful suggestion, that there should be associated with committees of the local authority other persons, such as tenant-farmers. With this view the Lord Advocate has prepared a clause as to Scotland, which will be embodied in the Bill. We propose to enable the local authorities to do the same in England. The only restriction will be that such persons shall be rated occupiers within the district for which they are to act. It is also desirable that facilities should be given for combined action. The law has already recognized this principle. Counties may unite with counties or with boroughs for certain purposes, such as the building of asylums and other objects of public utility. This combined action is effected by means of a joint committee, and we propose that the same power shall be given to counties or boroughs to appoint a joint committee for the purposes of this Act.

I now come to what I must admit to be one of the most difficult parts of the subject with which we have to deal, and with reference to which I cannot lead the House to suppose that we can deal with it in a manner altogether satisfactory to ourselves; for every mode of dealing with it which has been suggested seems open to difficulties. At first the objections appeared nearly insurmountable; but we have been led to the adoption of that course which, on the whole, after much consideration, appeared most practicable, though not free from objection. I refer to the fund for compensating the losses sustained by animals slaughtered by order of the local authorities, and for paying the expenses of giving effect to this Bill. On this subject we have not been much assisted by those bodies from whom we have received really valuable assistance on other points, and it is not unnatural that they should wish not to commit themselves to any specific proposal. The large deputation we received from the conference held in St. James' Hall, which was said to represent forty-four counties of England and Scotland, distinctly said they had no opinion to offer on that subject. They left it to the consideration of the Government and the wisdom of Parliament. There were members of that deputation who did express an opinion, but it was only an individual opinion. As far as the conference went, no resolution on the subject was come to, and we are quite in the dark as to what they thought the best mode of raising the fund for compensation. But the Royal Agricultural Society, in one of those resolutions to which I alluded just now, distinctly point to the county rate as the source out of which the fund ought to be provided. The Scotch Chamber of Agriculture and the Highland Society suggest that a portion of the fund should be derived from local sources, and a portion from the public funds. There have been other suggestions pointing to local funds, and admitting the great objection there is to look to the Consolidated Fund for compensations for losses of this kind; but no very specific or definite proposal has been made, except that of the county rate for counties, and the borough rate for towns. The objections to charging the Consolidated Fund with these expenses appear to us conclusive. The principle of applying to the public fund to compensate for private losses is in itself a very dangerous one to admit. Even in the case to which I alluded the other night of the very limited compensation granted from the Consolidated Fund in the last century, much fraud and recklessness were found to result from it, and it should operate as a warning rather than an encouragement to repeat the experiment. The Commissioners in their first report were unanimously of opinion that this principle was altogether inadmissible. We have had also from Scotland the proposal that the rate should be laid on lands and hereditaments—which is similar to what a county rate would be in England—and that that rate should be equally divided between the owner and the occupier. We are indebted to the hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. Banks Stanhope) for the suggestion he made the other night, which showed that he was actuated by the sincere desire of contributing to the solution of the difficulties connected with this subject, and not by any desire to find fault, although he was perfectly entitled to criticize the conduct of the Government in the course they had pursued. The principle on which his proposal was founded, I believe, is perfectly sound—namely, that the losses occasioned by the slaughter of diseased animals, and the expenses requisite for carrying into effect the provisions of the law for checking the disease, ought to be borne to a certain extent by the whole community, because the whole consuming and producing population are interested in checking the disease; but that a special burden may be fairly thrown upon those on whom the loss primarily and immediately falls. He proposed, therefore—and in principle it is what we recommend—that in counties the county rate should furnish part of the fund out of which the compensation should come, and in boroughs, the borough rate; that the proportion in which the burden should fall on these funds should be two-thirds, and that the remaining one-third should be borne by the cattle owners. No doubt it will be difficult to give effect to these provisions. We have prepared clauses with this object, which are probably not free from objection; but the House will be called upon to decide whether the principle be a sound one, and whether it be practicable to give effect to it. What we propose is, 1. that a cattle rate should be imposed on all cattle one year old and upwards; 2. that the rate should not exceed in any one year 5s. a head in respect of such cattle; 3. that the rate may be levied at intervals of time not less than three months; 4. that the local authorities shall be enabled to require a return of the greatest number of cattle possessed by any person within their district on any one day before the return, for the purpose of assessment; 5. that any person making a false return shall be liable to a penalty of £20 and double the amount of rate; 6. that the rate shall be collected by persons appointed by the local authorities; and 7 and 8. give an appeal to any person aggrieved to the petty sessions in the first instance; and thence to the quarter sessions. The Bill also gives a power to the local authority, where the rate exceeds a certain amount, to borrow money from private sources, or from the Public Works Loan Commissioners, with the sanction of the Treasury, repayable in instalments within a period not exceeding seven years. On consideration connected with the imposition of this cattle rate is that those who have been the great losers by the cattle plague will not be called on to pay it, except on their remaining cattle. The cattle rate will, therefore, operate as a species of insurance on those animals to be hereafter slaughtered by order of the local authority; but, with regard to the county rate, we have felt the hardship of imposing the rate on all occupiers of farms, however severely they may have been visited by the cattle plague, and however ruinous the losses they may have sustained. We think it right, therefore, to submit to the House a proposal, I admit doubtful in principle, and difficult to give effect to in practice, but in principle almost essentially connected with the imposition of the rate, that where before the passing of this Act any person shall have suffered so great a loss of cattle by the plague, in respect of which he is not entitled to any compensation under this Act, as to entitle him in the opinion of the local authority to remission of the whole or any part of the rate, the local authority may make such remission. This will be a question for the consideration of the House. I have thought it right to mention it because it is a new principle except as applied to the remission of poor rates in the case of persons too poor to pay. [Mr. BAILLIE COCHRANE: Will the compensation be retrospective?] Yes. We propose that the compensation shall be retrospective in respect of animals slaughtered by order of inspectors appointed by the local authority and acting under authority derived from the Orders in Council, while the Order for slaughter remains in force.

I think I have now stated all the main provisions of the Bill. There is a great deal of detail in it, and it may be necessary to add to its provisions; but at present we confine ourselves to those which we think essential under the present circumstances of the country. Some of them may be considered more immediately requisite than others, and it might be advisable, if such be the opinion of the House, that the Bill should be divided into two parts, and that those provisions to which a general assent is given should be passed at once. I do not now propose that course, because I think the House will be better able to consider it when hon. Members have seen the Bill, which, I hope, will be in their hands to-morrow, though not, I fear, at the ordinary time for the delivery of Parliamentary documents. The Bill is already in print and undergoing revision, but I think it better to delay its presentation till to-morrow afternoon. With regard to Scotland, I will only observe that several clauses have been prepared by the Lord Advocate which will apply to that country. I have not touched fully on them because I am not so conversant with the laws and practice of Scotland; but if in the discussion of those clauses any explanation should be required my right hon. and learned Friend will afford it. As to Ireland, I stated the other night the course which the Government have hitherto taken. I have had frequent communication on the subject with the Irish Government; and though the disease does not at present exist in Ireland, we have thought that a Bill ought to be prepared for that country which, though not different in principle from the English one, will be different in its details, in consequence of the difference of the circumstances of the two countries. My right hon. Friend the Attorney General and my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland are now preparing such a Bill for the consideration of the Lord Lieutenant and the Government. With respect to the committees which are to be formed by the local authorities, it is important that I should point out that under the Bill they will be executive committees only, and that they will have no power of imposing a rate. As to the time of the second reading of the Bill, I am quite in the hands of the House. All I can say is, that the Government are desirous the Bill should be read a second time as soon as possible; and therefore, if the House will allow me, I will fix the second reading for Wednesday. If, after seeing the Bill, the House should be of opinion that further time would be desirable, of course it will be impossible for me to ask them to read it a second time on Wednesday; but I would request the House to allow me to fix it for that day, in the hope that we may consider it de die in diem, with the view of passing at least the more important provisions with the least possible delay. I thank the House for the patience with which they have listened to me. I have ventured to state the general principles of the measure, and I hope that when hon. Members shall have had an opportunity of seeing the Bill, they will be of opinion that it is calculated to check, as far as possible, the extension of this great calamity.

MR. HUNT wished to know from the right hon. Gentleman whether he proposed that in all the counties throughout Great Britain, independently of the will of the local authorities, animals should not be removed by railway without a licence.

SIR GEORGE GERY: We propose that they shall not be put on a railway without a licence, the conditions of which are to be prescribed by the local authorities; but this will not apply to cattle passing through. Thus, if cattle should be passing through Northamptonshire, the magistrates would not have power to stop them in transitu. Will the House permit me to observe that I made inquiries as to the form in which this Bill should be brought in, and I found that the Bill giving authority on these matters to the Privy Council was brought in not in Committee, but on leave asked in the ordinary form. The two Bills of 1864 were also brought in without a Committee. I believe the only case in which a Bill of this nature was introduced in Committee was that of a Bill affecting the importation of cattle. This Bill does not affect importation. It only affects foreign cattle after they are brought into this country, and then it deals with them just as it does with cattle from any part of Great Britain. I have, however, just received an intimation on the subject. I do not know whether it has come from you, Sir, but if there be the slightest doubt on the matter, I presume the House will allow me to alter the form of the Motion. I therefore move, Sir, that you do leave the Chair, and that the House do go into Committee to consider the Cattle Diseases Act.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. BRIGHT wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether in cases of compensation each county would be independent within its own boundary; or whether the funds of all the counties would be put into one joint fund for general assistance throughout the country.

SIR GEORGE GREY replied, that the funds would be locally raised and locally distributed. When he spoke of a Joint Committee, he did not mean one to act for the whole country in respect of funds. He might observe that a strong opinion had been expressed in favour of those funds being locally raised and locally administered.

MR. GEORGE CORNWALL LEGH asked whether power would be given to the local authorities to superintend the burial of cattle condemned and destroyed. In the county which he had the honour to represent (North Cheshire) the cattle are dying at the rate of 700 or 800 a week, and unless great powers were given to the quarter sessions he feared the mode of disposing of the carcasses might occasion danger.

SIR GEORGE GREY replied, that one of the provisions of the Bill required that in every case, whether of an animal which had been slaughtered in consequence of being affected with the disease, or of an animal which had died of the disease, an Order was to be issued for the burial of such animal. There was also a provision giving local authorities power to acquire land in which to bury diseased cattle. This latter provision had been introduced in consequence of persons having refused to allow diseased animals to be buried on their land.

MR. WATKIN inquired whether the Bill proposed to tax property in the towns and counties for the purposes of the Act.

SIR GEORGE GREY replied, that the incidence of the county rate would apply as in any other case. It might not be necessary in some cases to make a new rate, because in some counties the expenses under the Act might be very small. In others it might be necessary to levy a new rate, and it was clearly intended that it should be levied in accordance with the ordinary incidence.

Motion agreed to.

Cattle Diseases Act in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Moved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to contagious or infectious diseases in Cattle and other animals. —(Sir George Grey.)

MR. HUNT: I feel that I have taken a very unusual course in giving notice that I should, notwithstanding the announcement of the Government measure, move for leave to introduce a Bill on the same subject, but the circumstances of the case are very peculiar, and I trust the Committee will think they are such as justify me in the course I have taken. We have been for weeks and months using every endeavour to induce the Government to take some decisive step to check the cattle plague. Gentlemen who take a great interest in this question have besieged the Home Office with deputations from public bodies—they have approached the Government with entreaties—they have used every means in their power to urge the Government to more prompt action in what they believe to be a great emergency, but up to the time of the meeting of Parliament, without effect. They have to a certain extent dragged the Government on step by step. Inch by inch—by Orders in Council coming out about once a month—power was given to the country gentlemen to regulate the movement of cattle, they all the time saying that they did not want that power, and asking the Government to take the responsibility upon themselves. And what was the state of things when Parliament met? From the speeches delivered by Members of the Government on the first night of the Session, the country was not led to expect that the Ministry would introduce any Bill worthy of the occasion. From the speech of the Secretary of State for the Home Department—I do not refer to the speech just delivered by the right hon. Gentleman—and the speech of the Under Secretary, I came to this conclusion—that the Government never have appreciated the magnitude of the calamity impending over the country. From the former speech of the right hon. Gentleman I gathered this—that in his opinion the calamity was only a partial one—that it only affected part of the community, the agricultural interest, but he appears now to have realized its magnitude. From the tone of the speeches addressed to the House on the occasion to which I refer, I was not satisfied that the Government would lay on the table a Bill worthy of the occasion. Under ordinary circumstances it would have been proper to wait and see what the measure was, and if it were not satisfactory to try to defeat it, and introduce one after the Government Bill had been disposed of. But time is of the greatest consequence in this case. Had I waited till the Government measure was on the table, and the House should not have been satisfied with it, I might have had to wait a whole week in order to prepare another. In this case a week is of vital consequence. It is under these circumstances I have taken the unusual course of announcing a measure in competition, if I might say so, to that which the Government were about to introduce. I have no party and no personal feeling about this matter. My sole object is to get the very best measure that can be devised, and to have it passed at the earliest opportunity. From the speech of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, I am convinced that the right hon. Gentleman has been educated in this matter by the deputations which have waited upon him during the last few days, and has begun to think it a more serious evil than he did before. The right hon. Gentleman has just announced a measure more stringent than he would have announced on the first night of the Session; but still it is not stringent enough. I must, therefore, ask leave of the Committee to place my own Bill upon the table, not necessarily with the view of its being proceeded with, because the Government Bill is a very complicated one, and I am not sure that I understand all its provisions. All I can say is that if, when the Government Bill is printed, it shall appear to be one which can be converted into such a measure as ought to be passed, I will give every assistance to the Government in passing the Bill after it has been properly amended. If, however, it should prove on examination to be a measure which will not satisfy the demands of the country, I shall ask leave to proceed with the Bill which I have asked leave to introduce. It would then be my duty to ask the House to reject the Government Bill and to accept my own. It has been my lot for some time past to spend nearly half of every week in considering what orders were to be issued in my own county, and I would ask hon. Members who have not bestowed so much attention on the subject to look at a map which I have asked permission to place in the Library of the House. On that map the centres of infection in this country are carefully marked, and, though there may be some defects in it, substantially it is correct. Now, I think that if any Member would look at that map he will be appalled at the state of the country. I maintain that this is not a question which affects the agricultural community alone. I represent a great grazing county (Northamptonshire), where there are hundreds of graziers whom ruin stares in the face. I protest against this question being considered as merely a local one, or as one affecting one interest in the country. When the agricultural interest suffers we all know that that of commerce, and of the great mass of the people, suffers also. For my own part, I believe that no calamity ever fell upon a large class which did not re-act upon every interest in the country. I would instance the cotton famine, though in my judgment that was far less a national question than the cattle plague, because the latter relates to the food of the people. I employ the term "food of the people" because it was used the other night by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who said he thought we ought to feel a difficulty in aiding the agricultural interests because we were dealing with "the food of the people." Now, in my opinion, that is the very reason why we ought to give the matter the gravest and earliest consideration. The question is one which will affect the animal food to be eaten by the people for a long period to come—it might be for the next ten or fifteen years. I would ask leave to read some statistics compiled by the veterinary department of the Privy Council respecting the progress of the disease. Up to the 4th of November last the number of cases of cattle plague reported to the Privy Council was 20,897. I have procured a list, week by week, of the number of cases which have occurred from that time to the present, and it shows the following figures:—In the first week, 3,194 cases; in the second, 3,341; in the third, 6,551; in the fourth, 5,731; in the fifth, 7,485; in the sixth, 8,187; in the seventh, 8,207; in the eighth, 9,956; in the ninth, 8,508; in the tenth, 12,199; in the eleventh, 12,842; and in the twelfth, 13,642. In the next week—being up to the third of February—the Return shows an apparent decrease, the number being 11,443; but it ought to be observed that there is a note appended to the Return to the effect that it is not to be trusted, because between 200 and 300 inspectors have failed to send in returns, and the officers of the Privy Council are of opinion that there has been no falling off whatever in the number of cases. I instance these figures to show that with the most stringent powers they will fail to arrest the disease if this is allowed to continue. I say "allowed to continue," because I believe much may now be done to check the disease. If Parliament had been called together two months ago, and Government had asked the House for powers to stamp out the disease, by preventing the removal of cattle from one quarter to another, they would have had them. If, however, they allow the disease to progress at this rate, it will soon become not only a question for the meat producer but the meat consumer. I ask the right hon. Gentleman not to think too much of the outcry which may be raised by the populations of large manufacturing towns. I have always thought it to be the duty of a statesman to put up with any amount of clamour if he feels that he is doing his duty to the country at large; and it is the duty of the right hon. Gentleman now to disregard any outcry from the meat-consuming centres of population, directed against the measures they may take for promoting the interests of every class. I do not, however, believe that there will be any outcry from the large manufacturing towns. I have a greater trust in the intelligence of the working classes than the right hon. Gentleman has, although he is going to give them the franchise, and I believe they will understand that if the present price of meat be raised by any Act we are going to pass it is for their interest in the future. I protest against starving the meat eaters of next year in order to satiate the meat eaters of this year. It will be necessary to put some restrictions upon meat now, in order that we may not be utterly dependent upon the foreigner for the next few years to come. The Bill of the Government is, as I stated before, extremely complicated in its details, and I may not have quite followed the right hon. Gentleman; but I confess that that portion of it which still leaves it permissive to the local authorities to adopt the general regulations did not appear to me satisfactory. Take the case of an infected county adjoining an uninfected county. In the latter the statutory regulations are not adopted. What is the consequence? Over the next hedge might be a case of cattle plague, and before the statutory regulations of this Bill are adopted the free county might become affected and the seeds of the disease spread throughout its whole length and breadth. Then we have the question of railroads; and whether I press on my own Bill or support that of the Government I shall do all in my power to prohibit altogether the removal of live stock by railway. I consider railway trucks, pens, and platforms are the surest means of infecting the cattle placed in them. I believe all the attempts hitherto made to disinfect them have utterly failed. There should be a clear month or more in which they should be entirely disused, and during that time they should be thoroughly cleansed and disinfected under official supervision. Until that is done we shall not have got rid of the most fruitful means of spreading this disease throughout the land. Then, again, with regard to the prohibition of traffic. The right hon. Gentleman has said that no county has yet absolutely prohibited the removal of cattle, without any exception.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I did not say that no county had prohibited removal. I said that almost all had allowed the movement of cattle to a certain extent. There may be one county which has prohibited it entirely, but I am not aware of it.

MR. HUNT: I was not going to contradict the right hon. Gentleman, but I understood him to say that all the counties allowed some movement of cattle.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Yes, and I used it as an argument to show that those gentlemen who are most conversant with the practice of counties, and who are quite as desirous of checking the disease as the hon. Gentleman, did not feel it right to enforce absolute prohibition.

MR. HUNT: That is done in my own county, with my consent, and I am myself responsible for the wording of the orders which are in force in Northamptonshire. But consider the position we were in. At the time we were asked to make the order we found that cattle were removed without check throughout our county. At that time under the Orders of the Government we could not stop cattle going by railway through the county, we could not stop animals that had been to London and came back infected from entering the boroughs in the county, where they would be handled by butchers, who would proceed from those boroughs to the farms. It was with reference to those Orders of the Government which we could not contravene that we made these exceptions, allowing the movements of cattle under certain conditions. If we had prohibited the movements of cattle, the owners would have said that the butchers could go to London, buy beasts, and slaughter them in the boroughs of Northampton and Peterborough. That is stopped now; but we had besieged the Government with letters and representations, and the prohibitive Order was issued only on the 6th instant. But for the Orders made by Government those relating to cattle traffic in Northamptonshire would have been different. In moving cattle under licence we have two evils to guard against—fraudulent declarations, and declarations untrue in fact, but made in ignorance. Besides these, there is that of carelessness on the part of magistrates, some of whom will sign anything put before them, while others will sign anything that any one else has signed. [Sir GEORGE GREY: The great unpaid.] Even among the great paid I have found gentlemen willing to sign things which, if they had done their duty, they would have left alone. When a beast exhibits incipient symptoms of the plague, the owner, not knowing positively that it is the disease, will get rid of the animal, if he can, before he does know it; and during the two or three days of doubt, I can conceive that even a tolerably scrupulous man would, under certain circumstances, sign a declaration that the beast was not infected. I do not say that a highly scrupulous man would do so; but directly any movement is permitted risks are incurred from fraud, ignorance, and carelessness. But supposing that the declaration of freedom from infection were true, and licence to be properly granted, when an animal is put into a railway truck can it be said that it is healthy any longer? It might be infected from the moment it entered the truck, and I believe there are many instances of animals that have never exhibited a symptom of the cattle plague doing so almost immediately that they were driven into trucks. Then, conveyed through the country at many miles an hour, they carried infection into the fields and farmyards which they passed. I see that the Chancellor of the Exchequer shakes his head; is it his opinion that infection is not so carried? [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER nodded assent.] The question has been put to me by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, "Can you prove that animals passing along the railway communicate infection?" and my answer was to this effect, "With regard to infection you can prove nothing to demonstration; but we are morally certain in Northamptonshire that animals located beside railway lines have taken the infection from cattle trucks." In every case in the county that has been brought under my notice, with the exception of one mentioned to me by letter to-day, we have been able to trace the origin of the disease; and, along the railway, in most cases, the spread of it could be traced to no other cause than trucks passing along the line, and we were therefore convinced that this was the way in which infection was communicated. If that be so, is it not an argument for stopping the movement of cattle by rail as well as by road? Then comes the question as to how the centres of population are to be fed. I think all the difficulties in the way of establishing dead-meat markets in the place of live stock markets may be overcome. I have heard of railway companies who are prepared to convert their cattle trucks into trucks for meat, and who are prepared to establish dead-meat markets at their termini. I believe the North-Western Company, having involved themselves in penalties through ignorance of the Orders in Council, have absolutely refused to carry hides, and are considering whether they ought not to refuse to carry cattle. I come next to the question of markets and fairs. I have to find fault with the plan of the Government, for it makes exceptions of large towns. The effect of holding these markets and fairs will be that infected beasts will find their way among the healthy, and in that way the plague will be communicated. The butchers who went to these markets and freely handled the cattle thus spread the plague. Often animals in the market did not show any symptoms of the disease, yet before they were killed these symptoms appeared. It was no fanciful notion to suppose that the disease might be spread in this way. I read in a newspaper the other day a case of infection which had arisen from a packing cloth which had been brought from London, and which was worn as an apron by the person who milked the cows that became infected. I have heard of numerous instances in Northamptonshire of cattle plague introduced by people who had had the curiosity to go and see infected beasts. A case occurred in my own neighbourhood. A young man went to bring his sister home from a farm house in Huntingdon, where she was on a visit, and while there he went to look at the beasts. He then drove home, walked about his own farm-yard, and communicated the plague, which spread almost up to my own door. In fact, I have been living in an atmosphere of cattle plague for some time. The subject has occupied my attention almost exclusively for many weeks, and I have seen almost every one in the county interested in the matter. With regard to slaughtering animals on farms, I agree with the Government that all infected animals ought to be slaughtered, and that all animals exposed to infection, according to the degree of exposure, ought to be slaughtered. With regard to slaughtering other animals, I am averse to their being sent to the railway station to go to market. There might be difficulty about slaughtering on all farms, and nuisance might arise from it; but on the larger farms it could be done easily, and the difficulty on small farms would be reduced by the provision of additional slaughter-houses throughout the country. I shall now proceed to unfold the scheme which I propose, with the permission of the House, to introduce, and trust the Government will assent to my doing so. In that scheme are embodied the various principles agreed upon almost unanimously at St. James' Hall on Thursday last, and some merely skeleton resolutions I have worked out in detail and seek to give effect to. I am bound to acknowledge the very great assistance in preparing this measure which I have received from hon. Members sitting on both sides of the House. I have never known an occasion on which hon. Members have shown themselves so willing to sacrifice any personal crotchets they might entertain to secure the common object which we have in view, or more willing to relinquish a great portion of their time to assist one who, in the majority of cases, is politically opposed to them.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am bound to point out to the hon. Member that the House is now in Committee upon the Bill introduced by the right hon. Baronet. The hon. Member for Northampton has given notice of a separate Bill, which he will naturally introduce on another occasion.

MR. HUNT: I was under the impression that we had gone into Committee on the question of the cattle plague, and that the right hon. Gentleman opposite had moved for leave to introduce a Bill upon the subject.

THE CHAIRMAN: The question before the Committee is, that I be directed to move the House that leave be given to bring in a Bill.

MR. HUNT: I am always anxious to keep myself within the limits of order, and to support the authority of the Chair. Perhaps, therefore, I may be permitted to put the matter in this way:—If I were going to introduce a scheme, instead of that proposed by the right hon. Baronet, I should do so after this fashion. The scheme would divide itself into two points—the first having relation to the localization or restriction on the movement of cattle, the other to their compulsory slaughter and the amount of compensation to be paid for them. From the 1st of March, when the present Order in Council will expire, to the 25th of March, no movement of cattle whatever should be allowed to take place in any county, infected or uninfected, by railroad or road, with this exception, that on a man's own farm he should be at liberty to move his cattle from field to field, provided they did not go more than 200 yards on any highway. That exception would be necessary, because homesteads very often are situated on a different side of the road from the pastures, but within the limit proposed it would be hardly probable that cattle belonging to two different farmers would encounter each other. That slight exception I know is a departure from the terms of the resolution carried at the conference, and if necessity be shown to warrant such a course, I should be prepared to strike out the exception, but my own opinion is in favour of its retention. With regard to the difficulty suggested by the right hon. Gentleman as to slaughtering on the farm in such a measure as I advocate, I would introduce one other exception from non-removal. I should like to see introduced a power to the parish officers, when required by a certain number of ratepayers, to provide a slaughterhouse in the parish. [Sir GEORGE GREY: Would you only have one?] One or more. In some cases the parish ought not to be required to provide more than one, because there might either be conveniences existing upon the farms, or possibly a slaughterhouse already in the parish itself. What I wish to see is, within a convenient distance of any large numbers of cattle fit for slaughter, a slaughterhouse, to which they could be taken to be killed. The advantage of that plan over the project of moving cattle into towns is that they would travel on a very limited space, and that all cattle travelling over the same piece of road would do so on the way to be killed. These are the only exceptions which I should like to see in any Bill up to the 25th of March. Then comes the question which the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman fails to deal with—that of change of tenancies. In some parts of the country these changes take place on Old Lady Day, the 6th April, in others upon New Lady Day, the 25th March, and I believe it to be absolutely necessary, in the case of such changes, that there should be some relaxation of the rule to allow the removals of cattle rendered necessary by such changes. [Sir GEORGE GREY: Hear, hear, hear!] The right hon.

Baronet cheers that sentiment, but I beg to notice that, in the scheme proposed by him to the House, the 1st of April is mentioned as the day. [Sir GEORGE GREY: I assume that the magistrates have common sense.] Some magistrates have common sense, and some have not, though, upon the whole, I believe a large amount of common sense guides the decisions of those magistrates ordinarily taking part in the administration of county affairs. I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that, when the county authorities adopted his statutory rules, animals could be only moved under licence for slaughter.

Sir GEORGE GREY: The hon. Gentleman is quite mistaken. I said that in no case should cattle be moved by night, and that in other cases they should not be moved without a licence, which was to be granted by the local authorities in accordance with certain prescribed conditions. I hope the form of licence will be scheduled to the Bill. The provisions with regard to slaughter only affect the markets.

Mr. HUNT: Am I to understand that under licence cattle would be allowed to travel during the whole of the period supposed to be covered by the restrictions?

Sir GEORGE GREY: Yes.

Mr. HUNT: I had not read the provisions of the Bill in that light originally; but, as now explained, the Bill is far more dangerous than I had imagined. Magistrates, it seems, are to have the power of passing animals up and down through whole counties for any purpose whatever under a declaration as to a clean bill of health.

Sir GEORGE GREY: So they do now.

Mr. HUNT: I think not. Not in most counties, at least.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: They will not be prevented from shutting them out.

Mr. HUNT: Although most counties may favour relaxations in favour of cattle going to the railway or to the slaughterhouse, I hardly think they will endorse the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, according to which cattle will be free to traverse the country under licence for any purpose. Far from such a measure being satisfactory to the wishes and opinions of the agricultural community, I am sure they will almost regret that such a Bill was ever put upon the table.

Sir GEORGE GREY: How do you propose to arrange as to cattle going from one part of the country to another when tenancies are changed?

Mr. HUNT: I was about to explain that branch of the subject when I was led away from it by an observation of the right hon. Gentleman. Were I preparing a Bill one of the provisions which I should like to see introduced would be that between the 25th of March and 6th of April, inclusive, the owner or purchaser of stock on any farm where the occupation was abandoned or a change made in the tenancy should under licence from the magistrates, and upon a declaration as to a clean bill of health, be allowed to move his stock either to the farm belonging to such purchaser, or to the place to which such owner of stock removed upon the change of tenancy. The measure which I have sketched out I should like to see continued during the month of April. By that time warmer weather would be due, and a certain experience in the working of the measure would have been acquired. If Parliament were then sitting the Government should come to them for a further measure; if not, they should have power to issue an Order in Council discontinuing the measure, or reviving its operation, if that proved to be expedient. If the measure which I suggest were carried out and enforced, it would be necessary at certain periods of the year to allow movements of cattle for the purpose of stocking the land. [Sir GEORGE GREY: How about breeding?] I shall come to that question in its proper order; or I had better say at once that an exception for that purpose must find a place in any scheme. I believe it to be absolutely necessary to the carrying on the business of a farmer or grazier that there should be periods of relaxation, during which the occupiers of land should be able to purchase cattle to stock their land with. Fourteen days appears to be the most suitable period of relaxation, which should not be uniform all over the country, but the fixing of which should be left to the local authorities. With regard to these periods of relaxation, I should insist on very strict conditions. The cattle should only travel by railway, and by licence, and by that time railway travelling would be very different from the system now pursued. Every pen, cattle truck, and platform would before then have been thoroughly disinfected under official supervision. With regard to the second part of the Bill—namely, that which relates to the slaughter of beasts and to compensations,

I shall not trouble the House upon the details, for the provisions of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman are, to a certain extent, in conformity with what I should propose; but there is one point upon which the right hon. Gentleman did not touch. I should like to give power to the local authorities to employ an additional number of police as cattle police to act as inspectors.

SIR GEORGE GREY: The local authorities have already this power, and, in some instances, have availed themselves of it.

MR. HUNT: But there will be no necessity to put them in uniform; so that this expense may be saved to the counties. A badge to distinguish them will be sufficient. With regard to the fund out of which the compensation ought to come, the measure which at first recommended itself to my mind was different; that a county rate should be raised for animals fed and slaughtered in the county, and a borough rate for animals fed and slaughtered in the boroughs; but the general fund proposed by the right hon. Gentleman satisfies me, though I will not pledge myself to the details. I cannot see my way to the machinery by which we should ascertain, in time for the working of such a measure, the head of cattle of each county, with the view of putting a poll tax upon them; but if the right hon. Gentleman does see his way to it I am very glad, and such a plan will have my concurrence. There was one part on which the right hon. Gentleman did not touch—namely, that with regard to the movement of manure. This is an important question; for the plague has been carried into various parts of the country by manure being brought from London by railway from infected sheds and yards. Up to a certain time there should be a prohibition against such manure being carried by railways. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that I have a grudge against railways; but, in the case of cattle travelling by the road, you can find out the drover and stop the progress of other animals; but when they are once put on the railways they can defy the entire potestas comitatus of the county. If cattle and manure be sent off by railway it is impossible to say what is their destination, and it is therefore absolutely necessary to prohibit the transmission of either by railway. I would suggest that a very heavy penalty should be inflicted on any person who brought along any road a load of manure which had been taken from any place infected with the cattle plague. I am not quite clear whether I understood the right hon. Gentleman to state that with regard to animals arriving in this country by sea he proposed that all should be slaughtered at the port of debarkation on a certain date with the exception of those arriving from Ireland. I should like to know if that is what the right hon. Gentleman proposed?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Yes.

MR. HUNT: Will Irish cattle be allowed to be sent by railway from the port at which they land to any part of the country?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Yes, provided they do not enter the market of the port at which they landed.

MR. HUNT: No doubt the cattle might have left Ireland with a clean bill of health but the vessel which conveys them might have previously carried infected beasts, or the cattle might acquire the disease in the transit. I do not think such an exception ought to be made with regard to cattle arriving from Ireland.

SIR GEORGE GREY: When they come to this country the licensing system will apply to them.

MR. HUNT: The licensing system is based on declarations. Are such declarations to be made in Ireland?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Once the cattle arrive in this country they lose their Irish character. They come to Great Britain subject to the licensing system, and the licence must be given on this side. The hon. Gentleman will find in the Bill a form of the licence.

MR. HUNT: I do not attach much value to the declaration of a man at Liverpool, for instance, who has just seen the cattle arrive. The owner in Ireland might say he knew the beasts for a certain length of time and that they were free from disease but after they were put on board the vessel who is to give them a bill of health at Liverpool? Is a cattle jobber to be trusted to give this necessary licence? It appears to me that licences granted on declarations made by people who know nothing at all about the cattle which are the subject of them are not worth the paper on which they are written. I think it will be a considerable risk to have Irish cattle landed under declarations such as I have described, and then removed to all parts of England. I have gone through the different portions of the scheme, which I should like to see introduced to the House. It has often been a reproach upon the Opposition Bench that they are very free of their criticism of Government measures, but that they never propound any measures themselves—that they have one policy, and that is to dislike everything that is brought forward, although they have no plans of their own. I have acted, as far as in me lies, so that no such reproach can attach to my party on this occasion. I confess, however, I do not like the Government Bill as announced. I have thrown out the sketch of such a scheme as I should like to see substituted for the Government measure. As to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman for engrafting on the Government Bill such Amendments as will carry out the views I have expressed, it is not possible for me at the present moment to offer an opinion, as I have not perused the Government Bill. I admit the advantages of such a Bill as I have sketched being carried by the Government, and the passing of it would not only be a pleasure, but a relief to me, and I should be glad to try and induce my friends to assist the Government in making the scheme as complete as possible. As soon as the Government Bill is printed, I will give my attention to it, and in concert with Gentlemen on both sides of the House, endeavour to promote the second reading of the Bill, with the addition of such Amendments as I and my friends may propose. But if I find that the Government Bill cannot be improved, I must be allowed to adopt my own course. I hope, at a future period of the evening, to introduce a Motion on the subject.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) has referred to the educational progress which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has made on the subject before the House, but I think that taunt might have been well spared. I rise for the purpose of removing all manner of doubt as to the course which the Government are disposed to take with respect to this question. So far from being inclined to offer any opposition to the hon. Gentleman's Bill, the Government will regard it as a very great advantage to have that Bill laid on the table. I am sure I may say on the part of my right hon. Friend that he will be exceedingly happy still to receive any lesson from the hon. Gentleman upon this question, a question which to some is so practically plain and simple as that no rational man can differ about the proper course to be pursued, but which, in fact, in every day's experience, appears to be more difficult. With regard to the political part of the hon. Gentleman's speech, I must admit there is no man in this House who, professing certain political opinions, and always stating them manfully, is more watchful against any unnecessary effort of criticism than that hon. Gentleman. He has, indeed, made many charges against my right hon. Friend, or rather against the Government, but I am extremely anxious to do what was suggested by the hon. Member for Lincolnshire (Mr. Banks Stanhope)—separate the future from the past—for if we were to be fastidious, we should perhaps set a bad example in wasting the precious time of this House at a period when time is of the greatest consequence. By all means let the trial be made. Time is of the utmost moment in passing the Act proposed to-night by my right hon. Friend. The hon. Gentleman says he thinks this question was treated on a former night by the Members of the Government as a slight and a secondary consideration. But I am sure if the hon. Gentleman had been aware of the manner in which this subject has weighed upon the minds and upon the time of all the Members of the Government, especially those who have been conversant with it, he might have thought them chargeable with any kind of omission or error, but he would not have charged them with underestimating the importance of the subject. No doubt, this is a calamity of a character most peculiar. In one sense it is quite obvious that it is not national, but partial. It is confined to certain counties and districts, and, in many instances, even in counties which have suffered severely, parts of those counties are comparatively free. On the other side, if we examine the range and sweep of this calamity, it is impossible to conceive anything more destructive. Many is the industrious and energetic man whose whole future has been darkened by the share of the calamity which has come upon him. Under these circumstances, then, it is the absolute duty of the executive Government standing in this House not to be too chary of their own reputation in regard to the past, but to overlook for the most part charges which they may think insufficiently sustained, in order that they may direct their exclusive attention to the consideration of one question—what is to be done. The hon. Gentleman says, having followed the careful statement of my right hon. Friend, that it is unsatisfactory. He assumes, as his basis of what should be done, the resolutions of the conference held in St.

James' Hall on the 8th instant. Of these, there are five operative resolutions; but with respect to four, there is no substantial difference between the hon. Gentleman and my right hon. Friend. On the second resolution there is a difference with respect to Irish cattle being moved inland; but with that single exception, I do not gather that there is any difference between them. With regard to the use of railway cattle trucks and cattle pens, I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman will find either the provisions of the Bill satisfactory, or, at all events, founded upon principles which he would approve—that is to say, stringent provisions for disinfection, and summary and easy methods with regard to the enforcement of these provisions. Now, there is on one point a great difference of opinion between the hon. Gentleman and my right hon. Friend—I have some difficulty in describing it, because I frankly own I was not able to follow the hon. Gentleman. But he commenced his speech by denouncing the principle of the total prohibition of the movement of cattle for a limited time, which limited time he called two months.

MR. HUNT: I divided it into two parts. The prohibition should be absolute, except for 200 yards along the road, up to the 25th of March, except upon a man's own farm.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: That is what I thought the hon. Gentleman described as a period of two months. But he appeared to me to be considerably hampered and entangled with exceptions, and to make proposals with a view to giving effect to his own plan which were totally inconsistent with its character as a remedial measure. The hon. Gentleman said he felt himself pressed by the difficulty which had been stated by my right hon. Friend in a very clear and effective manner as respects the general introduction of a system of slaughter in the farms, which if it could be done would no doubt be the most effectual, for the slaughter of cattle in that way has been proved to be so. But the hon. Gentleman appeared greatly to underrate the difficulties of the plan which he proposed of a total prohibition of the movement of cattle, with respect to its requiring general or at least very extensive conversion of farms into slaughterhouses. The hon. Gentleman recommended that new slaughterhouses should be provided after the passing of this Act, and be built in time to be brought into operation, so as to enable all the arrangements of the past trade of the butcher to be adapted to them for a period which is to expire in two months.

MR. HUNT: The right hon. Gentleman is perfectly right in that criticism as I expressed my views; but the fact was, I was several times interrupted from the Treasury Bench when I proposed to go more fully into the matter. I do not blame the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) for the interruptions, as he was anxious to obtain information about my plan. It was my fault. But I intended to say that there should be a difference of duration for part one and part two of the scheme; part two relating to compulsory slaughter, and that that part should extend to two years certain, and to the end of the Session of Parliament then next ensuing.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am not venturing upon this as mere criticism, but the stringent part of the plan of the hon. Member, the prohibition of the movement of cattle to a man's own farm, except along 200 yards of a highway, was to expire on the 25th of March. But it is during the interval while that stringent provision is to be in operation that the difficulty will be most felt with respect to the supply of meat and with regard to the slaughtering of animals in farms and farm buildings. I confess it seems to me that the difficulty of carrying on the slaughter of beasts freely in farms as they are now constituted would be enormous. But what I want to call the attention of the hon. Gentleman to is this, he having paid great attention to this subject, and having studied it thoroughly with reference to the circumstance in his own neighbourhood. I think the hon. Gentleman in some degree forgets that in coming down to this House he will meet the representatives of every portion of the country, and he will find himself in conflict not with my right hon. Friend, but with them. I do not speak now of the representatives of towns, but of the representatives of different portions of the country, and from many parts which are free from disease. Now, Sir, if we are to approach this subject in the spirit and with the intention of every Gentleman stating strongly and warmly insisting upon his own particular view, we may just as well not approach it at all; because it is perfectly plain that the question we have to consider now is not merely what plan is the best in the abstract, but which is the plan which, being good in itself and promising on the whole the most important effects, can rapidly secure the approbation

my opinion upon this matter. The Report of the Commission was in favour of the suspension of all traffic, and I beg the Government to bear in mind that during the next two months it is possible, without interfering with the supply of meat, or with the reproduction of cattle, to carry out restrictions which will be impossible after the next two months without interfering with reproduction and supply. For this reason I should have preferred the proposal of Resolutions upon which the Government might have acted immediately by Orders in Council. At this time the cattle are almost exclusively confined to the cow-yards; and, therefore, greater stringency in reference to removal would not be much felt; but in the next month or six weeks it will be essential that the grazing counties shall be supplied with cattle from the breeding counties, or the pasture of such counties as Leicestershire and Northamptonshire will be lost. My idea is that during a month after the next six weeks the removal of cattle by railways should, under strict supervision, be permitted. It is essential that the Government should take powers to regulate cattle traffic by railways. This traffic is largely conducted by night, and the speed with which it takes place renders it almost impossible to deal with it, or to obtain correct information as to whence the cattle came, or rather where they have been before they were placed in the railway trucks. It is to the vicinity of the county near the point of delivery of cattle brought by railway is the locality in which the danger occurs; and the Government ought to devise some measure by which, when cattle are placed upon a railway, there shall be some record of the market, or farm, or place, from whence they are brought, and, upon considering this information, a Government officer should have the right to refuse to allow the removal, or should send the information with the cattle for the use of the magistrates of the district in which the cattle is to be delivered. Without some such provision, I am convinced that the railways will continue to spread the disease. As to foreign beasts, what is needed is that certain ports shall be designated as the only ports at which foreign cattle shall be disembarked, and that at these ports they should be slaughtered immediately, or should be removed to lairs, which shall be treated as so many centres of quarantine. I think that it will be impossible for any lengthened period to slaughter every head of cattle delivered at the ports at once, but what we want is, that cattle shall only be disembarked at certain ports, such as London, Liverpool, and Hull, and that at these places there shall be a system of quarantine, and with an adequate staff of Government officers, who shall decide whether the cattle shall be slaughtered immediately, or shall be held there for slaughter, or shall, after a period of quarantine, be allowed to be moved away. I fear that the Government measure is so complicated that we shall not be able to pass it with that promptitude which is desirable, and I think that it falls short in two essential provisions—namely, that it does not propose to regulate cattle traffic by railway, and that it does not regulate the number of ports at which cattle may be disembarked, and provides no system of quarantine. I am strongly in favour of dead-meat instead of live-meat markets. For years it has been urged in the public journals that there is no greater danger to the health of the metropolis than slaughterhouses, and no greater nuisance in the streets than the passing of cattle through them; and it has been urged repeatedly in this House that there should be abattoirs outside the town, and we have an opportunity of passing a law in favour of the largely increasing practice of slaughtering in the country. It is already a common practice round my neighbourhood to slaughter for the London market; and I cannot but see advantage in any restriction that would favour that practice. A permanent measure will have to be passed if the system of dead-meat markets is to be encouraged, for the measure must extend over some considerable period, or the arrangements for it cannot be made on account of the primary expense. A permanent measure is also required with reference to the importation of cattle. As the Continental system of railways is extended to the Steppes of Russia and into Hungary—the permanent seats of this disease—there will be increasing danger that the food of the people of this country may at any time be cut short by the importation of the disease. No circumstances are so favourable to the dissemination of the disease as when cattle are packed in railway trucks or on ship-board. The disease would, if thus disseminated, destroy first the imported cattle, and then the home-bred, infected by them, and an indefinite rise in the price of meat would, of necessity, ensue. I trust that the Government will adopt some permanent regulations as to ports. I wish to touch also upon the subject of compensation. It is idle to order the slaughter of cattle unless you compensate for the cattle so slaughtered. If you deprive a man of the exercise of his own judgment in the disposal of his own property, you must compensate him. In my own county I am happy to say we have established a mutual insurance association under the Limited Liability Act, and the last account I heard we had £240,000 worth of stock insured, and from day to day the quantity is increasing; and I think that if some such associations were formed in every county, you would have this advantage, that you would not need extra policemen, for every member of the association would be bound, in his own interest, to support the police. It would, in my opinion, have been wise to have encouraged the formation of such associations, and that Government aid should have been extended, if not as a gift, as a loan; and that every payment should be made to such associations by a percentage—say a third of the whole compensation made for animals dying by the disease. I believe such a system, by enlisting the spirit of co-operation, and insuring caution and exertion, as well as economy, by means of county insurance associations, would have enabled you to grapple more effectually with the disease than by any system hitherto advocated in this House. I wish also to observe that a heavy tax is levied upon every policy issued by these associations, and I think that it would be but an act of grace and justice if the Government were to remit that heavy tax, and thus afford, at least indirectly, an encouragement to exertions for staying this plague on the part not only of the authorities, but of every member of the agricultural body who becomes a member of such association.

Mr. LEEMAN said, he wished to ask if, inasmuch as the county rate was levied solely upon the occupiers and not upon the owners of property; and as the evils that result from the cattle plague must, if it continue, fall largely upon the owners of property, and especially of agricultural property; the Government contemplated by this Bill giving to the tenant power to deduct any portion of the rate from his rent, and, if so, for what period?

Sir GEORGE GREY said, that the Bill provided that a tenant should be allowed to deduct half the amount of the special rate from the rent of his landlord, so that the burden might be equally divided between the occupier and the owner.

Mr. CUMMING-BRUCE said, he could not express any decided opinion upon the clauses of the Bill; but he was quite sure that every Gentleman on both sides of the House would concur in rejoicing that Her Majesty's Government had at last, even at the eleventh hour, introduced a measure which would have the effect of relieving those concerned from the confusion caused by a multitude of authorities and jurisdictions from whom no uniform, consistent, or harmonious directions could be expected. It was only that morning that he had received a letter from the clerk of the peace for the county which he represented (Elginshire). The magistrates of the county had forbidden the use of the markets in the county up to a certain date, but the clerk to the magistrates at Elgin had stated in a letter that, unless the Morayshire Farmers' Club would guarantee compensation to those who sustained losses through the suspension of the cattle market, the magistrates of the town had resolved to take no steps to prevent the holding of the ensuing cattle market. He thought they might congratulate themselves on getting rid of this kind of local self-government. He was no more an advocate for centralization than was his hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeenshire (Mr. Lealie); but it should be remembered that the present case was exceptional, and of a character which could only be met by what his hon. Friend might term despotic, or, certainly, central action. He must say that he felt extremely glad that they had at last a measure presented by the Government which he thought might be made efficient and useful. Some points, however, he had hoped to see dealt with with greater force, and one of these was disinfection, which might be made very serviceable, and would certainly be regarded with greater satisfaction than the rude system of slaughter with the pole-axe. An eminent professional gentleman (Dr. Dewar) had detailed in a Stirling paper a simple and efficacious process of disinfection which he had tried with exceedingly satisfactory results on twenty homesteads in the counties of Fife and Forfar, where the disease had been very prevalent. It was grounded upon the fact that no disinfectant was so successful as sulphurous acid. A piece of sulphur about the size of a man's thumb, burnt in a brazier introduced into a fire, would entirely destroy the vitality or germ of infection. He had been informed by a friend of a very remarkable case bearing on this subject. It was that of a farmer who had two cattle-sheds about 1,200 yards apart. In one of those sheds the disease was raging with more than usual violence, and the cattle in the other shed were perfectly healthy, although the farmer was continually passing from the shed where the sick and dying cattle were, to that in which were the animals free from the disease. Not alone did he pass from shed to shed, but he often went into the shed where the healthy cattle were, immediately after handling the animals suffering from disease in the other. The gentleman from whom he heard that anecdote attributed the non-communication of a disease which every one knew was exceedingly contagious entirely to the fact that the farmer used the disinfectant suggested by Dr. Dewar, and to which he (Mr. Bruce) had previously alluded. This question of disinfectants was a most important one, and he earnestly hoped that, by experiments and otherwise, it would receive the prompt and best consideration of the authorities. As to the remuneration, he did not quite understand what had been done; and he would ask the Lord Advocate to state what was its proposed effect in Scotland. He considered that while, on the one hand, the Government were now taking a most proper course, on the other, it could not be denied that the spread of the disease was in no small degree attributable to the inaction of the Government, even after the receipt of the exhaustive and excellent Report of their own Commission. Such being the case, he thought that those who had suffered by the cattle plague had a right to look to Government for some relief and assistance. He held that the remuneration ought not to be confined to any particular counties, but that such part of it as it might be thought right to levy on the agricultural interests should be levied equally on every county in Great Britain, from the Lands End to John-o'-Groats, and ought to be a national measure. He would suggest that the funds out of which this recompense was to be paid should be derived, half from the farmers and landed proprietors of districts, and half from the public funds. By this system any trickery, any effort to obtain money under false pretences from this fund, would be effectually prevented, for the proprietors and farmers of the neighbourhood having to pay half the sum disbursed, would form an excellent amateur

MR. REBOW said, he wished to briefly draw the attention of the House to a circumstance which had recently come under his notice, and which he thought of considerable importance. A short time since a vessel belonging to the Great Eastern Railway Company arrived at Harwich, in Essex, with cattle. One of these cattle was found, immediately after the vessel's arrival, to be suffering from the cattle plague, and the Government inspector directed the beast to be slaughtered and buried where it had landed. A hole was dug on the quay to receive the carcass and the animal was just about to be slaughtered when the town authorities interfered and refused to allow it to be killed or buried in Harwich. The animal was then put into a railway truck, carried seven miles along the line to the next station, and there slaughtered and buried. Now, he need not inform any practical agriculturist—any man who knew how contagious this disease was—that nothing was more calculated to cause the spread of infection than what had been done in this case by the servants of the railway company. It caused a regular panic among the farmers who lived in the neighbourhood of the station where the cow had been brought to, and the next day they crowded to the petty sessions, of which he was chairman, to complain of what certainly was a most improper act, an act for which the servants of the company had been brought up before the petty sessions bench and fined. As to the general question under discussion, he believed that the only way to check the epidemic was to entirely prohibit the moving of cattle, and to provide a quarantine and cemetery for all store cattle imported. He hoped that the Bill would contain a provision that all fat stock imported should be immediately slaughtered at the port of debarkation, and that quarantine ground and a cemetery should be provided for the store stock near the place.

MR. LIDDELL said, he congratulated the House on the question before them not having become a party one. He believed that Members of that House were all, without any distinction of party, determined to put their shoulders to the wheel to do all in their power to check the spread of a disease which had already done so much injury to the country. He took the earliest opportunity of directing the attention of the Government to what really was a very serious matter. He had in his pocket a letter from a gentleman living near Edgeworth, who informed him that in the high road near his residence there were heaps of manure which had been taken from sheds in a town in which over 100 cattle had died of the plague. He need scarcely say that no course could possibly be taken better adapted to spread the disease than this. The matter was one that deserved, and he trusted would obtain, the prompt attention of the Government. Officials should be appointed, whose duty it should be to watch over the conveyance of manure, and see that every precaution was taken against unnecessary risk of infection. It would be most improvident and unwise to endeavour to throw the whole burden of the loss upon our posterity instead of meeting it ourselves; and, therefore, Government should be prepared to deal with the financial part of the question by means of a rate, and thus avoid the objectionable plans proposed out of doors founded upon a system of rent-charges. He thought a poll tax of 5s. per head would effectually meet the requirements of the case.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: The right hon. Gentleman loudly cheered the proposition contained in the speech of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire that it would be necessary to have an open time after Lady Day next, when transfers of stock might be effected in cases where there was a change of tenancy. The conclusion I draw from this admission is that Her Majesty's Government acted wrongly in not calling Parliament together at an earlier date, as it is obvious that in so short a period as must elapse before the restriction is removed much good cannot be effected. We are told that the reason why Parliament has not been called together earlier is that at the end of last year public opinion was so immature upon the subject that had we been assembled the action of Her Majesty's Government would have been found far in advance of the proceedings Parliament would have been inclined to sanction. That is begging the entire question. I am prepared, on behalf of myself and of every Member present, to repudiate the charge that our ideas were behind those of the Government. Why, in what frame of mind, and with what knowledge, should we have come to the consideration of any measure which the Government might have proposed at the end of October and the beginning of November? We should have had in our hands the whole of that valuable and exhaustive Report of the Royal Commission; and if the Government had been really sincere in the commendation bestowed on the Royal Commission, Parliament would have been prepared to receive a Bill based on the recommendation of that Commission, and so have paid it the attention it deserved. There is, then, no justification for the statement of Government, that the Parliament would not have been prepared to deal with the measure in an early Session. I ask the Committee to look at the provisions contained and to be contained in the Bill about to be submitted. Does any hon. Member who heard the clear statement of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department believe that a Bill dealing with so vast a complication of objects, with omissions here and exceptions there, and embracing a whole course of sanitary regulations, can be passed within a period when it could be effectual in stamping out the disease? The right hon. Gentleman himself has given us a pretty broad hint that Government will be obliged to divide the Bill into two or three separate measures, merely proceeding with those measures which it is essential should be speedily passed. The more I reflect on the measure sketched forth, and on the speeches which have been delivered, the less becomes the prospect of a satisfactory measure at the hands of the Government. The Government have been threatened, and no wonder, with a rival Bill from my hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire. How is that rival Bill to be considered? The Government is going to allow its introduction; but the second reading of the Government Bill is fixed for Ash Wednesday, and the House does not meet until two o'clock. Is my hon. Friend's Bill to be taken on Ash Wednesday after the Government Bill has been discussed? This kind of legislation, I fear, on so critical a subject, is likely to run the risk of complete failure. I feel so deeply on this subject, that at the risk of the charge of making yet another suggestion to the Government, I should propose that as the Government cannot carry this great and complicated measure within a reasonable period of time, they should proceed by way of Resolution in both Houses of Parliament, which will test the opinion of the Legislature on many important points. Orders in Council might be issued immediately founded on those Resolutions. If that were done the House could then proceed to the consideration of the great and complicated proposals of the Government, and to permanent legislation on the subject. But I must say, after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, that if we are going to legislate on the principle that the first thing to be considered is how the temporary wants of the great towns of this country are to be supplied, and the next how the extinction of the cattle plague is to be accomplished, legislation will inevitably fail to produce the latter object. But if, on the other hand, we legislate on the principle that the cattle plague is first to be extinguished, whatever temporary inconvenience might be felt by the manufacturing towns, success may, and probably will, with the blessing of Providence, crown our efforts. That principle lies at the root of the matter, and I regret that the Home Secretary should have said that, from information derived from deputations and Mr. Thompson, he was disposed to give a temporary convenience to the manufacturing towns of the West Riding precedence over measures for the extinction of the cattle plague itself. I should like to know whether during the month which has elapsed since Mr. Thompson's letter was written the terrible strides made by the plague are not calculated to alter the opinions of men even more influential than Mr. Thompson? I am convinced that if Mr. Thompson had consulted the great body of the people, they would not have hesitated a moment in recommending not the palliation merely, but the extinction, if possible, of this terrible visitation. With respect to the manufacturing towns in the West Riding, the right hon. Gentleman says the Bill will be based on the practice which now prevails in the West Riding, the practice in the North Riding being different. But is the practice of the West Riding so successful? Have the results in the West Riding been so successful that the House will be justified in giving that practice the effect of law? I find it stated in the last Report of the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council, that in the week ending the 3rd February sixty-two fresh centres of infection of the plague had broken out in the West Riding. I find that 470 animals have been attacked in the last week in the West Riding. But it is confessed that that return is incomplete, for in a note it is added that "especially from Yorkshire" the returns are not complete, and it is likely that the gentleman who drew up the report would find, not a decrease but an increase in the fresh cases occurring in that part of the country. What reason, in fact, have we to hope that this plan recommended by the Home Secretary, as now carried on and failing in Yorkshire, will meet with any success at all? The right hon. Gentleman says that great difficulty would be felt in slaughtering cattle if removals were positively prohibited, as in providing proper slaughtering place and afterwards transmitting the meat to the large centres of consumption. Difficulty there may be, but can anyone suppose that so great an evil can be got rid of without some trouble and annoyance? On the part of the agricultural community I ask are they not subjecting themselves willingly and with alacrity to even amount of inconvenience and pecuniary loss at the present moment? And are they to be the only classes to be called on by legislators to bear inconvenience and pecuniary loss for the sake of a great public advantage? Does anybody mean to say that in localities adjoining these manufacturing towns means for slaughtering animals could not be devised at a small cost? and I appeal to any chairman of railway companies in the House, to the right hon. Member for South Lincolnshire, the Chairman of the Great Northern Railway, whether there would be any practical difficulty in conveying dead meat by railway to the north? Means and appliances in this direction would not be found wanting. From any measure the north-western portions of Scotland ought to be exempted, as by their geographical position they enjoy a complete immunity and stand on precisely the same footing as Ireland. There is a clear geographic boundary in those districts beyond which nobody has hitherto succeeded in passing any cattle. With these exceptions this late period of the calamity the only sound principle is the total and entire prohibition of the removal of all cattle throughout the country for a limited period. As to other principles of the Bill relating to compensation and the prohibition of all imported cattle inland, have not a single observation to offer? With respect to the latter, I think the principle sound; but I think that the whole machinery of the measure is so complicated that it cannot become law in a reasonable time. The only sound principle to adopt under the circumstances is that the House of Commons should declare that, for a limited period, there should be a total prohibition. My own belief is that the whole of these complicated, costly, vexatious, inconvenient, and interfering provisions of the Bill proposed by the right hon. Gentleman will fail in the one result we have in view—namely, in the extinction of this frightful cattle plague within the period contemplated by the Government. I make these observations with great reluctance, as I had been in hopes, from many parts of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, that the Bill might have received the hearty concurrence of the House. But after the debate which has occurred, and after the full explanation given by the right hon. Gentleman, I feel convinced that such concurrence will not be had, and that the measure, based on the principle announced, will not succeed in the object which I feel sure every Gentleman in this Committee has at heart.

MR. CARNEGIE said, it was not his intention to go into the merits of the Bill of the Government further than to remark that it appeared to him that by the principle of compensation proposed those counties which had suffered most from the cattle plague would suffer most by the assessment. The benefit to be derived would be in exact inverse ratio to the assessment. Therefore in some counties, as in the one he himself represented (Forfarshire), where nearly all the cattle had been swept away, the people would be called on to pay very large rates for stamping out the plague; whereas those counties where the disease did not exist would have to pay absolutely nothing. Now that was manifestly unfair and unjust. The rate should be a general one extending over the whole country. This was not only a stockowners' but a consumers' question, and therefore extending over the whole country. The consumers were at this moment paying for the effects of the cattle plague—it was answered—in the increased price of meat. To a certain extent they were; but if the cattle plague were not stamped out they would have to pay twice as much. To a certain extent the burden ought to fall on them, but that that burden should fall on those localities least able to pay was manifestly unjust, and he should oppose any such proposal to the utmost of his power. He could not see the justice of the distinction sought to be drawn by the right hon. Gentleman between compensating the owners of cattle slaughtered by order of the Government inspectors, and not compensating those owners whose cattle were, if he might use the term, allowed to die by order of the inspectors. Any retrospective measure, he thought, ought not to recognize any such distinction. He protested against their taxing those who had already lost stock for those who had as yet not suffered any loss. Such counties as Aberdeenshire who by their energy had stamped out the plague—who had paid money out of their pockets for effecting that object—should be repaid that expense, and thereby be placed in the same position as other counties were to be under the proposed arrangement. The gentlemen of Aberdeenshire ought not to be losers by the benefit they had conferred on the country.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he wished to offer two suggestions, by the adoption of which the Government might, he considered, improve their measure. The right hon. Baronet (Sir George Grey) proposed that all diseased animals should, of necessity, be killed; but that as to those animals which had come into contact with disease animals, and had thereby become infected, it should be left to the local authorities to decide whether they should be slaughtered or not. This, he thought, was radically wrong. If they desired to stamp out the plague they must do as other countries had done, and slaughter not only the diseased but also the infected animals. The example of Aberdeenshire had been adduced as perfect; but what had they done there? They were not content with destroying merely such animals as had the disease, but they bought up the whole herd and killed it. He now came to his second suggestion. He agreed with the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners), that they must entirely stop all movement of cattle. The right hon. Baronet had warned them that if they did that they must resort to a dead-meat market; but he did not show that any evil would result from adopting that alternative. Many advantages would, in his (Lord Robert Montagu's) opinion, attend the establishing of a dead-meat market. At present, animals often suffered a great deal in travelling to market; and, moreover, the bones, hides, hoofs, and offal of cattle, to the extent of many thousands of tons, were now brought long distances into large towns, where they were utterly useless, and therefore they had

I shall not trouble the House upon the details, for the provisions of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman are, to a certain extent, in conformity with what I should propose; but there is one point upon which the right hon. Gentleman did not touch. I should like to give power to the local authorities to employ an additional number of police as cattle police to act as inspectors.

SIR GEORGE GREY: The local authorities have already this power, and, in some instances, have availed themselves of it.

MR. HUNT: But there will be no necessity to put them in uniform; so that this expense may be saved to the counties. A badge to distinguish them will be sufficient. With regard to the fund out of which the compensation ought to come, the measure which at first recommended itself to my mind was different; that a county rate should be raised for animals fed and slaughtered in the county, and a borough rate for animals fed and slaughtered in the boroughs; but the general fund proposed by the right hon. Gentleman satisfies me, though I will not pledge myself to the details. I cannot see my way to the machinery by which we should ascertain, in time for the working of such a measure, the head of cattle of each county, with the view of putting a poll tax upon them; but if the right hon. Gentleman does see his way to it I am very glad, and such a plan will have my concurrence. There was one part on which the right hon. Gentleman did not touch—namely, that with regard to the movement of manure. This is an important question; for the plague has been carried into various parts of the country by manure being brought from London by railway from infected sheds and yards. Up to a certain time there should be a prohibition against such manure being carried by railways. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that I have a grudge against railways; but, in the case of cattle travelling by the road, you can find out the drover and stop the progress of other animals; but when they are once put on the railways they can defy the entire potestas comitatus of the county. If cattle and manure be sent off by railway it is impossible to say what is their destination, and it is therefore absolutely necessary to prohibit the transmission of either by railway. I would suggest that a very heavy penalty should be inflicted on any person who brought along any road a load of manure which had been taken from any place infected with the cattle plague. I am not quite clear whether I understood the right hon. Gentleman to state that with regard to animals arriving in this country by sea he proposed that all should be slaughtered at the port of debarkation on a certain date, with the exception of those arriving from Ireland. I should like to know if that is what the right hon. Gentleman proposed?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Yes.

MR. HUNT: Will Irish cattle be allowed to be sent by railway from the port at which they land to any part of the country?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Yes, provided they do not enter the market of the port at which they landed.

MR. HUNT: No doubt the cattle might have left Ireland with a clean bill of health, but the vessel which conveys them might have previously carried infected beasts, or the cattle might acquire the disease in the transit. I do not think such an exception ought to be made with regard to cattle arriving from Ireland.

SIR GEORGE GREY: When they come to this country the licensing system will apply to them.

MR. HUNT: The licensing system is based on declarations. Are such declarations to be made in Ireland?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Once the cattle arrive in this country they lose their Irish character. They come to Great Britain subject to the licensing system, and the licence must be given on this side. The hon. Gentleman will find in the Bill a form of the licence.

MR. HUNT: I do not attach much value to the declaration of a man at Liverpool, for instance, who has just seen the cattle arrive. The owner in Ireland might say he knew the beasts for a certain length of time and that they were free from disease, but after they were put on board the vessel, who is to give them a bill of health at Liverpool? Is a cattle jobber to be trusted to give this necessary licence? It appears to me that licences granted on declarations made by people who know nothing at all about the cattle which are the subject of them are not worth the paper on which they are written. I think it will be a considerable risk to have Irish cattle landed under declarations such as I have described, and then removed to all parts of England. I have gone through the different portions of the scheme, which I should like to see introduced to the House. It has often been a reproach upon the Opposition Benches that they are very free of their criticism of Government measures, but that they never propound any measures themselves—that they have one policy, and that is to dislike everything that is brought forward, although they have no plans of their own. I have acted, as far as in me lies, so that no such reproach can attach to my party on this occasion. I confess, however, I do not like the Government Bill as announced. I have thrown out the sketch of such a scheme as I should like to see substituted for the Government measure. As to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman for engrafting on the Government Bill such Amendments as will carry out the views I have expressed, it is not possible for me at the present moment to offer an opinion, as I have not perused the Government Bill. I admit the advantages of such a Bill as I have sketched being carried by the Government, and the passing of it would not only be a pleasure, but a relief to me, and I should be glad to try and induce my friends to assist the Government in making the scheme as complete as possible. As soon as the Government Bill is printed, I will give my attention to it, and in concert with Gentlemen on both sides of the House, endeavour to promote the second reading of the Bill, with the addition of such Amendments as I and my friends may propose. But if I find that the Government Bill cannot be improved, I must be allowed to adopt my own course. I hope, at a future period of the evening, to introduce a Motion on the subject.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) has referred to the educational progress which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has made on the subject before the House, but I think that taunt might have been well spared. I rise for the purpose of removing all manner of doubt as to the course which the Government are disposed to take with respect to this question. So far from being inclined to offer any opposition to the hon. Gentleman's Bill, the Government will regard it as a very great advantage to have that Bill laid on the table. I am sure I may say on the part of my right hon. Friend that he will be exceedingly happy still to receive any lesson from the hon. Gentleman upon this question, a question which to some is so practically plain and simple as that no rational man can differ about the proper course to be pursued, but which, in fact, in every day's experience, appears to be more difficult. With regard to the political part of the hon. Gentleman's speech, I must admit there is no man in this House who, professing certain political opinions, and always stating them manfully, is more watchful against any unnecessary effort of criticism than that hon. Gentleman. He has, indeed, made many charges against my right hon. Friend, or rather against the Government, but I am extremely anxious to do what was suggested by the hon. Member for Lincolnshire (Mr. Banks Stanhope)—separate the future from the past—for if we were to be fastidious, we should perhaps set a bad example in wasting the precious time of this House at a period when time is of the greatest consequence. By all means let the trial be made. Time is of the utmost moment in passing the Act proposed to-night by my right hon. Friend. The hon. Gentleman says he thinks this question was treated on a former night by the Members of the Government as a slight and a secondary consideration. But I am sure if the hon. Gentleman had been aware of the manner in which this subject has weighed upon the minds and upon the time of all the Members of the Government, especially those who have been conversant with it, he might have thought them chargeable with any kind of omission or error, but he would not have charged them with underestimating the importance of the subject. No doubt, this is a calamity of a character most peculiar. In one sense it is quite obvious that it is not national, but partial. It is confined to certain counties and districts, and, in many instances, even in counties which have suffered severely, parts of those counties are comparatively free. On the other side, if we examine the range and sweep of this calamity, it is impossible to conceive anything more destructive. Many is the industrious and energetic man whose whole future has been darkened by the share of the calamity which has come upon him. Under these circumstances, then, it is the absolute duty of the executive Government standing in this House not to be too chary of their own reputation in regard to the past, but to overlook for the most part charges which they may think insufficiently sustained, in order that they may direct their exclusive attention to the consideration of one question—what is to be done. The hon. Gentleman says, having followed the careful statement of my right hon. Friend, that it is unsatisfactory. He assumes, as his basis of what should be done, the resolutions of the conference held in St.

James' Hall on the 8th instant. Of these, there are five operative resolutions; but with respect to four, there is no substantial difference between the hon. Gentleman and my right hon. Friend. On the second resolution there is a difference with respect to Irish cattle being moved inland; but with that single exception, I do not gather that there is any difference between them. With regard to the use of railway cattle trucks and cattle pens, I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman will find either the provisions of the Bill satisfactory, or, at all events, founded upon principles which he would approve—that is to say, stringent provisions for disinfection, and summary and easy methods with regard to the enforcement of these provisions. Now, there is on one point a great difference of opinion between the hon. Gentleman and my right hon. Friend—I have some difficulty in describing it, because I frankly own I was not able to follow the hon. Gentleman. But he commenced his speech by denouncing the principle of the total prohibition of the movement of cattle for a limited time, which limited time he called two months.

MR. HUNT: I divided it into two parts. The prohibition should be absolute, except for 200 yards along the road, up to the 25th of March, except upon a man's own farm.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: That is what I thought the hon. Gentleman described as a period of two months. But he appeared to me to be considerably hampered and entangled with exceptions, and to make proposals with a view to giving effect to his own plan which were totally inconsistent with its character as a remedial measure. The hon. Gentleman said he felt himself pressed by the difficulty which had been stated by my right hon. Friend in a very clear and effective manner as respects the general introduction of a system of slaughter in the farms, which if it could be done would no doubt be the most effectual, for the slaughter of cattle in that way has been proved to be so. But the hon. Gentleman appeared greatly to underrate the difficulties of the plan which he proposed of a total prohibition of the movement of cattle, with respect to its requiring general or at least very extensive conversion of farms into slaughterhouses. The hon. Gentleman recommended that new slaughterhouses should be provided after the passing of this Act, and be built in time to be brought into operation, so as to enable all the arrangements of the past trade of the butcher to be adapted to them for a period which is to expire in two months.

MR. HUNT: The right hon. Gentleman is perfectly right in that criticism as I expressed my views; but the fact was, I was several times interrupted from the Treasury Bench when I proposed to go more fully into the matter. I do not blame the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) for the interruptions, as he was anxious to obtain information about my plan. It was my fault. But I intended to say that there should be a difference of duration for part one and part two of the scheme; part two relating to compulsory slaughter, and that that part should extend to two years certain, and to the end of the Session of Parliament then next ensuing.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am not venturing upon this as mere criticism, but the stringent part of the plan of the hon. Member, the prohibition of the movement of cattle to a man's own farm, except along 200 yards of a highway, was to expire on the 25th of March. But it is during the interval while that stringent provision is to be in operation that the difficulty will be most felt with respect to the supply of meat and with regard to the slaughtering of animals in farms and farm buildings. I confess it seems to me that the difficulty of carrying on the slaughter of beasts freely in farms as they are now constituted would be enormous. But what I want to call the attention of the hon. Gentleman to is this, he having paid great attention to this subject, and having studied it thoroughly with reference to the circumstances in his own neighbourhood. I think the hon. Gentleman in some degree forgets that in coming down to this House he will meet the representatives of every portion of the country, and he will find himself in conflict not with my right hon. Friend, but with them. I do not speak now of the representatives of towns, but of the representatives of different portions of the country, and from many parts which are free from disease. Now, Sir, if we are to approach this subject in the spirit and with the intention of every Gentleman stating strongly and warmly insisting upon his own particular view, we may just as well not approach it at all; because it is perfectly plain that the question we have to consider now is not merely what plan is the best in the abstract, but which is the plan which, being good in itself and promising on the whole the most important effects, can rapidly secure the approbation of Parliament. This is a question of infinite detail; and unless we are enabled to deal with it in a spirit of compromise, in a disposition to sacrifice that which we think best for that which the House in general is disposed to think good, I think there is but little prospect of our doing well. And now that we have at length the immense advantage of having enlightened representatives of the general opinion of the country collected within these walls from every portion of the United Kingdom, but especially from Great Britain, and now that we have out of doors a public opinion which is ready to adopt and sustain us, nothing, I think, could be more lamentable than if, in order to promote particular ideas to which we are attached from the special circumstances of our own neighbourhoods, we were to lose these precious moments, in which, under Providence, we may apply effectual measures of restraint to this great calamity. The hon. Gentleman expressed his opinion that if Parliament had been called together two months ago it would have been ready to support the Government in adopting the measures which he recommended. We shall have an opportunity of testing that opinion on going into Committee; because I do not think that the House is even now prepared to sanction the total prohibition of the moving of cattle. That is a most important point, which must be considered in Committee, and there it will be disposed of. We have good grounds for the firm and deliberate opinion which we entertain that even at this time it would be a great error to adopt the principle of total prohibition; but, nevertheless, we trust that that will be decided by the House after hearing a free expression of opinion. But with respect to its being likely to have been done two months ago, I must dissent from that opinion. I am perfectly certain that Parliament would not have entertained such an intention upon the authority which the hon. Gentleman brought forward. I further think it was but shortly before that period that an hon. Gentleman opposite, applying his mind to the concerns of his constituents, expressed great doubt and disapproval of such a measure, and especially of the total prohibition of the removal of cattle which the hon. Gentleman recommends. My object at the present moment really is earnestly to point out, while profiting by the measure of the hon. Gentleman where we can, the enormous importance of acting promptly in this matter, and of being prepared to sacrifice everything which it is not absolutely necessary to obtain. It is to be hoped that now, when the period for action has arrived, we shall not throw away this most precious season, but be able to pass a law which may assist in the mitigation of this most grievous disease.

Mr. NEWDEGATE: I am one of those who are unable to join in the inculcation of the Government for want of promptitude to the extent that other hon. Members have expressed dissatisfaction, for it happens that I am connected with the Governorship of the Royal Veterinary College, and, therefore, had the earliest information of the danger which is now fully perceived. Yet, when in August, September, and October, in my own neighbourhood, I endeavoured to sound an alarm, I gained but little attention, even among my friends. Veterinary surgeons also, when they endeavoured to impress their clients with the danger that was impending, were treated as though they were only seeking for practice and for fees. But after the Report of the Royal Commission, I think that the Government showed less promptitude than I had expected. I think that after that Report, they should have enforced greater stringency. Now, let the House consider the nature of the Bill which the Government have introduced. This is a Bill not merely for an emergency; it comprehends provisions that are to last for years. I do not say that the provisions of the Bill are altogether inadequate, though I think that some of the provisions should be more stringent, and that there are some serious omissions. But my belief is that, if the Government intends to deal fairly with the House, and to act with that promptitude which I think necessary, it would have been far better to have proposed certain Resolutions to the House, and on the adoption of Resolutions with respect to cattle traffic and importation, that the Government should then have issued Orders in Council, based upon the Resolutions of Parliament in the first instance, and then should have based their Bill on these same Resolutions; such a course would have ensured a prompt passage through the House. My own opinion goes to a great extent with that of my hon. Friend (Mr. Hunt). Hitherto, I have concurred with my brother justices in thinking that the present restrictions upon the transit of cattle were enough; but the effect of the concurrent testimony given by the agricultural body, and the opinions expressed in this House, have shaken my opinion upon this matter. The Report of the Commission was in favour of the suspension of all traffic, and I beg the Government to bear in mind that during the next two months it is possible, without interfering with the supply of meat, or with the reproduction of cattle, to carry out restrictions which will be impossible after the next two months without interfering with reproduction and supply. For this reason I should have preferred the proposal of Resolutions upon which the Government might have acted immediately by Orders in Council. At this time the cattle are almost exclusively confined to the cow-yards; and, therefore, greater stringency in reference to removal would not be much felt; but in the next month or six weeks it will be essential that the grazing counties shall be supplied with cattle from the breeding counties, or the pasture of such counties as Leicestershire and Northamptonshire will be lost. My idea is that during a month after the next six weeks the removal of cattle by railways should, under strict supervision, be permitted. It is essential that the Government should take powers to regulate cattle traffic by railways. This traffic is largely conducted by night, and the speed with which it takes place renders it almost impossible to deal with it, or to obtain correct information as to whence the cattle came, or rather where they have been before they were placed in the railway trucks. It is to the vicinity of the county near the point of delivery of cattle brought by railway is the locality in which the danger occurs; and the Government ought to devise some measure by which, when cattle are placed upon a railway, there shall be some record of the market, or farm, or place, from whence they are brought, and, upon considering this information, a Government officer should have the right to refuse to allow the removal, or should send the information with the cattle for the use of the magistrates of the district in which the cattle is to be delivered. Without some such provision, I am convinced that the railways will continue to spread the disease. As to foreign beasts, what is needed is that certain ports shall be designated as the only ports at which foreign cattle shall be disembarked, and that at these ports they should be slaughtered immediately, or should be removed to lairs, which shall be treated as so many centres of quarantine. I think that it will be impossible for any lengthened period to slaughter every head of cattle delivered at the ports at once, but what we want is, that cattle shall only be disembarked at certain ports, such as London, Liverpool, and Hull, and that at these places there shall be a system of quarantine, and with an adequate staff of Government officers, who shall decide whether the cattle shall be slaughtered immediately, or shall be held there for slaughter, or shall, after a period of quarantine, be allowed to be moved away. I fear that the Government measure is so complicated that we shall not be able to pass it with that promptitude which is desirable, and I think that it falls short in two essential provisions—namely, that it does not propose to regulate cattle traffic by railway, and that it does not regulate the number of ports at which cattle may be disembarked, and provides no system of quarantine. I am strongly in favour of dead-meat instead of live-meat markets. For years it has been urged in the public journals that there is no greater danger to the health of the metropolis than slaughterhouses, and no greater nuisance in the streets than the passing of cattle through them; and it has been urged repeatedly in this House that there should be abattoirs outside the town, and we have an opportunity of passing a law in favour of the largely increasing practice of slaughtering in the country. It is already a common practice round my neighbourhood to slaughter for the London market; and I cannot but see advantage in any restriction that would favour that practice. A permanent measure will have to be passed if the system of dead-meat markets is to be encouraged, for the measure must extend over some considerable period, or the arrangements for it cannot be made on account of the primary expense. A permanent measure is also required with reference to the importation of cattle. As the Continental system of railways is extended to the Steppes of Russia and into Hungary—the permanent seats of this disease—there will be increasing danger that the food of the people of this country may at any time be cut short by the importation of the disease. No circumstances are so favourable to the dissemination of the disease as when cattle are packed in railway trucks or on ship-board. The disease would, if thus disseminated, destroy first the imported cattle, and then the home-bred, infected by them, and an indefinite rise in the price of meat would, of necessity, ensue. I trust that the Government will adopt some permanent regulations as to ports. I wish to touch also upon the subject of compensation. It is idle to order the slaughter of cattle unless you compensate for the cattle so slaughtered. If you deprive a man of the exercise of his own judgment in the disposal of his own property, you must compensate him. In my own county I am happy to say we have established a mutual insurance association under the Limited Liability Act, and the last account I heard we had £240,000 worth of stock insured, and from day to day the quantity is increasing; and I think that if some such associations were formed in every county, you would have this advantage, that you would not need extra policemen, for every member of the association would be bound, in his own interest, to support the police. It would, in my opinion, have been wise to have encouraged the formation of such associations, and that Government aid should have been extended, if not as a gift, as a loan; and that every payment should be made to such associations by a percentage—say a third of the whole compensation made for animals dying by the disease. I believe such a system, by enlisting the spirit of co-operation, and insuring caution and exertion, as well as economy, by means of county insurance associations, would have enabled you to grapple more effectually with the disease than by any system hitherto advocated in this House. I wish also to observe that a heavy tax is levied upon every policy issued by these associations, and I think that it would be but an act of grace and justice if the Government were to remit that heavy tax, and thus afford, at least indirectly, an encouragement to exertions for staying this plague on the part not only of the authorities, but of every member of the agricultural body who becomes a member of such association.

MR. LEEMAN said, he wished to ask if, inasmuch as the county rate was levied solely upon the occupiers and not upon the owners of property; and as the evils that result from the cattle plague must, if it continue, fall largely upon the owners of property, and especially of agricultural property; the Government contemplated by this Bill giving to the tenant power to deduct any portion of the rate from his rent, and, if so, for what period?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the Bill provided that a tenant should be allowed to deduct half the amount of the special rate from the rent of his landlord, so that the burden might be equally divided between the occupier and the owner.

MR. CUMMING-BRUCE said, he could not express any decided opinion upon the clauses of the Bill; but he was quite sure that every Gentleman on both sides of the House would concur in rejoicing that Her Majesty's Government had at last, even at the eleventh hour, introduced a measure which would have the effect of relieving those concerned from the confusion caused by a multitude of authorities and jurisdictions from whom no uniform, consistent, or harmonious directions could be expected. It was only that morning that he had received a letter from the clerk of the peace for the county which he represented (Elginshire). The magistrates of the county had forbidden the use of the markets in the county up to a certain date, but the clerk to the magistrates at Elgin had stated in a letter that, unless the Morayshire Farmers' Club would guarantee compensation to those who sustained losses through the suspension of the cattle market, the magistrates of the town had resolved to take no steps to prevent the holding of the ensuing cattle market. He thought they might congratulate themselves on getting rid of this kind of local self-government. He was no more an advocate for centralization than was his hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeenshire (Mr. Leslie); but it should be remembered that the present case was exceptional, and of a character which could only be met by what his hon. Friend might term despotic, or, certainly, central action. He must say that he felt extremely glad that they had at last a measure presented by the Government which he thought might be made efficient and useful. Some points, however, he had hoped to see dealt with with greater force, and one of these was disinfection, which might be made very serviceable, and would certainly be regarded with greater satisfaction than the rude system of slaughter with the pole-axe. An eminent professional gentleman (Dr. Dewar) had detailed in a Stirling paper a simple and efficacious process of disinfection which he had tried with exceedingly satisfactory results on twenty homesteads in the counties of Fife and Forfar, where the disease had been very prevalent. It was grounded upon the fact that no disinfectant was so successful as sulphurous acid. A piece of sulphur about the size of a man's thumb, burnt in a brazier introduced into a fire, would entirely destroy the vitality or germ of infection. He had been informed by a friend of a very remarkable case bearing on this subject. It was that of a farmer who had two cattle-sheds about 1,200 yards apart. In one of those sheds the disease was raging with more than usual violence, and the cattle in the other shed were perfectly healthy, although the farmer was continually passing from the shed where the sick and dying cattle were, to that in which were the animals free from the disease. Not alone did he pass from shed to shed, but he often went into the shed where the healthy cattle were, immediately after handling the animals suffering from disease in the other. The gentleman from whom he heard that anecdote attributed the non-communication of a disease which every one knew was exceedingly contagious entirely to the fact that the farmer used the disinfectant suggested by Dr. Dewar, and to which he (Mr. Bruce) had previously alluded. This question of disinfectants was a most important one, and he earnestly hoped that, by experiments and otherwise, it would receive the prompt and best consideration of the authorities. As to the remuneration, he did not quite understand what had been done; and he would ask the Lord Advocate to state what was its proposed effect in Scotland. He considered that while, on the one hand, the Government were now taking a most proper course, on the other, it could not be denied that the spread of the disease was in no small degree attributable to the inaction of the Government, even after the receipt of the exhaustive and excellent Report of their own Commission. Such being the case, he thought that those who had suffered by the cattle plague had a right to look to Government for some relief and assistance. He held that the remuneration ought not to be confined to any particular counties, but that such part of it as it might be thought right to levy on the agricultural interests should be levied equally on every county in Great Britain, from the Lands End to John-o'-Groats, and ought to be a national measure. He would suggest that the funds out of which this recompense was to be paid should be derived, half from the farmers and landed proprietors of districts, and half from the public funds. By this system any trickery, any effort to obtain money under false pretences from this fund, would be effectually prevented, for the proprietors and farmers of the neighbourhood having to pay half the sum disbursed, would form an excellent amateur

MR. REBOW said, he wished to briefly draw the attention of the House to a circumstance which had recently come under his notice, and which he thought of considerable importance. A short time since a vessel belonging to the Great Eastern Railway Company arrived at Harwich, in Essex, with cattle. One of these cattle was found, immediately after the vessel's arrival, to be suffering from the cattle plague, and the Government inspector directed the beast to be slaughtered and buried where it had landed. A hole was dug on the quay to receive the carcass and the animal was just about to be slaughtered when the town authorities interfered and refused to allow it to be killed or buried in Harwich. The animal was then put into a railway truck, carried seven miles along the line to the next station, and there slaughtered and buried. Now, he need not inform any practical agriculturist—any man who knew how contagious this disease was—that nothing was more calculated to cause the spread of infection than what had been done in this case by the servants of the railway company. It caused a regular panic among the farmers who lived in the neighbourhood of the station where the cow had been brought to, and the next day they crowded to the petty sessions, of which he was chairman, to complain of what certainly was a most improper act, an act for which the servants of the company had been brought up before the petty sessions bench and fined. As to the general question under discussion, he believed that the only way to check the epidemic was to entirely prohibit the moving of cattle, and to provide a quarantine and cemetery for all store cattle imported. He hoped that the Bill would contain a provision that all fat stock imported should be immediately slaughtered at the port of debarkation, and that quarantine ground and a cemetery should be provided for the store stock near the place.

MR. LIDDELL said, he congratulated the House on the question before them not having become a party one. He believed that Members of that House were all, without any distinction of party, determined to put their shoulders to the wheel to do all in their power to check the spread of a disease which had already done so much injury to the country. He took the earliest opportunity of directing the attention of the Government to what really was a very serious matter. He had in his pocket a letter from a gentleman living near Edgeworth, who informed him that in the high road near his residence there were heaps of manure which had been taken from sheds in a town in which over 100 cattle had died of the plague. He need scarcely say that no course could possibly be taken better adapted to spread the disease than this. The matter was one that deserved, and he trusted would obtain, the prompt attention of the Government. Officials should be appointed, whose duty it should be to watch over the conveyance of manure, and see that every precaution was taken against unnecessary risk of infection. It would be most improvident and unwise to endeavour to throw the whole burden of the loss upon our posterity instead of meeting it ourselves; and, therefore, Government should be prepared to deal with the financial part of the question by means of a rate, and thus avoid the objectionable plans proposed out of doors founded upon a system of rent-charges. He thought a poll tax of 5s. per head would effectually meet the requirements of the case.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: The right hon. Gentleman loudly cheered the proposition contained in the speech of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire that it would be necessary to have an open time after Lady Day next, when transfers of stock might be effected in cases where there was a change of tenancy. The conclusion I draw from this admission is that Her Majesty's Government acted wrongly in not calling Parliament together at an earlier date, as it is obvious that in so short a period as must elapse before the restriction is removed much good cannot be effected. We are told that the reason why Parliament has not been called together earlier is that at the end of last year public opinion was so immature upon the subject that had we been assembled the action of Her Majesty's Government would have been found far in advance of the proceedings Parliament would have been inclined to sanction. That is begging the entire question. I am prepared, on behalf of myself and of every Member present, to repudiate the charge that our ideas were behind those of the Government. Why, in what frame of mind, and with what knowledge, should we have come to the consideration of any measure which the Government might have proposed at the end of October and the beginning of November? We should have had in our hands the whole of that

valuable and exhaustive Report of the Royal Commission; and if the Government had been really sincere in the commendation bestowed on the Royal Commission, Parliament would have been prepared to receive a Bill based on the recommendation of that Commission, and so have paid it the attention it deserved. There is, then, no justification for the statement of Government, that the Parliament would not have been prepared to deal with the measure in an early Session. I ask the Committee to look at the provisions contained and to be contained in the Bill about to be submitted. Does any hon. Member who heard the clear statement of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department believe that a Bill dealing with so vast a complication of objects, with omissions here and exceptions there, and embracing a whole course of sanitary regulations, can be passed within a period when it could be effectual in stamping out the disease? The right hon. Gentleman himself has given us a pretty broad hint that Government will be obliged to divide the Bill into two or three separate measures, merely proceeding with those measures which it is essential should be speedily passed. The more I reflect on the measure sketched forth, and on the speeches which have been delivered, the less becomes the prospect of a satisfactory measure at the hands of the Government. The Government have been threatened, and no wonder, with a rival Bill from my hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire. How is that rival Bill to be considered? The Government is going to allow its introduction; but the second reading of the Government Bill is fixed for Ash Wednesday, and the House does not meet until two o'clock. Is my hon. Friend's Bill to be taken on Ash Wednesday after the Government Bill has been discussed? This kind of legislation, I fear, on so critical a subject, is likely to run the risk of complete failure. I feel so deeply on this subject, that at the risk of the charge of making yet another suggestion to the Government, I should propose that as the Government cannot carry this great and complicated measure within a reasonable period of time, they should proceed by way of Resolution in both Houses of Parliament, which will test the opinion of the Legislature on many important points. Orders in Council might be issued immediately founded on those Resolutions. If that were done the House could then proceed to the consideration of the great and complicated proposals of the Government, and to permanent legislation on the subject. But I must say, after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, that if we are going to legislate on the principle that the first thing to be considered is how the temporary wants of the great towns of this country are to be supplied, and the next how the extinction of the cattle plague is to be accomplished, legislation will inevitably fail to produce the latter object. But if, on the other hand, we legislate on the principle that the cattle plague is first to be extinguished, whatever temporary inconvenience might be felt by the manufacturing towns, success may, and probably will, with the blessing of Providence, crown our efforts. That principle lies at the root of the matter, and I regret that the Home Secretary should have said that, from information derived from deputations and Mr. Thompson, he was disposed to give a temporary convenience to the manufacturing towns of the West Riding precedence over measures for the extinction of the cattle plague itself. I should like to know whether during the month which has elapsed since Mr. Thompson's letter was written the terrible strides made by the plague are not calculated to alter the opinions of men even more influential than Mr. Thompson? I am convinced that if Mr. Thompson had consulted the great body of the people, they would not have hesitated a moment in recommending not the palliation merely, but the extinction, if possible, of this terrible visitation. With respect to the manufacturing towns in the West Riding, the right hon. Gentleman says the Bill will be based on the practice which now prevails in the West Riding, the practice in the North Riding being different. But is the practice of the West Riding so successful? Have the results in the West Riding been so successful that the House will be justified in giving that practice the effect of law? I find it stated in the last Report of the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council, that in the week ending the 3rd February sixty-two fresh centres of infection of the plague had broken out in the West Riding. I find that 470 animals have been attacked in the last week in the West Riding. But it is confessed that that return is incomplete, for in a note it is added that "especially from Yorkshire" the returns are not complete, and it is likely that the gentleman who drew up the report would find, not a decrease, but an increase in the fresh cases occurring in that part of the country. What reason, in fact, have we to hope that this plan recommended by the Home Secretary, and now carried on and failing in Yorkshire, will meet with any success at all? The right hon. Gentleman says that great difficulty would be felt in slaughtering cattle if all removals were positively prohibited, and in providing proper slaughtering places, and afterwards transmitting the meat to the large centres of consumption. Difficulty there may be, but can anyone suppose that so great an evil can be got rid of without some trouble and annoyance. On the part of the agricultural community, I ask are they not subjecting themselves willingly and with alacrity to every amount of inconvenience and pecuniary loss at the present moment? And are they to be the only classes to be called on by legislators to bear inconvenience and pecuniary loss for the sake of a great public advantage? Does anybody mean to say that in localities adjoining these manufacturing towns means for slaughtering animals could not be devised at a small cost? and I appeal to any chairman of railway companies in the House, to the hon. Member for South Lincolnshire, the Chairman of the Great Northern Railway, whether there would be any practical difficulty in conveying dead meat by railway to the north? Means and appliances in this direction would not be found wanting. From any measure the north-western portions of Scotland ought to be exempted, as by their geographical position they enjoy a complete immunity, and stand on precisely the same footing as Ireland. There is a clear geographical boundary in those districts beyond which nobody has hitherto succeeded in passing any cattle. With these exceptions at this late period of the calamity the only sound principle is the total and entire prohibition of the removal of all cattle throughout the country for a limited period. As to other principles of the Bill relating to compensation and the prohibition of all imported cattle inland, I have not a single observation to offer. With respect to the latter, I think the principle sound; but I think that the whole machinery of the measure is so complicated that it cannot become law in a reasonable time. The only sound principle to adopt under the circumstances is that the House of Commons

should declare that, for a limited period, there should be a total prohibition. My own belief is that the whole of these complicated, costly, vexatious, inconvenient, and interfering provisions of the Bill proposed by the right hon. Gentleman will fail in the one result we have in view—namely, in the extinction of this frightful cattle plague within the period contemplated by the Government. I make these observations with great reluctance, as I had been in hopes, from many parts of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, that the Bill might have received the hearty concurrence of the House. But after the debate which has occurred, and after the full explanation given by the right hon. Gentleman, I feel convinced that such concurrence will not be had, and that the measure, based on the principle announced, will not succeed in the object which I feel sure every Gentleman in this Committee has at heart.

MR. CARNEGIE said, it was not his intention to go into the merits of the Bill of the Government further than to remark that it appeared to him that by the principle of compensation proposed those counties which had suffered most from the cattle plague would suffer most by the assessment. The benefit to be derived would be in exact inverse ratio to the assessment. Therefore in some counties, as in the one he himself represented (Forfarshire), where nearly all the cattle had been swept away, the people would be called on to pay very large rates for stamping out the plague; whereas those counties where the disease did not exist would have to pay absolutely nothing. Now that was manifestly unfair and unjust. The rate should be a general one extending over the whole country. This was not only a stockowners' question, but a consumers' question, and therefore extending over the whole country. The consumers were at this moment paying for the effects of the cattle plague—it was answered—in the increased price of meat. To a certain extent they were; but if the cattle plague were not stamped out they would have to pay twice as much. To a certain extent the burden ought to fall on them, but that that burden should fall on those localities least able to pay was manifestly unjust, and he should oppose any such proposal to the utmost of his power. He could not see the justice of the distinction sought to be drawn by the right hon. Gentleman between compensating the owners of cattle slaughtered by order of the Government inspectors, and not compensating those owners whose cattle were, if he might use the term, allowed to die by order of the inspectors. Any retrospective measure, he thought, ought not to recognize any such distinction. He protested against their taxing those who had already lost stock for those who had as yet not suffered any loss. Such counties as Aberdeenshire who by their energy had stamped out the plague—who had paid money out of their pockets for effecting that object—should be repaid that expense, and thereby be placed in the same position as other counties were to be under the proposed arrangement. The gentlemen of Aberdeenshire ought not to be losers by the benefit they had conferred on the country.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he wished to offer two suggestions, by the adoption of which the Government might, he considered, improve their measure. The right hon. Baronet (Sir George Grey) proposed that all diseased animals should, of necessity, be killed; but that as to those animals which had come into contact with disease animals, and had thereby become infected, it should be left to the local authorities to decide whether they should be slaughtered or not. This, he thought, was radically wrong. If they desired to stamp out the plague they must do as other countries had done, and slaughter not only the diseased but also the infected animals. The example of Aberdeenshire had been adduced as perfect; but what had they done there? They were not content with destroying merely such animals as had the disease, but they bought up the whole herd and killed it. He now came to his second suggestion. He agreed with the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners), that they must entirely stop all movement of cattle. The right hon. Baronet had warned them that if they did that they must resort to a dead-meat market; but he did not show that any evil would result from adopting that alternative. Many advantages would, in his (Lord Robert Montagu's) opinion, attend the establishing of a dead-meat market. At present, animals often suffered a great deal in travelling to market; and, moreover, the bones, hides, hoofs, and offal of cattle, to the extent of many thousands of tons, were now brought long distances into large towns, where they were utterly useless, and therefore they had to be sent away again to some place where they were wanted for manufacturing or manuring purposes—thus entailing much needless trouble and expense. All that would be obviated by the establishment of dead-meat markets. Besides, by establishing dead-meat markets a further advantage would be gained. A beast purchased from the farmer or grazier in the London market for £28 was retailed by the butcher for £40; consequently, the inhabitants of towns were paying more for their meat than they would have to do by the establishment of dead-meat markets. But it was said, "Oh, but meat was a perishable commodity; if it came up to town one day and was not then bought, it must be sold next day so much cheaper." But what was the Home Secretary going to do? He said they might send their fat cattle to market, but they must not take them back again. But when the butchers knew that the cattle could not be taken away again, would they not be sure to hang back in buying them until the seller consented to yield them up for far less than their value? The consequence of that regulation would be to deprive the farmer of the full price of his cattle, while the result of a dead-meat market would be to enable the public to get their meat at a cheaper rate. The Home Secretary, he might add, had made no provision for the movement of cattle from Ireland, from which, as hon. Gentlemen were well aware, the cattle fattened in England to a considerable extent came. By that means an injury would be done, not only to the English grazier, but to the Irish farmer also, who found in this country the best market for his stock. Now, too, that no cattle were being bred in England, we must in the spring resort to Ireland for a supply; and, therefore, it was, he thought, desirable that the cattle from Ireland, being free from infection, should be allowed to be landed at our quays, and taken straight to the grazing ground. Next came the question of compensation. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to give a compensation amounting to two-thirds of the value of every diseased animal killed, and three-quarters of the value of those animals which might be slaughtered without showing any symptoms of the plague. It was, however, in his (Lord Robert Montagu's) opinion, a most arbitrary proceeding to say to the farmer, "You must have your cattle killed in the interest of the country," and not to acknowledge his right to ask for full compensation for the loss which he sustained. It must not be forgotten, also, that every restriction placed upon a particular industry spoilt the sale of the article which that industry supplied, and that thus the value of cattle would be diminished under the operation of the stringent rules about to be laid down. This large interference with private property, as well as the extensive slaughter of cattle, were to be carried out for the good of the public. The farmer, under those circumstances, had a right, he contended, to demand full compensation. The question was one in which, not only he, but the large towns—in short, the whole country—were interested; but what did the Home Secretary propose? He proposed to relieve the farmer by laying on his shoulders one-third of the two-thirds which he intended to give him in the shape of compensation. Now, for his own part, he could not see, as everybody in the country was interested in stamping out the plague, that there would be anything unfair in making good out of the Consolidated Fund the loss of capital which the farmer must sustain.

MR. MARSH said, he quite concurred with the noble Lord as to the expediency of killing all cattle which had come into contact with those which happened to have been diseased. A committee of the Legislative Council of New South Wales, of which he was a member, had succeeded in completely stamping out disease in that way. He did not know how it was with cattle; but from his experience in the management of sheep, he was able to state that the disorder by which they were attacked sometimes remained latent for five or six months before breaking out.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I wish, Sir, to call attention to one part of the right hon. Baronet's statement, which I confess does not appear to me altogether clear. I cannot but think that if Her Majesty's Government consider that the plague requires a short and sharp remedy they must feel that the delay which has already taken place is very much to be deplored. We are legislating when nearly arriving at a period when the movement of cattle is an absolute necessity. Therefore we are legislating under difficulties, and so far as I can understand from the right hon. Baronet's speech, very much in the same way as we have been going on under the Orders in Council which have preceded it. A great deal is to be thrown on the local authorities; but I am at a loss to understand what those local authorities are to be. Petty sessional divisions under the Orders in Council have not given the slightest security for carrying out the rules and regulations ordered, because we have seen the same Orders carried out with vigilance and care in one division, whilst through negligence they have been ineffectual in another. Power was then transferred from the petty sessions to the quarter sessions. But who are they—a body composed of persons having each a separate knowledge of the different localities, which differ with regard to agriculture, stock, &c., as much as one county differ from another. Nor is there any possibility of such a large body as that acting together for purposes such as would be required in this case. What local authority was to be called on to say what cattle were diseased and what cattle were infected the right hon. Baronet had not explained. How was it possible that a changing body of from forty to fifty, or 100 persons, meeting in the county town, could come to any decision with respect to the putting to death suspected cattle in remote parts of the county? I wish to have it explained whether the quarter sessions are to lay down rules for the whole county; that whenever cattle come into contact with diseased stock, both shall be killed, or whether they are to examine special cases that may happen on any particular farm? If the latter, it must be done by some authority independent of the quarter sessions; but if the former, then there is no reason why the House should not legislate in the first instance, because we are quite as competent to do it as the quarter sessions are to decide it generally for the counties. Power is also to be given to quarter sessions to appoint committees, who are to adjourn from time to time, in the same mode as the sessions. In that case they will be a perfectly useless body, because who will then give the orders to kill the cattle as each case arises? Is a committee to be appointed in each petty sessional division, sitting with the power of quarter sessions or one committee for the whole of the county, adjourning from time to time as the sessions? If so all the labour expended on this proceeding, so far as the interference of the local authorities is concerned, will be completely thrown away. I admit it is a difficult question to deal with, because whichever way we turn we are met by interests antagonistic to each other—it is a consumers' case as well as a producers' case, and it is difficult to reconcile both. The question requires to be promptly dealt with; and I hope the House of Commons will not hesitate to decide peremptorily and absolutely what shall be done during the five or six weeks which remain before a removal of cattle will be necessarily called for, and not leave the matter in the hands of local authorities, fluctuating as they may be, overruling the decisions one of the other, and thus throwing things into a state of confusion.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL said, that in the county he had the honour to represent (Berkshire), so soon as the Orders in Council permitted, the magistrates put into effect the most stringent regulations, so as not even to allow the moving of cattle across a road. At that time the disease prevailed in five different portions of the county, and in the eastern part of the county not less than 3,000 cattle had died of the disease. From the moment, however, the stringent orders of the magistrates were carried into operation the disease began to die out, and it had now completely and entirely died out, except in the borough of Windsor, over which the orders of the county justices had no control. Unfortunately, a diseased animal had been brought by railway from the Metropolitan Market to Windsor, and the disease still continued to prevail there. He should not have ventured to offer any suggestions to the Committee if he had not had reason to think that the difficulty of a dead-meat market was not so serious as it appeared. In his parish, where the orders against removal were so stringent that the cattle could not be moved across the road, the farmers sent for the butcher and had their beasts slaughtered on the spot. One farmer who had twelve fat beasts sent for a butcher from Reading, who slaughtered them. He said, "I was not able to dress them quite up to the town pattern." He (Sir Charles Russell) asked the butcher whether, as matter of food and good meat, the flesh was inferior to that dressed under the most careful process. The butcher said it was not; and added, that it would be as saleable as the town pattern if they had the advantage of dressing it in the same way. He had been that day in communication with the Chairman and Deputy Chairman of the Great Western Railway Company on this very subject of the dead-meat supply, and had been told by them that they were prepared to give up very commodious premises at Paddington for a dead-meat market. At present, fish came from the seaboard to Paddington. There it was unpacked, and when the consignees had taken out sufficient for the London supply, the remainder was repacked and sent to the various towns in the kingdom. The same thing might take place in regard to dead meat. It might come up in carcass, and, although the directors were not vendors of meat, yet they would make arrangements for its reception, and, by the aid of the telegraph, it might be returned to all the towns on the line where it was wanted. The managers of the railways said it was impossible to become acquainted with all the different orders made by the thirty or forty local authorities of the boroughs and counties through which the line ran. He should not have risen, but that he wished to mention a practical matter which might help to solve a very difficult question.

MR. AYRTON said, that if hon. Gentlemen opposite were wise, they were wise after the event. He had no wisdom; and he had risen to ask for some information as to what was proposed to be done relative to the metropolis. The circumstances of the metropolis were very peculiar, and it had, no doubt justly, come in for a large share of condemnation in regard to the propagation of the disease. No doubt the metropolis and the large towns had been the centres and sources of the disease in this country. The manner in which the cattle had been imported was most unsatisfactory. The metropolis had, unfortunately, no municipal institutions strong enough to deal with the circumstances of the case, for the cattle had been brought together under the best conditions for allowing any infected animal to give the disease to the rest. He went to see the cattle on their arrival, and it was surprising to find what was left undone when so little authority would have cured the evil. The place in which the cattle were collected was not paved; and they were wallowing knee-deep in compost, under circumstances most favourable to the diffusion of the disorder. He had not heard the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) say anything of the way in which the Bill proposed to deal with the dairies of London. They obtained much of the food of the cows from the London breweries, but they received other food from the country. This food was brought in carts, and the manure of the cattle was taken back in the same carts. Was not this practice calculated to propagate the disease; and did the Government intend to propose any measure with regard to the distribution of manure in the metropolis? How was it to be got into the country? He was told that the regulations were so unsuited to dairies in London that everybody connected with them conspired to set the Orders in Council at defiance. These persons could hardly be blamed, for if the disease attacked his dairy what was the dairyman to do? He could not convert his dairy into a slaughterhouse, and he could not bury the animals in his dairy, so the cows were removed along the road. He (Mr. Ayrton) was told that the dead cattle and the live cattle were brought to the same depository in London, with the concurrence of those charged to stop the disease. He trusted that the Government would have some explanation, so that the large body of persons interested in the supply of milk in the metropolis might know their position. He was glad to think that the London milk had vindicated its character at last, for he heard great complaints of the milk that came from the country. People said it was not the churning it got on the railway, but the quantity of water that was put into it before it was sent off.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, the disposal of manure was undoubtedly a very important question, and he hoped that it would receive the best consideration of the Government. It was not his intention to occupy, upon that occasion, the time of the Committee in arraigning the conduct of the Government further than by making the single observation that he believed it would hardly be denied by any one that if they had called Parliament together three months ago they might have prevented the loss which the country had since sustained of 120,000 head of cattle. He had listened with much attention to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary; and he believed that it referred mainly to three points to which he (Sir Fitzroy Kelly) proposed at that moment to confine his observations. He felt convinced that if the Government had adopted the three measures—first, of the destruction of all diseased cattle; secondly, of the isolation of cattle suspected of having been exposed to the infection; and, thirdly, of the absolute, total, and immediate stoppage of the passage of all cattle from one part of Great Britain to another—he felt convinced that if the Government had adopted those measures many months ago, or if they were to adopt them, at the present time, the ravages of the malady would, within the space of one month, be stayed. He did not say, however, that they might not exempt from the operation of the last of those three measures that part of Scotland north-west of the Caledonian Canal, and also those Welsh counties, in which no traces of the disease existed, provided these counties could be completely isolated. One exception of great importance might be made—namely, that where no disease existed, instead of obliging the butcher to go to a farm to slaughter the animal, there was no reason why, under a licence and certificate, the farmer should not be permitted to send the animal to the butcher to be slaughtered. If the measure should be properly framed and satisfactorily carried out, he believed that the disease might even now be put an end to within a month. With respect to the duty on policies, he had communicated with the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject of the hardship of taking the stamp duty on policies made under the different Cattle Insurance Associations; and he must say that the right hon. Gentleman, with great promptitude and liberality, had consented to the use of the smallest stamp which, under a liberal construction of the statute, the law required the Government to demand, and an intimation was held out that it would be for Parliament to consider whether the small stamp itself might not be dispensed with or the duty returned. With regard to compensation, it appeared to him to be a most inexplicable species of legislation to impose upon the very class of persons who had suffered so grievously from the calamity the greater proportion of the tax which was to be levied in order to make good the loss. Unless an exception should be made in favour of those who had sustained losses they would take, in the shape of a rate, a tax out of the pockets of the owners of cattle, who were no more to blame than the consumers of meat for the calamity under which the country was suffering, and he did not see why the nation at large should not make good the loss. He hoped in whatever form the Bill might pass there would be no qualification of those measures which alone could ensure the extinction of the disease.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he rose not to take part in the general discussion, but simply to explain with respect to Scotland that very strong opinions were intimated in various quarters that the local authorities should consist of a Board, one-half composed of landowners and the other half of tenant farmers.

MR. BANKS STANHOPE said, he preferred the Bill of his hon. Friend the Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt). The radical evil of the Government Bill was that it said "you may" do such and such things. The result would be that if the magistrates at quarter sessions in one county kindly chose to yield to the feeling of a number of farmers, the farmers in the next county might find themselves placed in an unfair position by a different bench of magistrates. As to giving facilities for transmitting live cattle to the markets in London and Manchester a difference would be made between the live-meat market and the dead-meat market, which would cause considerable dissatisfaction. The Government appeared to be trying to put an end to the disease by acting pretty nearly on the same system as that which had been found so thoroughly useless and absurd. He was astonished at one thing which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey). Under his Bill there was to be a new system of extended licence and extended movement for cattle—whether for fat, lean, or store cattle. At present, in Lincolnshire, cattle only meant for slaughter might be sent to the butcher or to the station. The consequence of the system was that instead of isolation there was propagation. Another point on which the Bill of his hon. Friend was superior to that of the Government was, that by providing for a month's cessation of the transit ample time would be given for properly cleansing the trucks, an operation for which the right hon. Baronet's Bill did not give sufficient time. With regard to the introduction of Irish cattle, it had been asked what objection could there be to letting them come into the country provided a sufficient licence was obtained at Liverpool. But on arriving at Liverpool they might meet with other cattle who might communicate the disease to them; and if they travelled two or three hundred miles who was to certify that the cattle on their arrival at their destination were perfectly pure. Last year there was a fair at Peterborough, from which place the disease was spread through Northamptonshire, Huntingdonshire, Lincolnshire, and Bedfordshire, by means of cattle brought at Peterborough, which started pure from Ireland, and pure from Liverpool. [Lord ROBERT MONTAGU said, he believed that the cattle had been to market.] The cattle might catch the disease in Liverpool or in the railway trucks. At present a strong fear existed in Ireland lest the drover took the cattle plague back with him, and many of the people in that country desired to have a dead meat traffic.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I wish to answer two or three questions which have been put to me during the course of this discussion; and first, as to the local authority in counties, I have to explain what that local authority is. It is intended that the local authority in a county shall be the quarter or general sessions. The hon. Gentleman who put a question on this subject (Mr. Hardy), said that there was a total want of uniformity in the regulations made by the justices in petty sessions. The hon. Gentleman is no doubt aware that I wrote a circular to the chairmen of quarter sessions in October last pointing out the importance of concert, and the desirableness of securing as much uniformity as possible. I do not know whether there is throughout the country generally such a total want of uniformity as the hon. Member supposes; but I may instance, as an example of success in obtaining uniformity of action, the county of Sussex, where uniform regulations had been made by common action amongst the justices of the petty sessions. With this view the quarter sessions were substituted for the petty sessions, throwing the jurisdiction over a wider area and securing greater uniformity. But, said the hon. Gentleman, what are quarter sessions? They consist of a great many gentlemen who come some from one part of the county and some from another, knowing only what is connected with their own districts. Now, that is precisely the commendation of the quarter sessions. You secure the agency of a body of gentlemen thoroughly conversant with the agricultural operations of every part of the county. Then as to the formation of committees, it is impossible for large bodies to act in a matter of this kind with the promptitude and decision required; it is therefore proposed that there shall be power of appointing at quarter sessions an executive committee, authorized to associate with them, if they think fit, a certain number of persons qualified as rated occupiers in their respective districts. Nor can there be any objection to the proposal, as it is a common practice for the quarter sessions to appoint committees with delegated powers for particular purposes. The hon. and gallant Member for Berks (Sir Charles Russell) said I had quoted the practice at quarter sessions against absolute prohibition, and he said that his own county had adopted absolute prohibition. I believe that hardly any county has done so; the general course has been to put restrictions on the removal of cattle, and adapt them to the circumstances of each case. He says that in Berkshire absolute prohibition is enforced. That was, I believe, the fact as to the first Order. I am not aware of any other county in which so strict a prohibition is enforced. But shortly after the Order was made at quarter sessions, certain exceptions were found absolutely essential. Various exceptions were made in the second Order—

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL: Because the disease had been stamped out.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I am glad to hear that; but I am afraid Berkshire is not returned among the counties entirely free from the disease.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL: It is only with regard to Windsor, which is returned in the other list, and that I thought I had explained.

SIR GEORGE GREY: As to dead-meat markets being substituted for cattle markets, I expressed an opinion the other day that such a change would be desirable; but I believe it will take a considerable time to effect it throughout the country. I do not think it can be done in a week or a month. Whenever it can be done now let it be done at once. It is in the power of the local authorities to prevent the removal of cattle. The hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. Banks Stanhope) seems to be under the impression that by this Bill we are taking away from the local authorities power to keep cattle from coming into districts within their jurisdiction, or to regulate their movements. His mistake must arise from some want of clearness in my statement. He appears to think that Irish cattle, for instance, might go into any part of the country; but cattle coming from Ireland will be subject to the same restrictions as all other cattle, and can only go to places open for the sale of cattle with the permission of the local authorities. As to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for East Suffolk (Sir FitzRoy Kelly), I really thought I had got an antagonist—one who was prepared to advocate for a general prohibition of removal without any exceptions whatever. The Bill of the hon. Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) contains so many exceptions to its general powers that it cannot be called an unconditional measure. My hon. and learned Friend said the evil ought to be met by an absolute unconditional and immediate prohibition; but as soon as he ventured on so large a proposition he began with his exceptions. It was proposed at first in St. James' Hall that the absolute prohibition should be only in respect of infected districts. That exception was afterwards struck out; but my hon. and learned Friend says that as to applying the Order to places quite free from the disease, no man in his senses would think of it. According to my hon. and learned Friend, it ought not to be applied to places not infected; and then he goes on with his system of licences, which would make his plan as conditional as that of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire. If there be a difference between the proposals of hon. Gentlemen opposite and the proposal of the Government, it is this—We think that, instead of including in the Bill every possible cure and exception, we may trust to the intelligence, good sense, and right feeling of the magistrates; but hon. Gentlemen on the other side have an absolute distrust of the local authorities whose co-operation we think essential. We are willing to give a certain amount of discretion to the local authorities; while the hon. Gentleman opposite thinks it necessary to insert every exception in the Bill, leaving no discretion whatever to the local authorities. By attempting to do what they propose we could scarcely fail to omit some of the necessary exceptions, at the same time that we should be depriving the local authorities of the power of supplying the omission. When persons have requested that the Government would make rules applicable to the whole country, I have asked them, "What general rule would you suggest?" Invariably the answer has been, "Take the rule we have laid down in our county." But a rule suited to one county may not be suited to another, and hence the difficulty of making any absolute and general regulation. The only other question asked me was that put by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr.

Ayrton). The district comprised within the area of the Metropolitan Board of Works has been excepted from the counties of which it forms a part by the Orders of Council. Originally, inspectors appointed by the Clerk of the Council acted throughout the metropolitan police district, which is of much wider extent, for the area between the district of the Metropolitan Board of Works and that of the metropolitan police is a very large one. Now, the area under the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Board of Works alone is left to the Privy Council. The licences in the district will be given by the Commissioner of Police. It is necessary for purposes of taxation that the organization of the Board of Works shall be made use of, and assistance will be given by the police in enforcing the regulations. With regard to manure, very ample powers are now given to the authorities, and these powers will be continued by the Bill; but it is quite impossible that the whole of the manure of London, or that of any other large town, can remain in the town itself without the risk of producing disease. The regulations as to manure will be left therefore as they are by the present Orders, to the local authorities.

LORD BURGHLEY said, with reference to the powers to be vested in the local authorities, that it was the part of the Government to issue the necessary Orders throughout the country. In reference to one remark which had fallen from the right hon. Baronet (Sir George Grey), who said that the Government had conceived that the compulsory slaughter of infected animals was the best course to be taken, and that they had given orders to that effect, but the farmers would not consent to it, he wished to observe that many of the individuals appointed as inspectors were not qualified to judge as to whether beasts had the rinderpest or not; moreover, no compensation was offered by the Government for this compulsory slaughter, and of course everybody objected to it. The right hon. Baronet had also said that there could not be found in our ports a sufficient number of slaughterhouses in which to slaughter so large a number of beasts in so short a time. He would remind the House, however, that the rinderpest was not a plague indigenous to this country, but it had been imported from abroad. Every year the extension of railways into those countries where the Steppe murrain is indigenous brings the plague nearer and nearer to this kingdom, and the Government ought to take this fact into their serious consideration. We shall be obliged, sooner or later, to order slaughterhouses to be erected in those seaport towns where cattle are imported from foreign countries, and he thought the sooner the Government gave those orders the better. The rinderpest may, under Providence, be stamped out for a time, but unless we take proper precautions at those ports where cattle are landed from abroad, we shall never prevent its re-introduction into this country.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, that the Order referred to by the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary as having been made in Sussex was one for the eastern division only. Another and a different Order was made for the western division. This showed that local authorities did not all agree, and that difficulties were sure to arise under a permissive Bill. He had hoped that this class of legislation would have gone out with the last Parliament. During the last Parliament they had nothing but permissive Bills; but it seemed they were to have them still. If the right hon. Gentleman had brought in a Bill of five clauses, in such a measure he might have embraced all that was necessary. Though he might have caused inconvenience to some persons, he would have stamped out the disease. He believed, from the length of the right hon. Gentleman's speech in introducing it, that his Bill would consist of, at least, 100 clauses. It would take a long time to go through it, and the magistrates would require a long time to enable them to master its details.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that if the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for West Sussex would draw up a Bill of five clauses which would contain every provision necessary for the stamping out of the cattle plague, the Government would feel much indebted to him.

Resolution agreed to.

LEGAL PENSIONS BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to the granting of Pensions to persons holding certain offices connected with the Administration of Justice. The House was aware with regard to pensions in general that the great majority of them were paid out of the funds of the Treasury, and were subject to the provisions of the Superannuation Acts. With regard, however, to some Pensions in Chancery, Lunacy, and Bankruptcy, Parliament had given power to the Lord Chancellor of granting them, and of determining their amount, and the circumstances under which they were to be granted. Now, that was a power which it was not desirable to continue; indeed, the only reason why the power of granting such pensions had been bestowed on the Lord Chancellor was that they were paid out of funds under his control. The subject, it would be remembered, excited a good deal of attention last Session: and it was then felt by the Government, that it was equally desirable for the public, and for the Lord Chancellor, that the practical responsibility and control should be vested in the same department, which exercised it in other cases. The object of the present Bill was to put, as far as was possible, all legal pensions under the control of the Treasury. Judges of the Court of Chancery and the Courts of Common Law, would not come within the operation of the Act, which, however, would apply to all persons of a lower degree holding offices connected with the Administration of Justice in those Courts. The Lord Chancellor would still make the final orders for payment of pensions payable out of the funds under his control.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend the Law relating to the granting of Pensions and Superannuation Allowances to persons holding certain offices connected with the administration of justice in England, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. CHILDERS.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 8.]

LABOURING CLASSES' DWELLINGS BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. CHILDERS said, he begged to move for leave to bring in a Bill to enable the Public Works Loan Commissioners to make advances towards the erection of dwellings for the labouring classes in populous places. He would describe in a few words the present state of the law as to facilities for the erection of houses for the labouring classes. By the Act 14 & 15 Vict. c. 34, passed in 1851, power was given to town councils and local boards, and to the vestries of parishes exceeding 10,000 inhabitants, to borrow money from the Public Works Loan Commissioners for the erection and furnishing of lodging-houses for the working-classes. The regulations under which loans were to be made under that Act were those usually adopted by the Government when advances were made for public works. Practically, however, that Act never came into operation, for only one application was made to the Public Works Loan Commissioners for the erection of dwellings for the labouring classes. In the year 1855 another Act was passed, the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 132, under which companies might be formed with special powers to erect dwellings—and not lodging-houses merely—for the labouring classes in populous places. That Act, however, conferred no power of borrowing money from the Public Works Loan Commissioners and it proved also a failure; for he believed that the Government Office, within the cognizance of which the provisions of the Act came, had not received more than one communication on the subject. Already the Public Works Loan Commissioners had power to grant loans at moderate rates of interest for other purposes connected with the sanitary arrangements of great towns, such as the removal of nuisances and the utilization of sewage; and he now proposed, by the measure which he asked leave to introduce, to extend the power conferred by the Act 14 & 15 Vict. to minor local authorities in all parishes, to public companies, and even to private persons, who would thus be enabled to obtain from the Public Works Loan Commissioners advances to the extent of not more than half the cost of the buildings proposed to be erected, and at a rate of interest of 4 per cent, payable by the usual instalments, and according to the same conditions as loans for public works. The ordinary operation of the Act would be as follows:—All questions of interest and repayment would be left, as now, to the Treasury, subject to the general rules of the Exchequer Commissioners, and the first Commissioner of Works would certify as to whether buildings proposed to be erected or improved under the Act were really suited as dwellings for the labouring classes. The Public Works Loan Commissioners would only have to satisfy themselves as to the security and the due payment of the instalments. The general question had largely occupied public attention during the last few years, and the object with which it had been discussed was likely to be promoted considerably by the operation of this Bill. In the Session of 1863 the attention of Parliament was, for the first time, specially called to the effect upon the condition of the poor in populous places of the great public improvements which were being effected in the metropolis and other large cities; in that Session an unusually large number of Bills were introduced for extending railway communication, and an opinion which pervaded the debates of that Session, and particularly those of 1864, was that, while these measures were really public improvements, as he believed they were, they ought to be accompanied by some measure giving additional facility for the construction of the displaced dwellings of the poor. He need not remind them of what private munificence had done. It happened most opportunely that they had been able that morning to read that most generous letter by Mr. George Peabody, in which he stated the conditions upon which he proposed to supplement the most munificent donation which he had given to the poor of the metropolis. The trustees had therefore £250,000 as the nucleus of a fund for large operations in the direction proposed by this Bill. He (Mr. Childers) should not be doing wrong to refer to the urgent necessity for and the result of their operations as stated in their Report, printed last December. They said—

“At the present moment, owing to the vast changes in the metropolis, by which the houses of the labouring poor have been demolished to so great an extent, the cost of accommodation for them has been greatly increased. It, of course, varies in different localities; but, on an average, the weekly charge for a single room of a very poor description is from 2s. 6d. to 3s.; for two rooms, 5s. or 5s. 6d.; and for three, from 6s. 6d. to 7s.”

In a note, it was stated—

“In London, unless steps are taken, the poor bid fair to be thrust out of house and home, and to have no place left to dwell in. Our Street Improvement Acts and our railway demolitions are turning out the poor by thousands. Even in our crowded and deplorable districts, such as the streets and alleys running out of Drury Lane and in the region of Seven Dials, apartments are not to be had; and the rents in some neighbourhoods have been raised 50 per cent. A respectable omnibus conductor in our neighbourhood, who seeks to have two rooms, dingy and small, to accommodate five persons, pays 7s. a week. A wretched family, where the husband never brings to his home more than 12s. per week, and often less (where there are five children), pays 5s. a week for two low, damp kitchens. But the mere test of rent affords no adequate standard by which to contrast the squalor and discomfort of one of these tenements with the light and airy and agreeable apartments in the Peabody buildings; and for one room there the charge per week is 2s. 6d.; for two rooms, 4s.; and for three rooms, 5s."

So far, the trustees of Mr. Peabody's gift, for £60,000, had provided accommodation for 850 persons; and, even on this moderate scale, the rents realized gave favourable promise for similar undertakings. He would also refer to the report in that morning's paper of the society which had been formed for the erection of improved dwellings for the working classes, which showed that the investment of capital in these buildings, with moderate assistance such as the Bill proposed, might be expected to produce a fair Return. Upon the relations of supply and demand, he would quote a report presented a few weeks ago to the Metropolitan Board of Works by Mr. Bazalgette, who said—

"The effect, however, of all metropolitan railway and street improvements is the destruction of large masses of houses, the occupants of which are driven towards the suburbs, and the area of London is thereby extended. The Railway Bills of the present Session include within their limits of deviation about 16,000 houses. Now, assuming one-half of that number of houses only to be destroyed, this would amount to one-sixtieth part of all the houses in London, and the occupants of these must find homes nearer to the suburbs, and will require ready means of access to the centre."

He need hardly say that the great majority of the houses referred to were those of the labouring classes, for whom other dwellings ought to be found. He believed the effect of this Bill would be greatly to assist the desired provision, and he thought he had stated sufficient to justify its introduction. The House would have other opportunities of considering its details.

Mr. KINNAIRD said, he could hardly express the satisfaction with which he heard the proposal of the Government to meet an evil admitted on all hands, and proved by the statistics which the hon. Gentleman had quoted. He had stated that he was far from deprecating any of those improvements in the metropolis which must follow upon the great demolition of houses which was going on. While glad that Government proposed to meet the immediately resulting evil, he would suggest whether, as there were large districts which were nothing better than fever-producing and pauper-producing districts, compulsory powers, such as those conferred on railways, could not be vested in the Home Office or some other authority which could judge of the condition of these localities, to remedy in some measure the excessive evils which resulted from overcrowding. He hoped that this Session, if the Government did not, some private Member would introduce a measure which should confer power on a competent authority to do something for porters and others who were compelled to live near to where they were employed. The power so conferred could be exercised gradually so as to inflict the least amount of inconvenience inseparable from the wholesale demolition of houses by railway companies, and in this way a useful remedy could be applied to an existing evil without those hardships consequent upon railway extension. While wishing to see such a measure as that he suggested brought forward, he heartily supported that now introduced.

Mr. LOCKE said, that the granting of compulsory powers for public purposes had not always proceeded on consistent, or even beneficial, principles. But, as applied to the removal of nests of fever and the creation of suitable dwelling places for the labouring classes, the question became of general interest and acquired an importance second to none. Dr. Ferguson had shown the effects of overcrowding in fever generating districts; and when such districts were discovered, compulsory powers ought to be given to the municipal authorities to take down the dwellings in which the fever lodged, and erect others in their stead. Local boards, vestries, and similar public bodies had not the means, even supposing them to possess the will, to make advances for the erection of these dwellings; in proposing to find the money the Government, therefore, were taking steps to confer on the metropolis a boon long and ardently desired, and difficult if not incapable of attainment by any other means. In furtherance of the object in view, he thought by judicious arrangements it would be possible likewise to secure the co-operation of influential public companies.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, that while concurring heartily in any proposal having for its aim to benefit the poor, it should not be forgotten that, if all new buildings for the accommodation of the poor were as lofty as those recently erected, London, as a place of residence, would be much less healthy than it had been hitherto. Light and air would no longer penetrate as freely into the streets. If it were possible to introduce some stipulations, that when the buildings were lofty they should not be crowded together, it would add, he thought, to the utility of the measure. He should also like to see a clause introduced, providing that there should be a different set of pipes to carry off the rain water from those which carried off the sewage.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to enable the Public Works Loan Commissioners to make advances towards the erection of Dwellings for the Labouring Classes in populous places, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHILDERS, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and Mr. BECCO.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 9.]

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. COWPER said, he rose to move for leave to introduce a Bill to authorize the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings to acquire, by compulsory purchase or otherwise, certain lands, houses, and premises in the Parish of St. Margaret, Westminster. The houses in question were those lying between Parliament Street, King Street, and Charles Street, and their removal become necessary to enable the front of the quadrangle formed by the new Government Offices to be completed. The purchase of these houses had been in contemplation for a considerable time, but they had not been interfered with till the progress in the erection of the Public Offices rendered it actually necessary to remove them.

MR. LOCKE said, he was of opinion that this was a very bit-by-bit mode of proceeding which was proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. All the houses down to Westminster Abbey must ultimately come down, and would it not, therefore, be better to purchase them at once? When the new Offices were built the houses in the vicinity would immediately become more valuable.

MR. COWPER said, the Bill which he desired to introduce did all that was necessary for providing the site which was wanted for Public Offices. The widening of the southern end of Parliament Street would be an important metropolitan improvement, but it could not be included among the purposes of this Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to authorize the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings to acquire, by compulsory purchase or otherwise, certain lands, houses, and premises, in the parish of St. Margaret, Westminster; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. COWPER and Mr. CHILDERS.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 10.]

QUEEN'S SPEECH—HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (LORD PROBY) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address as follows:

"I have received with sincere satisfaction your loyal and dutiful Address. The Assurance of your continued interest in all matters which concern the domestic happiness of Myself and My Family is most gratifying to My feelings.

"I rely with confidence on your attentive consideration of the measures which will be submitted to you. And your endeavours to improve the Law and to advance the welfare of my People will always receive My cordial co-operation."

CATTLE PLAGUE BILL.

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to check the spread of the Cattle Plague in Great Britain.

Resolution reported.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. HUNT, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. BANKS STANHOPE, and Sir JAMES FERGUSON.

PUBLIC PETITIONS.

Select Committee appointed, as follows, "to whom shall be referred all Petitions presented to the House, with the exception of such as complain of undue Returns, or relate to Private Bills; and that such Committee do classify and prepare abstracts of the same, in such form and manner as shall appear to them best suited to convey to the House all requisite information respecting their contents, and do report the same from time to time to the House; and that such Reports do in all cases set forth the number of signatures to each Petition:—And that such Committee have power to direct the printing in extenso of such Petitions, or of such parts of Petitions, as shall appear to require it:—And that such Committee have power to report their opinion and observations thereupon to the House:—Mr. CHARLES FORSTER, Mr. BONHAM-CARTER, Sir JAMES FERGUSON, Major GAVIN, Mr. TAVERNER JOHN MILLER, Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, Mr. HASTINGS RUSSELL, Mr. ALDERMAN SALOMONS, Mr. OWEN STANLEY, Mr. KINNAIRD, Mr. REGINALD YORKE, Mr. ROBERT TORRENS, Mr. M'LAGAN, Mr. SANDFORD, and Sir CHARLES RUSSELL:—Three to be the quorum.

House adjourned at Twelve o'clock.

PUBLIC BILL—Second Reading—Sale of Land
by Auction (2).

SALE OF LAND BY AUCTION BILL.

(NO. 2.) SECOND READING.

Moved, That the Bill be now read the Second Time.—(The Lord St. Leonards.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that since the first reading he had looked through the Bill, which he thought would probably be a very useful measure. But his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) had inserted clauses in it excepting sales ordered by the Court of Chancery from the operations of the measure. It was perfectly true that the precautions taken by the Court of Chancery with respect to sales carried on under its orders rendered such a Bill as that under consideration unnecessary; but, at the same time, no harm would result if the Court of Chancery sales were not excepted, and it was very possible that if the excepting clauses were allowed to remain an invidious construction might be placed upon the measure.

LORD CHELMSFORD entirely approved the principle of the Bill, and concurred with the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack in recommending the omission of those clauses which excepted sales made by order of the Court of Chancery.

LORD KINGSDOWN also expressed approval of the Bill.

LORD ST. LEONARDS, in replying to the objections taken to the measure, was understood to say that the Court of Chancery had machinery at its command to do all for its suitors that it was proposed by this Bill to do for the people at large, and it was, therefore, unnecessary to give to the Court of Chancery what it already had.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

PRISONS ACT 1865.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in rising to inquire of Her Majesty's Government, What Arrangements they have made for giving effect to the Prisons Act of last Session, by securing an adequate Inspection of the several County and Borough Prisons, said, that the Act to which he referred had placed much power in the hands of the local authorities. A Committee of the House, of which he had the honour of being appointed the Chairman, had given great consideration to the subject, with the view of securing, as far as possible, uniformity of action; and the Committee found that the Prison Inspectors, who had formerly numbered five, had for various reasons, which it would not be necessary for him to go into, been gradually reduced to two, so that the inspection of prisons had in reality become a mere formality. Even in the last Report of the Inspectors, he found that all the prisons in the kingdom had not been visited once in the year. He did not now rise for the purpose of asking an increase in the number of Inspectors, but he did desire to see some machinery established which would secure effectual communication with the local authorities, and by which a harmonious and uniform system would be adopted.

EARL RUSSELL was understood to say that instructions had been given upon the subject by the Home Secretary.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON thought that the answer of the noble Earl was in reality no answer at all. The noble Earl did not say what was the nature of the instructions given by the Home Secretary; and he thought, therefore, that he should not be doing wrong in pressing the noble Earl for a little further information on a matter so important.

EARL RUSSELL said, he would furnish the noble Earl with further particulars as soon as he received some more information from the Home Office.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that under these circumstances, he would repeat his Question on Thursday.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF WINCHILSEA rose to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Advisers are prepared to recommend to Parliament that an Indemnity be granted out of the Public Purse to all such Persons as have been compelled to slaughter any Beast or Beasts (not offered for Sale in any Market, Fair, or other Public Place where Animals are commonly exposed for Sale), by Order of an Inspector appointed by or under the Authority claimed by the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council, to be contained in the Act of 1848, c. 107, which Act still continues in force? The noble Earl said that the Privy Council had issued instructions to their Inspectors to slaughter any diseased cattle they might find on the premises of the owners. Now, that Order purported to be founded on the Act of 1848; but it appeared that the operation of that Act applied only to cattle exposed at any public fair or market, and gave no authority to direct the slaughter of cattle on private premises, and there was, therefore, reason to suppose that the Privy Council had in that matter overstepped their powers. But if that were so, it was clear that those persons whose cattle had been killed under the sanction of that Order had a peculiar claim on the Government for compensation, and he trusted that that claim would be recognized.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, that he was desirous of reminding the noble Earl, before he answered the Question which had just been put to him, that the issuing of the Order in Council giving power to Inspectors to kill any cattle they might think infected with the cattle plague, unaccompanied by any restrictions upon the cattle traffic, was the most successful—if he might use the term—method of spreading the disorder that could have been followed. The effect of that Order was that owners of cattle, knowing what fate was to befall them, and knowing that they should receive no compensation for any cattle which might be slaughtered under the Order, took the matter into their own hands and sold their infected cattle; and the result was, to use the words of Her Majesty's Commission, that the disease was sown broadcast over the country.

LORD POLWARTH wished to know, whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to renew the Order in Council complained of, or whether it would cease when the new measure upon this subject came into operation?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The noble Earl (the Earl of Winchilsea), in putting the Question of which he has given notice, has clearly pointed out that which I am perfectly ready to admit—namely, that there are no distinct terms contained in the Act of 1848, authorizing the Council to make such an Order as that of the 25th of August; but I must ask leave of the House to state how the matter stood at that time. The object of the Act of Parliament passed in 1848 was to prevent the spread of contagious or infectious diseases among sheep, cattle, or other animals, and the preamble of that Act was to this effect—

"Whereas a contagious or infectious disorder, known or described as the sheep-pox, or variola ovina, now prevails among the sheep in some parts of the United Kingdom, and it is necessary to take measures to prevent such disorder from spreading."—[11 & 12 Vict. c. 107.]

The Act then proceeds to give the Privy Council authority to make such orders and regulations as are necessary to give effect to its provisions. There is no doubt in the world that the preamble of this Act referred to sheep, and to sheep only; but, on the other hand, the clauses of the Act are not confined to sheep, but will bear a construction permitting the provisions to be applied to cattle. The question the Government had to determine was whether or not, if it were shown to them—as it was shown to their satisfaction—that no other Order would have any beneficial effect, they would be justified in issuing an Order calculated to give effect to the spirit of the Act, although, if strictly construed, that Act might not expressly give them the necessary powers. It must not be forgotten that remedial Acts are always to be liberally construed, and under the circumstances we felt it to be our duty to put a liberal construction upon this one. The matter had to be determined at once—there was no time for deliberation—and I do not hesitate to say that it was upon my advice that the Order was issued, as I thought it was fairly to be argued that such an Order came within the real meaning of the Act. There is, however, great doubt upon the subject; but if the Order does go beyond the strict letter of the law it may easily be met by compensating the parties who have suffered under it, although the injuries they have suffered in consequence of its issue must be very slight, as the infected cattle slaughtered under its regulations must have been of little or no practical value to their owners. Acting upon the opinion I had formed, I did not hesitate to advise the Government that they were bound to put a liberal construction upon the Act, as it would be useless to issue any Order that was not calculated to meet the requirements of the case.

THE EARL OF DERBY: The noble and learned Lord has placed two constructions upon the Order in Council. First of all, he says that it is within the spirit of the Act; and then, that it goes beyond the strict letter of the law. Now, I cannot quite concur with the doctrine laid down by the noble and learned Lord, that the Order in Council comes within even the spirit of the Act, because the law lays down distinctly what are the offences it creates, and in what manner they are punishable. On the other hand, it is quite true that although the preamble refers to sheep alone, the enactments refer to cattle generally. Now, what are the enactments contained in the Act?—

“That in case any sheep or lambs infected with or labouring under the said disorder, or any disorder of the like nature, be exposed or offered for sale, or be brought or attempted to be brought for the purpose of being so exposed or offered for sale, in any market, fair, or other open or public place where other animals are commonly exposed for sale, then, and in any such case it shall be lawful for any clerk, or inspector, or other officer of such fair or market, or for any constable or policeman, or for any other person authorized by the mayor, or by any two justices of the peace having jurisdiction in the place, or for any person authorized or appointed by Her Majesty in Council, to seize the same, and to report such seizure to the mayor or any justice of the peace having jurisdiction in the place; and it shall be lawful for such mayor or justice either to restore the same, or to cause the same, together with any pens, hurdles, troughs, litter, hay, straw, or other articles which he may judge likely to have been infected thereby, to be forthwith destroyed or otherwise disposed of in such manner as he shall deem proper, or as may be directed in manner hereinafter provided; and any person bringing or attempting to bring any sheep, lambs, oxen, bulls, cows, calves, or other horned cattle into any such market, fair, or open or public place as aforesaid, knowing such sheep, lambs, or cattle to be infected with or labouring under either of such disorders as aforesaid, shall, upon conviction thereof, forfeit and pay for each and every such offence a sum not exceeding £20.”

Now, these are the whole of the offences contemplated by this Act. The fourth clause is as follows:—

“And for the more effectually preventing the spreading of contagious or infectious disease be it enacted that it shall be lawful for the Lords and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, or any two or more of them, from time to time, to make such orders and regulations as to them may seem necessary for the purpose of prohibiting or regulating the removal to or from such parts or places as they may designate in such order or orders, of sheep, cattle, horses, swine, or other animals, or of meat, skins, hides, horns, hoofs, or other parts of any animals, or of hay, straw, fodder, or other articles likely to propagate infection; and also for the purpose of purifying any yard, stable, outhouse, or other place, or any waggons, carts, carriages, or other vehicles; and also for the purpose of directing how any animals dying in a diseased state, or any animals, parts of animals, or other things seized under the provisions of this Act, are to be disposed of; and also for the purpose of causing notices to be given of the appearance of any disorder among sheep, cattle, or other animals.”

Then come the words on which the noble and learned Lord relies—“and to make any other orders or regulations for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the Act,”—not for the purpose of giving effect to the “object” of the Act, but for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the Act. It enables the Lords of the Council, by Orders in Council, to issue any Orders that may be necessary for the purpose of enforcing its provisions. I would humbly submit to the noble and learned Lord that it is a most extraordinary stretch of the provisions of an Act of Parliament to use the powers which were given for the purpose of enforcing its provisions to enable you to make any order you may think fit for the purpose of giving effect to what you consider the object of the Act—namely, to provide against contagious diseases in cattle. The noble and learned Lord frankly admits that the object, though within the spirit and intention, did not come within the letter of the Act. Well, a number of farmers have had their cattle destroyed under the authority of the Government and by the direction of inspectors acting under their orders, but contrary to the law. Now I say that, under these circumstances, the persons so deprived of their property—I will not use harsh words—have a fair and legitimate claim for compensation, and for compensation not to be levied on their neighbours and themselves, but compensation from the Government on those persons acting under the authority of the Government, who, contrary to law, deprived them of their property. Any one of those persons whose cattle the inspectors destroyed has a perfect right to bring an action of damages against them. I do not complain of the Government for the steps they have taken—except in this case, they have rather fallen short of their duty; but I say that in a case where they have undoubtedly gone beyond what the law allowed, compensation to any person suffering from their wrong ought to come from the public funds, and not from their neighbours. Let me observe that until the Bill brought in yesterday no intimation was given in the slightest degree that any of these persons would receive compensation from the public or from any other source. I rather think it was intimated to them they need not expect compensation from any source. But I would much rather look forward to the future than back to what has been rightly or wrongly done. I would much rather look forward to what can be done best at the present moment; and I think the Members of Her Majesty's Government will admit that in this House, and also in another place, no indisposition has been shown fairly to consider the questions brought before them. Certainly there has been no factious spirit—no disposition to create embarrassment to the Government. On the contrary, all parties have been desirous of pushing forward the remedy proposed as fast as possible. But, if I am rightly informed—and I have no means of information other than those which all the public have—the measure proposed is one of a very intricate and complicated character. There is another Bill—a rival Bill—brought forward by an independent country Gentleman, and which is also of a somewhat complicated character. But there are certain general provisions with regard to which all parties seem agreed, and there are, on the other hand, a variety of minute details on which the greatest possible difference of opinion prevails. Now, I would offer a suggestion to Her Majesty's Government. The emergency is pressing, and must terminate towards the end of next month; it is, therefore, essentially necessary that the measure should be brought into operation with the least possible delay. I would suggest whether it is not practicable, instead of proceeding through all the details of the Bill, and through all its stages in both Houses, open as it is to discussion in various complicated provisions, to introduce simultaneously in both Houses Resolutions embodying those points on which there is no difference of opinion. Take, for example, the power to prohibit fairs and markets; the power to prohibit the moving of stock between this period and the 25th of March; the power in certain circumstances to slaughter diseased animals, or infected animals—the word “infected,” I believe, has been interpreted elsewhere to mean animals brought into contact with diseased animals, and are, therefore, supposed to be infected with disease, it may be quite right to take absolute power to slaughter them. Pass Resolutions prohibiting the transit of cattle on roads and railways, except fat cattle for immediate consumption; give power to slaughter infected animals, and where they are slaughtered under the direction of inspectors authorized by the Government, declare that the owners shall be entitled to compensation. These three or four simple Resolutions might be passed by the two Houses together, leaving out of consideration for the present all the details of the Bill. In my mind, nothing is more doubtful than the provisions as to compensation; but I would suggest to Her Majesty's Government that they should propose a Resolution merely affirming that owners of cattle slaughtered under these circumstances should be entitled to compensation; and then pass another Resolution, authorizing Government to pass Orders in Council for giving effect to these Resolutions, such Orders in Council being of no validity after the 25th of March. If Her Majesty's Government will take that course you may have an effective measure in three days. I am quite certain, that with every desire to forward the Bill, there is very great doubt whether a Bill of such complicated provisions can pass the two Houses in less than three weeks. Well, but these three weeks are of the utmost value, and if you could anticipate that by ten days, or even a week, by proceeding by way of Resolutions rather than by Bill, when the object is to meet a temporary emergency, which will last only from this time to the 25th of March, you will remove the greatest possible difficulties, you will save the country an enormous sum of money, and take the best means in your power of putting an early stop to this most formidable plague. Of course, it rests with Her Majesty's Government to adopt it or not. I only suggest that arrangement. As far as I am concerned, if they are disposed to take that course, I shall not be too strict in criticizing the terms of the Resolutions they may bring forward, the great aim and object being to give the Government the requisite powers of promptly, expeditiously, and, I hope, successfully, dealing with this great calamity.

EARL GREY: I hope the Government will be very cautious before they adopt the suggestion which has just been thrown out. It seems to me a very dangerous principle to establish, even under the pressure of such an emergency as now exists, to legislate by Resolutions. I think nothing is more important than that Parliament should adhere to the ordinary practice of legislating on graver matters itself, and there are many points connected with the proposed Resolutions which obviously and clearly exceed the powers of the law. The reason why the Bill is brought forward is that they find there are powers necessary which the existing Act does not enable the Government to exercise by Order in Council. For instance, one of the great faults of the present system is that there is no power of stopping animals on the road. In my own county parties openly defy the law. [The EARL of DERBY: Why don't you take that power?] It seems to me that it would be better that Her Majesty's Government on the one side, and independent Members of the two Houses on the other, should show an earnest desire to come to an agreement as to what ought to be done. I cannot help thinking that by proper communications between some of the leading agriculturists on the one hand, and Her Majesty's Government on the other, the principle of the arrangement to be made might be agreed upon; and, that having been done, the case being one which does not admit of delay or long discussion, the Government might be allowed to pass their Bill as rapidly as the forms of the Houses would allow, Parliament taking it very much on their judgment and responsibility. I am quite prepared to take that course. I do not think it would be impossible that the decision of Parliament should be pronounced on some of the great leading questions—for instance, on the point mentioned the other evening, whether cattle should go to the butcher or the butcher should go to the cattle. Guided by the opinion pronounced by Parliament, I do not see why the Government should not pass a Bill, such as they have laid on the table, modified, if need be, according to the expressed opinion of the two Houses, the details being taken pretty much as a matter of confidence in the Government.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, he thought the Government ought to be careful before adopting the course suggested by his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby). A great deal might depend on the details of the arrangements to be adopted. One point to which farmers and owners of stock attached importance was the question of slaughtering cattle, and another point of importance was in whose hands the power to slaughter cattle should be placed. He had no hesitation to say generally that it would not be satisfactory to the country that that power should be in the hands of the present inspectors. With regard to the movement of cattle, he believed that that might be safely prohibited until the end of this month; but in many parts of the country, particularly in the West of England, it could not be prevented after the end of the month, without certain relaxations. The question then arose, in whose hands should the power of granting these relaxations be placed? It was not merely necessary to pass general Resolutions expressing the opinion of Parliament on the more important matters; but every minute detail should be considered if they desired to pass a measure giving satisfaction to all parties affected by it. He would suggest whether it might not be possible, while the Commons were passing the Bill through their House, for their Lordships to appoint a Select Committee to consider the subject, so that they might be ready without loss of time to recommend alterations in the measure when it should come before them.

EARL RUSSELL: I do not think it necessary, after the explanation given by my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, to detain your Lordships on the question of law. It appears to me that the Act of 1848 being for the purpose of preventing the spread of disease among sheep in the first place, but its provision being made applicable to cattle also, the regulation which the Privy Council made came, in fact, within its scope. The order given for slaughtering diseased cattle was necessary to prevent the spread of disease; and within the last fortnight various resolutions have been passed in different parts of the country, recommending the slaughter of such cattle as the one thing needful. A good deal of objection was at first made to the slaughter of these cattle, but after a time, opinion settled down generally as to the measures which ought to be taken. The special question which the noble Earl opposite has raised, as to whether public funds should be employed to pay the compensation—

THE EARL OF DERBY: Only in respect to those cases where cattle have been slaughtered by inspectors without sufficient authority by Act of Parliament.

EARL RUSSELL: If the inspectors have done anything illegal, no doubt there would be a legal remedy against them. Of course, the Government would not allow the inspectors to bear the loss. But I do not admit, what my noble Friend takes for granted, that the order given by the inspectors for the slaughter of these cattle was beyond the authority of the Act of Parliament. In fact what these inspectors did was to destroy a nuisance which would have resulted from allowing these cattle to go through the country, and so spread the disease. As the diseased cattle were actually doing mischief and evil they constituted a nuisance. There is an enactment by which certain officers in the City of London are empowered to destroy all unwholesome fish in the fish market, and as these cattle, being diseased, would have spread the infection throughout the country, it was quite right that they should be slaughtered. The noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) has made an important suggestion to the effect that certain Resolutions should be passed by both Houses, and that the Government should be empowered to carry out those Resolutions by Order in Council; but I agree with the noble Earl who spoke from the cross-bench (Earl Grey), that it would be very dangerous to take that course. The very same question as has been raised to-night might be raised with regard to the authority of those Resolutions; because it would be impossible in those Resolutions to provide for all the minute details which would be necessary. It would be better to accept another suggestion, that all matters most urgent should be taken out of the Bill of the Government, and passed in the ordinary way. If Resolutions were good for the purpose, I do not see why the same Resolutions should not be put in a Bill which should be brought in and passed in the usual way. I quite agree with the noble Earl in thinking that, without distinction of party, your Lordships will concur in any measure necessary for preventing the spread of the cattle disease; and I hope that the House will pass it soon, as time is of the utmost importance.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that with regard to the legal part of the question he must say that after reading the Act of 1848 he was more and more puzzled, and he must ask for some further explanation on one or two points. The Act, as his noble Friend stated, referred in the first instance to disease among sheep, and, in the second place, to disease among cattle; and these two subjects appeared to be jumbled together in the most extraordinary and confused manner. By the first clause power was given to justices of the peace to slaughter any sheep or lambs; so that their Lordships would perceive that the power of slaughtering simply related to sheep and lambs; but, by the Order in Council which they were now discussing power was taken not to slaughter sheep or lambs, but cattle as well. Now, he wanted to know how it happened that the Order in Council took a power which did not appear in the Act. These Orders in Council ought not to be called Orders in Council at all, for they were not the Orders of the Queen in Council, but of certain Lords of the Privy Council. The Queen in Council had power to exercise a certain authority, but any authority which the Lords of Council exercised must be derived from some Act of Parliament. The fourth clause of the Act of 1848, which was the only clause which dealt with this matter, gave the Lords of the Privy Council power from time to time to make certain regulations and orders; but it seemed that the Lords of the Privy Council had transferred these powers to local authorities, though nothing could be more distinct than the legal maxim, delegatus non potest delegare. He should be very glad to receive some explanation from the Government on the points to which he referred.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the Government had acted in the course which they pursued in accordance with the best legal advice—that of the Law Officers of the Crown. The Orders in Council were, under the operation of the Act of Parliament, prescribed to be passed some in one way, some in another, and there could not be the slightest doubt that those to which the remarks of the noble Earl pointed had been passed in conformity with the law, [The EARL of DERBY: The Lord Chancellor says not.] He appealed to the noble and learned Lord whether that was not the case; but, be that as it might, if the noble Earl who had raised these legal questions would give notice that he would again bring them forward, he should be prepared to give him a distinct answer.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he must protest against the assertion that he had admitted that the course that had been taken in reference to the Order in Council was illegal. What he had admitted was that the Government found themselves in great difficulty owing to the loose manner in which the Act was worded. The preamble referred only to sheep; but in the body of the Act there were general words, which included cattle as well. He had also stated that the Act was of a remedial character, and that therefore it must be construed with a view to promoting the object intended to be effected by it. With respect to the observation of the noble Earl, delegatus non potest delegare, this point had not escaped the notice of the Attorney General. The Law Officers came to the conclusion that there had been no delegation. The acts authorized to be done were authorized by the Council:—what the justices were to do was to say whether the Orders were applicable to particular districts. He had not the clause before him, and could not therefore analyse or scan its provisions, but if the noble Earl looked at the wording he would see that this was so.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY suggested, that the only way of settling the question satisfactorily would be to bring an action either against the Government or their inspectors, for the slaughter of cattle in some particular instance.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he should like to know what amount of damages would be obtained under the circumstances.

COMMONS AND OPEN SPACES (METROPOLIS).—QUESTION.

MR. DOULTON asked the First Commissioner of the Board of Works, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce, early this Session, a Bill having for its object the preservation of Commons and Open Spaces in and around the Metropolis?

MR. COWPER replied, that it was his intention to propose a Bill on the subject. He had it in preparation, and he hoped that he should be able to introduce it very shortly.

The Lord Chancellor

QUESTION.

MR. SAMUELSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he intends, during the present Session, to introduce an Amendment of the Bank Charter Act of 1844, enabling the Bank of England to increase its issues against securities, beyond the amount to which they were at present limited by that Act?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that considering the state and prospects of public business, he was more than doubtful whether it would be in the power of the Government, during the present Session, to make any proposal relating to the difficult subject of the issue of bank notes. As regarded the particular Question put by the hon. Member, if it implied that the Government might have an intention of enabling the Bank of England to resume the discretionary system which prevailed prior to the passing of the Act of 1844, he was bound not to limit his answer to the present Session; and he would, therefore, say that the Government would not be disposed to enable the Bank of England to resume that system either in the present Session or in any other.

EDUCATION OF CHILDREN IN MANUFACTURING TOWNS.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, viewing the deplorable condition of the Children employed in many of the Trades in Sheffield and other towns, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a measure for regulating the Employment and securing the Education of those Children.

SIR GEORGE GREY replied, that his hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Home Department intended to give notice on an early day of his intention to ask leave to introduce a Bill to give effect to some further recommendations, beyond those which had already formed the subject of legislation, made by the Commission on the employment of women and children.

THE SMOKE NUISANCE.—QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL asked, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce, during the present Session, a measure for the purpose of abating nuisances arising from the smoke of chimneys in towns and country districts in the vicinity of towns similar to the Bill passed in 1853 for the Metropolis?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied, that the Act which applied to the metropolis had had a most beneficial effect, and it was desirable to extend it to the whole country. No Bill had been at present prepared with that object, but he felt the importance of the subject. He hoped it might be possible to extend the provisions of that Act.

CATTLE DISEASES BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. TOLLEMACHE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, when the House is in Committee on the Cattle Diseases Bill, he will consent to separate the compensation clauses from the other portions of the Bill, and to embody such clauses in a separate Bill? Cheshire would be greatly affected by the compensation clauses; but he had had no opportunity of consulting with any persons connected with that county respecting those clauses, as he had not yet received a copy of the Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, it would be impossible for him to accede to such a request. The payment of compensation for animals slaughtered, by order of the local authorities, and the power to cause such animals to be slaughtered, were essentially connected. The power to slaughter could not be given without a power to award compensation. At all events, he thought it would be better to postpone, to a future occasion, any consideration of the question of separating the Bill into two parts.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH thought it would be more convenient to leave all details as to the mode of raising the money for compensation, in order that they might be dealt with in a separate Bill.

MR. TOLLEMACHE asked, if he was to understand that the right hon. Gentleman definitively declined to accede to the request which he had just made?

SIR GEORGE GREY repeated that he thought it would be impossible to separate those two provisions of the Bill.

ASH WEDNESDAY—ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

On the Motion of Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, it was ordered, "That the House at its rising do adjourn till tomorrow at Two of the clock"—(the morrow being Ash Wednesday.)

VOL. CLXXXI. [THIRD SERIES.]

QUESTION.

MR. HOWES asked the Attorney General, Whether any steps have been taken to prosecute the Reverend George Rogers Harding, Patrick Robert Welch, and the Hon. Richard Bethell, or any of them, for corrupt practices in obtaining, or attempting to obtain, a judicial appointment, as suggested by the Report of the Select Committee on the Leeds Bankruptcy Court; and, if no such steps have yet been taken, what is the cause of the delay?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee appointed by the last Parliament, and with the engagement which the Government gave at that time, criminal informations were filed last Michaelmas Term against Mr. Welch and the Hon. Richard Bethell, and they now stood on the list for trial at the present sittings; and as far as the Crown was concerned, they were ready to proceed to trial. As to the Rev. Mr. Harding, I think that the hon. Gentleman will feel that if the Crown had prosecuted him it would have thrown delay and difficulty in the way of a proper investigation of the matter; because Mr. Harding will be a most necessary witness, and it would indeed be impossible to proceed with the prosecution without his evidence.

JAMAICA.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he intends to bring on his measure for the Government of Jamaica on Thursday next? He suggested that neither the Jamaica Bill nor any other business ought to impede the progress of the Cattle Diseases Bill, and he trusted the Government would proceed with that Bill de die in diem.

MR. CARDWELL said, he was entirely in the hands of the House in regard to this matter. It was certainly important that early provision should be made for the Government of the colony; but the Cattle Diseases Bill would have the precedence of other business on Thursday, and if the Bill relating to Jamaica should be called on at so late an hour that the House would be unwilling to hear his statement, he should not of course press it. He was, however, anxious that the Government of the colony should receive early legislation in that House.

SELECT COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in moving that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the constitution of the Committee of Council on Education, &c., said, that the Motion was, in fact, for the renewal of a Committee which sat during the whole of last Session, and which was engaged in the investigation of the two Questions stated. The scope of the inquiry proved to be so extended, and the evidence so voluminous, that the Committee were unable to conclude their labours and present their Report; and, under these circumstances, he contented himself by merely moving for the re-appointment of the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the constitution of the Committee of Council on Education, and the system under which the business of the office is conducted; and also into the best mode of extending the benefits of Government Inspection and the Parliamentary Grant to schools at present unassisted by the State."—(Sir John Pakington.)

And on February 20 Select Committee nominated as follows:—

Sir JOHN PAKINGTON, Mr. BRUCE, Viscount GRANBOURN, Mr. BUXTON, Mr. HOWES, Mr. CLAY, Mr. ADDERLEY, Mr. HENRY COWPER, Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLIN, Mr. WALFORD, Mr. SHAW LEFEBVRE, Mr. LIDDELL, Mr. MORRISON, and Mr. STIRLING:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

CATTLE PLAGUE (IRELAND).

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

LORD NAAS, in rising to move for "Copy of the Report of the Committee convened by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to consider the measures that might be adopted for arresting the progress of the Cattle Plague, in case of its appearance in Ireland," and to ask when the Bill promised by the Secretary of State will be laid upon the table, said, he hoped the great importance of the matter would excuse the few remarks he proposed to address to the House. Ireland was now placed in presence of one of the greatest dangers that ever menaced a country. The destructive effects of the cattle plague in England had been very great; but if, unfortunately, the plague should extend to Ireland, the misfortune would be fifty times as disastrous to that country. He could not help, therefore, expressing his regret that the Government had not, on the first night of the Session, laid a Bill on this subject on the table of the House. The committee which was convened by the Lord Lieutenant agreed to certain specific resolutions, which proposed to deal with this disease, should it arise, in that country in a manner different from the mode in which it had been dealt with in this country. The Irish Government had adopted those recommendations, in so far as it was in its power to do so, by Order in Council. They had agreed that, in case an outbreak of the disease took place, the best thing to do would be to draw a cordon at once around the infected district, to adopt the most stringent measures against the ingress and the egress of cattle, and to enforce the compulsory slaughter of infected cattle. But here a difficulty arose, for the committee recommended that the compulsory slaughter of cattle should be accompanied by compensation up to two-thirds of the value of the animals destroyed. In this country he believed that one of the greatest misfortunes incidental to the cattle plague had been the unfortunate Order in Council which gave powers of compulsory slaughter without offering compensation. The system suggested by the committee which had now been for some weeks before the country, and had received very general approbation on all hands, would really be inoperative and come to nothing unless it were supplemented by sufficient compensation for slaughtered animals. Though, happily, the measures which had been taken had been, under Providence, the means of diverting this terrible disaster from the shores of Ireland, yet the country ran daily risk of an outbreak of the disease. It was liable to happen at any moment, and if such an outbreak should occur, the Government were without the power to carry out the measures which all in Ireland admitted to be necessary. Not a moment was to be lost in introducing and passing a Bill, and he believed that Government would find very little difficulty in the matter. A question might, perhaps, arise as to the mode in which the compensation was to be levied, but that would be easily settled. He hoped that, before another day elapsed, they might have an opportunity of seeing the measure of the Government, and that, if possible, it would be made law within a week. He must, however, warn the Government that they would make a mistake if they intrusted the enforcement of their measures to local authorities, who could not carry out the system recommended by the committee. It must be carried out by Government officers alone, and its operations must be uniform throughout the country. No board of guardians, or magistrates in petty or quarter sessions, or committee of a grand jury, could carry out the system recommended with any chance or hope of success. He hoped, therefore, that a Bill embodying the recommendations of the committee would be introduced immediately by the Government, and that the Government would take on themselves the responsibility of carrying out all its provisions.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that there was no objection to the production of the Report. The Government had been in communication with the Lord Lieutenant on the subject of the measures that it was desirable should be adopted in the event of the cattle plague appearing in Ireland, and the Attorney General and the Solicitor General had been instructed to draw up a Bill founded on the report of the committee and on the views of the Lord Lieutenant. It was, however, quite necessary that the Bill should be seen by Lord Wodehouse and the Irish Government, and he could not therefore fix the day when it would be brought in; but it would be introduced on an early day. There was this difference between Ireland and this country, that in Ireland there was an army of police directly responsible to the central Government and not to the local authorities, and therefore that could be done in Ireland which there was no means of doing here.

Motion agreed to: Return ordered.

RESOLUTION IN COMMITTEE. BILL READ
THE FIRST TIME.

Acts read;—considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the subject he was about to introduce was one which, like several others that had been adverted to that evening, had been frequently brought under the notice of the House. A considerable discussion had taken place on it only so recently as last Session. He did not propose, therefore, to trouble the House at any length, but should reserve a fuller statement of the objects of the Bill for the second reading, provided as he hoped that the House allowed him to bring it in. But he would state shortly

the purposes of the Bill. There were now two distinct oaths taken by Members of the House; one by Protestants and the other by Roman Catholics. The Protestant oath was framed in 1858, when an Act was passed consolidating the three oaths, which, previous to that period, were taken separately, of allegiance, abjuration, and supremacy. With regard to the part of the oath which relates to allegiance to the Crown, which was common to both Protestants and Roman Catholics, no one could refuse for a moment to admit that it was a very proper oath to be taken by every Member of the House. He did not think there was a Member of the House who would not take that oath willingly. But, with reference to the second part of the oath taken alike by Protestants and Roman Catholics—the oath of abjuration—he thought they would all agree that the time had come when it could and ought to be dispensed with. It was first required to be taken in the reign of William III., on the death of James II., and the assumption by the son of James II. of the title of King of England, when in fact a real danger menaced the Throne of this kingdom. Rather, however, than give his own opinion of this part of the oath, he would quote the words of a most eminent authority—Lord Lyndhurst—and which were spoken in 1858. He said—

“The object of this oath had long ceased. The descendants of the Pretender had long been extinct. What, then, was the course which every man of common sense would consider ought, under those circumstances, to be pursued? Simply to repeal the oath framed for a particular purpose, and the utility of which was now at an end.”

The latter part of the oath taken by Protestants, embodying the negative part of the oath of supremacy in which the jurisdiction of the Pope, or of any other foreign prince in this country is denied, appeared to him to be entirely useless. He could not see the necessity of any Protestant Member of the House being called upon for a declaration that the Pope had no spiritual or ecclesiastical jurisdiction in this country. It was really an absurdity in the case of Protestant Members, none of whom can be suspected of holding such an opinion. As it respects, therefore, a Protestant Member, the oath of allegiance seems to be quite sufficient. As to the oath taken by Roman Catholics, the same reasons which he had given in the case of the Protestants, as to that part of it which required the abjuration of the Pretender, applied equally to them. There were other portions of the Roman Catholic oath framed in 1829 as a security against any danger arising from the admission of Roman Catholics to Parliament, which formed the subject of a great deal of discussion last Session—into these he did not wish now to enter or to invite debate. He concurred at that time with the right hon. Member for the county of Limerick (Mr. Monsell), who introduced a Bill on that subject, that portions of the oath were needlessly offensive to Roman Catholics, and that there was not the slightest use in retaining them, and that other parts were ambiguous, and open to doubtful and complicating construction; and, therefore, he supported the proposal made by his right hon. Friend last Session for their omission from the oath. The hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns) acquiesced in those omissions, so far as they embraced those words which were obviously offensive. I do not, therefore, anticipate any difference of opinion as to them. Other parts of the oath related to the settlement of property and the maintenance of the Established Church, and of the Protestant religion. With regard to these he had only to say that in his opinion no real security for the Established Church or the Protestant religion was given by their retention, and he thought that we ought not, needlessly, to place our Roman Catholic fellow subjects, as Members of the Legislature, on a footing different from that we ourselves occupy. As to the denial of the jurisdiction or authority of any foreign prince or prelate, Roman Catholics were, for obvious reasons, exempted from the denial of spiritual authority, and while it seemed absurd to require this denial only from those who have no concern in it, the necessity for denying civil or temporal authority is obviated by the oath of allegiance, and he (Sir George Grey) was not aware that any Roman Catholic would hold that the Pope exercised any civil or temporal jurisdiction within this country. In fact, the person who would assert this would fail in his allegiance, and might bring himself within the penalties of treason. The opinion which he (Sir George Grey) had expressed last Session was very generally concurred in—namely, that there should be one uniform oath for all. If there was one general oath, they might limit it to the first part of the oath taken without hesitation both by Protestants and Roman Catholics, which would be substantially the oath of allegiance to the Crown. The Members professing the Jewish religion sat now in that House not by absolute right but by sufferance, the result of a compromise adopted to terminate a long struggle, but it was impossible not to see that that arrangement must be temporary. Those Gentlemen had sat there for some years, and it would be absurd to ask if any danger had arisen to the Crown, the Church, or the Constitution, from Jews sitting in that House. They had taken part, with credit to themselves, in the discussions in the House, and had performed their duty with integrity and ability. He (Sir George Grey) thought the time was come when the Members professing the Jewish religion should be admitted to all the privileges which were enjoyed by the Members of other religious denominations. By the adoption of the measure he proposed Members would be relieved from the necessity, on coming to the table after a general election, of ranging themselves in three divisions when taking the oaths. Let no man be asked any question as to his religion, but let him take his seat in the House if qualified to sit there, in the opinion of those who sent him there, on taking the oath of allegiance as a loyal subject of the Crown. The Bill which he proposed to introduce would be a short one, repealing the present oaths, and providing that the oath to be taken shall be as follows:—

"I A. B., do swear that I will bear faithful and true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Victoria, and defend her to the utmost of my power against all attempts and conspiracies whatever that shall be made against her crown, power, and dignity."

The right hon. Baronet concluded by moving—

"That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to Parliamentary oaths."

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that considering the nature of the Bill which the right hon. Baronet had proposed, the tone of his speech was singularly smooth. He seemed to treat his proposal as though it dealt with matters of but slight importance—matters almost of indifference. No one who heard the right hon. Gentleman could, from his tone or his manner, have believed that he was proposing the disturbance of a great constitutional settlement. He (Mr. Newdegate) did not intend to take the sense of the House at present on the subject-matter of the intended Bill, though divisions had often been taken at the outset of proposals, which, as in the present case, would destroy a settlement that had been adopted, after a controversy upon this subject which had lasted eleven years. It was eight years since the Oaths Consolidation Act was passed, and Parliament was now asked, after so short an interval, to disturb the settlement then made with respect to Parliamentary oaths. He held in his hand a pamphlet which had been circulated among the Members of the House. It was entitled Brief Suggestions as to the Oaths taken by Members of Parliament and Others—Her Majesty's Subjects. The tone of the pamphlet was similar to that adopted by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The substance was much the same as that of the right hon. Baronet's speech. There was no author's name appended to the pamphlet, and it was printed for private circulation. He (Mr. Newdegate) almost came to the conclusion that it emanated from the right hon. Gentleman. If the pamphlet did not emanate from the right hon. Gentleman, perhaps he had picked out such portions as he thought might be used in inducing Members of the House to accede to his proposal. He (Mr. Newdegate) would ask the attention of the House to the few observations he was about to offer on the subject of the Oaths Bill. It was quite true that the primary object of the oath taken by Members was to obtain from them a declaration of allegiance. No one had as yet been bold enough to propose the abolition of the oath of allegiance. The allegiance of Englishmen, however, was not simply the allegiance of subjects to an absolute Sovereign, but the allegiance of citizens to a Sovereign who was bound by certain conditions as to the administration and exercise of her power. The right hon. Gentleman asked, "Why not sweep away the oath of abjuration, now that the Pretender and his lineal descendants are no more?" But the right hon. Gentleman took care never to touch upon the fact that that oath limits the succession to the Crown to the descendants of the Princess Sophie of Hanover, being Protestants. Now, one condition of our allegiance is that the Sovereign shall be a Protestant. He might be told that that great advantage is secured by the Act of Settlement. But if it was thought necessary still to retain the declaration of allegiance, why was it now

sought to deprive the Protestant subjects of Her Majesty of the advantage enjoyed and the security conferred by the public recognition of the fact that the Sovereign must be a Protestant? Then the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to the oath of supremacy, and proposed to sweep away the negative portions of it. Perhaps hon. Gentlemen were not aware of what was contained in those negative portions. The man who took the oath condemned and rejected the pretensions of any foreign Power whatsoever, by whomsoever pretended rightfully to exercise any authority, ecclesiastical or temporal, spiritual or civil, within these realms. That was no slight security to abandon. The concession of the right hon. Gentleman was no slight concession to propose. He would not detain the House by going into the provisions of the Roman Catholic oath which it was proposed to repeal, since that subject had been not long since debated. Let it suffice to remind the House that it contained declarations to be made on the part of Roman Catholics that they would not use the power or privileges to which they might become entitled by virtue of the functions or offices to which they were admitted for the disturbance of the rights of property or the rights of the Church of England within these realms. He would ask whether, at the present time, when the Fenian conspiracy was at work in Ireland, when they all rejoiced to see many Roman Catholics proving by their conduct that they abide by the declaration contained in their oath that they will not sanction the disturbance of the settlement of property—he would ask whether this was a fitting and appropriate opportunity for absolving them from this public recognition of the sanctity of property? Hon. Members should remember that their oaths included and recognized, not merely the sovereignty of the Queen, but the rights of the subject, the sanctity of property, and the rights and privileges of the Established Church. If there were Members of that House who would disturb these sacred portions of our law and constitution, were they men in whose favour the House would abrogate the provisions of those oaths which had been taken willingly, cordially, and ex animo by every Member of that House within the last ten days, and for so many years past? He might ask whether the attitude of the Papacy and its agents in this country at present was such as would commend this proposal to the approbation of the House? Why, it was but last week that Dr. Manning preached a sermon at the Oratory hard by in laudation of St. Thomas, as they styled him. [Laughter.] Hon. Members laughed; perhaps they did not know whom Dr. Manning meant by St. Thomas. Why, it was no other than Thomas A'Becket—an Archbishop of Canterbury who resisted the laws of this country, and who lost his life in consequence of his rebelling against the constitutions of Clarendon—constitutions passed 700 years ago by our Roman Catholic ancestors, to guard the freedom and independence of this country against the intrusion of a foreign jurisdiction—that of the Papacy—laws passed for the very same object and purpose for which the negative declarations in the oath of supremacy were now retained, and against which, in the very sermon to which he had alluded, Dr. Manning protested, and urged all whom he could influence to rebel. He would not pursue the subject further. He would only say that the oaths—great part of which the Government now sought to destroy—represented a settlement established by Parliament only eight years ago, after a struggle of eleven years. Under existing circumstances, it was not becoming in Her Majesty's Ministers to propose to disturb that settlement; indeed, it was scarcely decent.

SECOND READING.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read the second time."—(Sir George Grey).

MR. HUNT: Sir, in common with those Gentlemen who have been kind enough to assist me in the preparation of the measure which I laid on the table the other night, I have had the greatest difficulty in arriving at a conclusion as to what course I ought to take with regard to the Bill now before the House, in consequence of the very great delay which took place before the Bill reached the hands of Members. I have had some experience as to the necessity for such delay. On Thursday last, after the meeting in St. James' Hall, it first entered my mind to bring in a Bill. At that time I had no Bill prepared, but I gave my Notice to the House within an hour after the meeting. On Monday, when I moved for leave to introduce the measure, I had a proof of the Bill in my hand, and copies were in the hands of Members the next morning. If an independent Member who has no special means at his disposal for preparing Bills can have a Bill prepared and circulated within that time, I ask whether the Government, with every means at their disposal, cannot do the same thing? I appeal to the House to compare the two Bills, not on their merit, but on their construction. I do not take any credit to myself on this point, because I am indebted to a legal gentleman for the structure of my Bill; but I ask whether the Government Bill does not bear far greater marks of haste than mine. The only conclusion I can come to is, that the gentleman who drew the Government Bill received his instructions so late that he was not able to do justice to himself. The delay and the extraordinarily inconvenient structure of their Bill convince me that till the last moment the Government did not know the nature of the Bill they were going to lay on the table. A Bill was announced in Her Majesty's most gracious Speech from the Throne; notice was given of its introduction the first night of the Session on which it was possible to do so; it was introduced the same night as mine; and yet it was not in the hands of Members till twenty-four hours after mine. I mention this to show the extreme embarrassment in which those who act with me are placed with regard to the Government Bill. Yesterday, between three and four o'clock in the afternoon, a certain number of copies of the Government Bill came to the House. I procured one; but having given it to a friend, I found that all the other copies had been disposed of, and I could not get another for myself till this morning. I was asked last night by the organ of the Government in communication with Members of this House what course I intended to take. I do not think an independent Member was ever placed in so embarrassing a position. It was suggested to me that if I assented to the second reading of the Government Bill to-day, the Government would assent to the second reading of my Bill. Under the stress of circumstances I consented to that arrangement; but do not let it be supposed that I think the Government Bill, so far as one point—and I wish to confine my remarks to this point, and to say nothing about the slaughter of animals, and the compensation to be given for them—do not let it be supposed that I think the Government Bill a satisfactory one. The point to which I allude is the removal of cattle. I believe it would be far better to keep to the present regulations, inasmuch as people have now got to understand them, rather than produce a new set of orders such as those provided in this Bill. I confess that when I heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (the Secretary for the Home Department) the other night I was not prepared for a Bill so permissive in its principle. And here, I venture to observe, that it requires very considerable attention to understand this Bill. If I misunderstand it, I do not think I shall be to blame. From the speech of the right hon. Baronet the other night I understood that with respect to removals the Bill would be this:—That there would be enacted in the Bill a code of regulations which all counties adopting the non-removal principle must accept; that it was to be left to the counties to adopt this principle or not, but that if they adopted it they must accept the statutory regulations. But I find that the whole structure of the Bill is framed in the sense of permission to the local authorities to adopt regulations or not: the idea of the Bill is permissiveness, and the difficulty of dealing with it in Committee will arise from the permissive power which it gives to local authorities in respect of those regulations. In the first clauses of the Bill, I think down to Clause 9, with the exception of the interpretation clauses, the several provisions have reference to getting the local authorities together, and giving them certain powers. The difficulty will be that if we pass these provisions in Committee we shall be assenting to the permissive principle. I do not see how we can go on passing these clauses in Committee if we are to deny discretionary power to those authorities. We then come to clauses which are compulsory on the local authorities; but I do not find anything new in them. Clause 13 makes it compulsory on all local authorities to slaughter diseased animals, and provides compensation. I believe that between the compensation views of the Government and my own views on the same point there is lands not exceeding 200 yards from part to part of the same farm; 2. Raw or untanned hides or skins, horns, hoofs, or offal of animals, or of any specified description thereof, except hides, skins, horns, or hoofs imported into the United Kingdom from India, Australia, South Africa, or America; 3. Hay, straw, litter, or other articles that have been used in or about animals."

With regard to markets and fairs, the 23rd section says—

"No market, fair, auction, exhibition, or public sale of cattle, shall be held during the time that this part of the Act is in force, except as hereinafter mentioned—that is to say, a market for the sale of cattle intended for immediate slaughter may be held, with the licence of the local authority of the district; provided, that in case of boroughs or burghs containing less than 40,000 inhabitants, according to the last census, a licence to hold a market in such borough or burgh shall not be valid unless confirmed by the local authority of the county in which such borough or burgh is geographically situate; or, if it adjoins more than one county, by the local authority of each of such counties."

So, here there is permission given to the local authorities of little towns to open markets and fairs, but only with the consent of the county magistrates; while in large towns the borough authorities will have sole jurisdiction. Now, what may not this give rise to—this allowing county magistrates to come in and control borough authorities? Was there ever such a bone of contention thrown out in the shape of an enactment? I will tell you one thing that will happen. In all the little towns, where the county authorities have control, they will stop the fairs and markets; but in all the large towns, where the borough authorities think only of the present and not of the future interest of the meat eaters, markets and fairs will be allowed. This will give rise to inequality with regard to trade, for butchers will be able to go to the large towns to buy, but not to the small towns. In this I perceive the one idea which seems to have pervaded the minds of the Government—namely, fear of the big towns. Now, if this interference of the county authorities is good for the small towns it must be equally good for the big towns. The big towns, however, seem to be the bugbear of the Government. I have addressed audiences in large towns, and I believe there is no subject which the working-classes will not take into consideration and reason upon fairly, if not rightly, if you put the arguments plainly and frankly before them. The political sentiments which I hold are not generally supposed to be acceptable to the working-classes in large towns; but I have always found that they were disposed to give me a fair hearing, or to enter into a consideration of the views and arguments opposed to their own opinions; and I believe that if the right hon. Gentleman fairly put before the country the reasons which induced him to propose a measure which would produce temporary inconvenience and privation to the inhabitants of large towns, they would, when they saw it was for their future interest, have cheerfully and gladly submitted to the hardships, they would see that the measure was for their own ultimate good as well as conducive to the interest of the agricultural community. I do not think I need trouble the House with any remarks on the regulations proposed in the Bill with regard to the movement of cattle within the metropolis, or on the provisions relating to the public exposure of diseased animals. Those provisions, I believe, we have now under the Orders in Council. I will pass over also the compensation clause. I will pass on, therefore, to the 43rd section, which has reference to the cleansing of trucks—

"Every railway, canal, or other company that carries animals for hire within any part of Great Britain shall, after any animals have been taken out of, and before putting any other animals into, any pen, truck, or boat, cause the said pen, truck, or boat to be properly cleansed, and to be disinfected by a washing of lime-water, or by some other efficient means. Any company making default in so cleansing and disinfecting any pen, truck, or boat, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds in respect of each such pen, truck, or boat."

On this subject I will read an extract from a letter which I received this morning from a gentleman residing in North Wales, near Holyhead. He says—

And he goes on to say, "I believe we have no power to touch them." I maintain, however, that there ought to be Government officers whose duty it should be to insist on inspecting the trucks, and compelling them to be thoroughly and perfectly cleansed. Unless, however, you specify a certain space of time during which that cleansing shall take place, you cannot clean the trucks, because you cannot catch them. It was absolutely necessary to put a stop to the cattle trucks moving at all during a certain time. I have now, I am happy to say, gone through the clauses of the Bill which refer to the movement of conditions of the Orders which apply to particular districts into or through which they wish to send their cattle. That may appear to some hon. Members to be a small matter ; but I can assure the House that it will prove a most serious and perplexing arrangement. The right hon. Gentleman opposite seemed the other night to think that I came here with the peculiar views of Northamptonshire. Now, those views were very fully expressed at a meeting over which I had the honour to preside, held in the Corn Exchange at Northampton, and the same resolution was passed there as was passed the other day, with only two dissentients, at the meeting held in St. James' Hall, at which representatives from forty-four counties were present. That shows that the views of Northamptonshire are the same as those which are entertained by the country at large. Still, Northamptonshire is very peculiarly circumstanced, and I ask permission of the House to refer to it for a moment or two. There are no fewer than nine counties bordering on it. It is also a very narrow county, and a great many farms extend into the adjoining shires. I even know of fields through which the county boundary line runs, and no man knows exactly where the two counties are actually divided. How are you to subject a man to different orders, relating not only to different parts of his own farm, but even to different parts of the same field ? Consider, too, the expense such a system will entail upon the farmers of that county. According to this Bill we have to publish our Northamptonshire notices in our newspapers, and also in those of all our bordering counties. In the same way, all these counties have to publish their notices in our newspapers. People often want just to go out of the county and in again with their animals, and sometimes they actually will not be able to do so, except in accordance with the orders of three different local bodies. Is that, I would ask, an evil which ought to be disregarded ? Then, there is another question which I do not think the Government have fully considered—a question of great importance with regard to the interests of cattle-owners. Although the prohibition of the movement of cattle may be absolute by the order of the magistrates in one district, the movement may be allowed under certain conditions under the order of the magistrates of a neighbouring district. The effect of such a varying and unequal state of things will be this—take the case of two adjoining counties :—If the movement of cattle is free in one and prohibited in the other, the persons who purchase fat cattle from the farmers will be able to get cattle almost at their own price in the county where the restrictions exist, because, if the farmers refuse to sell them, the purchasers could get what beasts they wanted in the county where there are no restrictions. I believe that the cattle owners in the counties which have been very hard hit by the disease would submit to almost any restrictions, if they thought they gave a chance of stopping the disease. But they say, and with sound reason, that it is but fair they should all be placed upon an equality. If the farmers of one district are to be subjected to certain restrictions they naturally complain that their neighbours should possess the advantage of being spared their infliction. That is the reason why they objected so much to the Government Order lately repealed with regard to cattle coming alive out of the London market. They say, “ If you prohibit all movement of cattle you ought to prohibit butchers going to the London markets and bringing cattle down by railway.” For that same reason the Northamptonshire orders were not made so strict as they would otherwise have been. Then, I must refer to the next paragraph of the 21st section—

“ A licence under this section may be given by the local authority, or by some person duly authorized in writing by such local authority to give such licence, and such licence shall be in such form and subject to such conditions as the local authority may think expedient.”

Now, it seems to me that under this section the local authorities will be able to do whatever they are empowered to do at the present time. The next paragraph is to the effect that persons having charge of animals moved under a licence shall produce the same on demand to any constable, policeman, or local officer. A similar provision is made in my Bill, and has been, I believe, in most of the local orders. Then comes the 22nd section, relating to the power of local authorities to make prohibitions. That, in fact, merely confers in express terms powers which the local authorities could have exercised even if no such clause had been inserted. It runs as follows :—

“ Every local authority shall have power by Order to prohibit altogether or to impose restrictions or conditions on the introduction into its district, and also on the removal from place to place within its district, of—1. Animals, or any specified description thereof, excepting for a dis-

lands not exceeding 200 yards from part to part of the same farm; 2. Raw or untanned hides or skins, horns, hoofs, or offal of animals, or of any specified description thereof, except hides, skins, horns, or hoofs imported into the United Kingdom from India, Australia, South Africa, or America; 3. Hay, straw, litter, or other articles that have been used in or about animals."

With regard to markets and fairs, the 23rd section says—

"No market, fair, auction, exhibition, or public sale of cattle, shall be held during the time that this part of the Act is in force, except as hereinafter mentioned—that is to say, a market for the sale of cattle intended for immediate slaughter may be held, with the licence of the local authority of the district; provided, that in case of boroughs or burghs containing less than 40,000 inhabitants, according to the last census, a licence to hold a market in such borough or burgh shall not be valid unless confirmed by the local authority of the county in which such borough or burgh is geographically situate; or, if it adjoins more than one county, by the local authority of each of such counties."

So, here there is permission given to the local authorities of little towns to open markets and fairs, but only with the consent of the county magistrates; while in large towns the borough authorities will have sole jurisdiction. Now, what may not this give rise to—this allowing county magistrates to come in and control borough authorities? Was there ever such a bone of contention thrown out in the shape of an enactment? I will tell you one thing that will happen. In all the little towns, where the county authorities have control, they will stop the fairs and markets; but in all the large towns, where the borough authorities think only of the present and not of the future interest of the meat eaters, markets and fairs will be allowed. This will give rise to inequality with regard to trade, for butchers will be able to go to the large towns to buy, but not to the small towns. In this I perceive the one idea which seems to have pervaded the minds of the Government—namely, fear of the big towns. Now, if this interference of the county authorities is good for the small towns it must be equally good for the big towns. The big towns, however, seem to be the bugbear of the Government. I have addressed audiences in large towns, and I believe there is no subject which the working-classes will not take into consideration and reason upon fairly, if not rightly, if you put the arguments plainly and frankly before them. The political sentiments which I hold are not generally supposed to be acceptable to the working-classes in large towns; but I have

Any company making default in so cleansing and disinfecting any pen, truck, or boat, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds in respect of each such pen, truck, or boat."

On this subject I will read an extract from a letter which I received this morning from a gentleman residing in North Wales, near Holyhead. He says—

"We at present are free from disease, but every day I see cattle trucks in a filthy state. I remonstrate with the railway company, but though they always promise to clean them, I never see a clean truck coming into the station."

It was absolutely necessary to put a stop to the cattle trucks moving at all during a certain time. I have now, I am happy to say, gone through the clauses of the Bill which refer to the movement of

of chimneys in towns and country districts in the vicinity of towns similar to the Bill passed in 1853 for the Metropolis?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied, that the Act which applied to the metropolis had had a most beneficial effect, and it was desirable to extend it to the whole country. No Bill had been at present prepared with that object, but he felt the importance of the subject. He hoped it might be possible to extend the provisions of that Act.

CATTLE DISEASES BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. TOLLEMACHE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, when the House is in Committee on the Cattle Diseases Bill, he will consent to separate the compensation clauses from the other portions of the Bill, and to embody such clauses in a separate Bill? Cheshire would be greatly affected by the compensation clauses; but he had had no opportunity of consulting with any persons connected with that county respecting those clauses, as he had not yet received a copy of the Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, it would be impossible for him to accede to such a request. The payment of compensation for animals slaughtered, by order of the local authorities, and the power to cause such animals to be slaughtered, were essentially connected. The power to slaughter could not be given without a power to award compensation. At all events, he thought it would be better to postpone, to a future occasion, any consideration of the question of separating the Bill into two parts.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH thought it would be more convenient to leave all details as to the mode of raising the money for compensation, in order that they might be dealt with in a separate Bill.

MR. TOLLEMACHE asked, if he was to understand that the right hon. Gentleman definitively declined to accede to the request which he had just made?

SIR GEORGE GREY repeated that he thought it would be impossible to separate those two provisions of the Bill.

ASH WEDNESDAY—ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

On the Motion of Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, it was ordered, "That the House at its rising do adjourn till tomorrow at Two of the clock"—(the morrow being Ash Wednesday.)

VOL. CLXXXI. [THIRD SERIES.]

QUESTION.

MR. HOWES asked the Attorney General, Whether any steps have been taken to prosecute the Reverend George Rogers Harding, Patrick Robert Welch, and the Hon. Richard Bethell, or any of them, for corrupt practices in obtaining, or attempting to obtain, a judicial appointment, as suggested by the Report of the Select Committee on the Leeds Bankruptcy Court; and, if no such steps have yet been taken, what is the cause of the delay?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee appointed by the last Parliament, and with the engagement which the Government gave at that time, criminal informations were filed last Michaelmas Term against Mr. Welch and the Hon. Richard Bethell, and they now stood on the list for trial at the present sittings; and as far as the Crown was concerned, they were ready to proceed to trial. As to the Rev. Mr. Harding, I think that the hon. Gentleman will feel that if the Crown had prosecuted him it would have thrown delay and difficulty in the way of a proper investigation of the matter; because Mr. Harding will be a most necessary witness, and it would indeed be impossible to proceed with the prosecution without his evidence.

JAMAICA.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he intends to bring on his measure for the Government of Jamaica on Thursday next? He suggested that neither the Jamaica Bill nor any other business ought to impede the progress of the Cattle Diseases Bill, and he trusted the Government would proceed with that Bill de die in diem.

MR. CARDWELL said, he was entirely in the hands of the House in regard to this matter. It was certainly important that early provision should be made for the Government of the colony; but the Cattle Diseases Bill would have the precedence of other business on Thursday, and if the Bill relating to Jamaica should be called on at so late an hour that the House would be unwilling to hear his statement, he should not of course press it. He was, however, anxious that the Government of the colony should receive early legislation in that House.

to consent to-day to the second reading of the Government Bill, bad as it is. I see the difficulty of dealing with it in Committee, and I am not aware of the course which the Government intend to adopt, but I think if they persevere with it only one course can be taken in Committee—namely, to postpone all the clauses up to the 21st, and to strike out all the clauses relating to the removal of cattle in order that more stringent provisions may be inserted. I would refer for a moment to a meeting which took place in the tea-room yesterday afternoon, and which was attended by Members of both Houses of Parliament, irrespective of the side of the House from which they came. Three resolutions were passed—the first two unanimously. These two resolutions were entirely in accordance with the Bill which I have laid on the table. They were to the effect that, for a limited period, the movement of cattle by railway or road should be entirely prohibited. The second proposed that movement on the high roads ought also to be prohibited by law, with certain statutory exceptions as to cattle moved short distances, under rigid regulations; the third was that the Government might declare certain districts free from disease, and permit cattle to be moved in such districts. The third resolution was passed in a hurried way, as the meeting was about to break up. [Sir GEORGE GREY: Hear, hear!] The first two resolutions were passed after due consideration and without hurry; the third was passed in the hurry of breaking up, and, though no hand was held up against it, it was not so much considered as the other two. That third resolution was an infringement of the principle of this Bill. That resolution allowed an exception in certain districts to the strict restrictions by road, but not by railway; but then it threw the responsibility on the Government. Now, I confess I do not like even this exception, but, if others think it absolutely necessary, I do not say that nothing would induce me to consent to it; but I would only consent to it on this condition, that the Government alone should declare the exception. I say also that the conditions under which the exceptional movement of cattle is to be permitted in such districts ought to be defined. Even then, however, it would be necessary for the Government to act with the greatest promptitude, as in the case of the Order issued for Ireland. It would not do to have a week's notice before orders could be drawn up, another week before they could appear in the Gazette, and another before they came into operation. If this power were left to Government the inspectors should have notice by telegraph, as was done in the first case, and at once proclaim the district. That Order, indeed, was so good that I cannot understand how it could have proceeded from the same Government which issued the other Orders. After the passing of the resolutions at the conference yesterday, I hope that the Government may be willing to modify their Bill, and I trust that some Member of the Government will give us some intimation to that effect. If not, I shall, when the Bill is in Committee, raise the issue of statutory prohibition or not.

Mr. BRIGHT: Sir, I am really sorry for some of the observations made by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt), because, notwithstanding his disclaimer to-day, it appears to me that there was a good deal of party feeling mingled with the anxiety he evinces with regard to this distressing question. Now, I think nothing could more lower the estimate of the House of Commons in the eyes of everybody outside its walls than the mixing up of any political and party feeling with a question of this nature. I have read the Government Bill with some minuteness, and I have come to the conclusion—which is confirmed by what I heard fall from the hon. Gentleman on the former occasion and to-day—that the House is doing what is generally a very unwise thing—that is, about to legislate on a panic. There is hardly anything more common, and for myself I do not think anything is more absurd and pernicious, than a panic. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary has, I think, been rather hustled in this matter, and I doubt whether he, and, still more, whether his Colleague the Chancellor of the Exchequer, entirely approve some portions of the Bill. We are now on the second reading, and though I shall mention one or two things which are matters of detail, yet they are at the same time matters that can only be discussed at this stage of the measure. On looking over the Bill, it appears to me to involve three things—first, an attempt at isolation, in which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt) thinks it does not go far enough; secondly, a general provision to slaughter cattle which are either attacked by the disease, or likely to be attacked, or suspected of

ment of their measures to local authorities, who could not carry out the system recommended by the committee. It must be carried out by Government officers alone, and its operations must be uniform throughout the country. No board of guardians, or magistrates in petty or quarter sessions, or committee of a grand jury, could carry out the system recommended with any chance or hope of success. He hoped, therefore, that a Bill embodying the recommendations of the committee would be introduced immediately by the Government, and that the Government would take on themselves the responsibility of carrying out all its provisions.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that there was no objection to the production of the Report. The Government had been in communication with the Lord Lieutenant on the subject of the measures that it was desirable should be adopted in the event of the cattle plague appearing in Ireland, and the Attorney General and the Solicitor General had been instructed to draw up a Bill founded on the report of the committee and on the views of the Lord Lieutenant. It was, however, quite necessary that the Bill should be seen by Lord Wodehouse and the Irish Government, and he could not therefore fix the day when it would be brought in; but it would be introduced on an early day. There was this difference between Ireland and this country, that in Ireland there was an army of police directly responsible to the central Government and not to the local authorities, and therefore that could be done in Ireland which there was no means of doing here.

Motion agreed to: Return ordered.

THE FIRST TIME.

(In the Committee.)

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the subject he was about to introduce was one which, like several others that had been adverted to that evening, had been frequently brought under the notice of the House. A considerable discussion had taken place on it only so recently as last Session. He did not propose, therefore, to trouble the House at any length, but should reserve a fuller statement of the objects of the Bill for the second reading, provided as he hoped that the House allowed him to bring it in. But he would state shortly

the purposes of the Bill. There were now two distinct oaths taken by Members of the House; one by Protestants and the other by Roman Catholics. The Protestant oath was framed in 1858, when an Act was passed consolidating the three oaths, which, previous to that period, were taken separately, of allegiance, abjuration, and supremacy. With regard to the part of the oath which relates to allegiance to the Crown, which was common to both Protestants and Roman Catholics, no one could refuse for a moment to admit that it was a very proper oath to be taken by every Member of the House. He did not think there was a Member of the House who would not take that oath willingly. But, with reference to the second part of the oath taken alike by Protestants and Roman Catholics—the oath of abjuration—he thought they would all agree that the time had come when it could and ought to be dispensed with. It was first required to be taken in the reign of William III., on the death of James II., and the assumption by the son of James II. of the title of King of England, when in fact a real danger menaced the Throne of this kingdom. Rather, however, than give his own opinion of this part of the oath, he would quote the words of a most eminent authority—Lord Lyndhurst—and which were spoken in 1858. He said—

“The object of this oath had long ceased. The descendants of the Pretender had long been extinct. What, then, was the course which every man of common sense would consider ought, under those circumstances, to be pursued? Simply to repeal the oath framed for a particular purpose, and the utility of which was now at an end.”

The latter part of the oath taken by Protestants, embodying the negative part of the oath of supremacy in which the jurisdiction of the Pope, or of any other foreign prince in this country is denied, appeared to him to be entirely useless. He could not see the necessity of any Protestant Member of the House being called upon for a declaration that the Pope had no spiritual or ecclesiastical jurisdiction in this country. It was really an absurdity in the case of Protestant Members, none of whom can be suspected of holding such an opinion. As it respects, therefore, a Protestant Member, the oath of allegiance seems to be quite sufficient. As to the oath taken by Roman Catholics, the same reasons which he had given in the case of the Protestants, as to that part of it which required the abjuration of the Pretender, in Northampton with regard to the possibility of the plague being spread by the practice of the sport of hunting. Bear in mind, this question of the cattle plague is a very serious one, or it has no right to be in this House at all; it is a very serious question, or no Member has a right, for a single moment, to dream of asking Government to impose these unbearable inconveniences upon the people, and the large expenditure which will fall upon somebody if the Bill passes. If it be so serious a matter, and if these humble curs are suspected, and are to be shut up in infected places, for fear they should carry the disease, I put it to the country gentlemen, who have so powerful a representation in this House, whether they will stand well with the owners of cattle, the great body of the tenant farmers of this country, if the sport of foxhunting be pursued during the next month, when this Bill is to come into operation, seeing that the matter appears to have assumed so great a gravity? I said I would not give any opinion of my own on this point, because I have not any; but I have seen in several newspapers—in Liverpool papers—letters written from the county of Chester, complaining of this matter. The Northampton meeting, at which the hon. Member for the county was in the chair, and at which I am told 2,000 persons were present—[An hon. MEMBER: No—only 500.] I am sorry that more interest was not displayed, but I was told that the room would hold 2,000 and that it was filled—that meeting passed a resolution upon this very subject; and yet any gentleman may see in a newspaper published in that town notices of the meeting of no fewer than fifteen packs of hounds that were to run in one week, a total of between sixty and seventy times. They would course over 10,000 to 20,000—Oh! far more—acres in that county; and if this disease be so subtle, if it can be carried by almost everything that flies and everything that creeps, why should it not be carried by something that runs. A Northamptonshire clergyman who lives in the midst of the Pytchley Hunt, says in a letter—

"The inspector of my district told me distinctly, a week or two ago, not only that in his own opinion (that of a graduate of the Veterinary College) foxhunting might, but that it had, in some instances, introduced the murrain from infected into healthy districts. I met, on my return from Northampton, on Saturday last, a farmer whose brother, living in our neighbourhood, had recently lost some cattle from the plague. I inquired how he thought it had been introduced, and his reply was that his only way of accounting for its appearance was that it had been brought into his farm by the foxhounds which crossed his fields about a week before."

Now, I repeat, I have no opinion upon this matter—I cannot say anything about it as to whether it is so or not; but I say, if that be possible, is it conceivable there is any gentleman in England who would consider it necessary to continue—what, after all, is not an essential of life—sport during the short time the season will last, if it be possible any harm can happen to the farmers of England from this cause? I shall say no more about that, because it is not a subject I am very well qualified to discuss, beyond what I have said with regard to it, except to maintain that if there be anything any of us can give up, the giving up of which would tend to lessen or remove a calamity which must reduce many hundreds of farmers, probably, to poverty, we ought to give that up with the greatest possible pleasure. I want to say one word on the question of compensation, which is rather an important part of this measure. I said before that I think the effect of it will be to cause a great amount of slaughtering of cattle which, under the system of isolation which the Bill intends, would not be necessary, and would really be pernicious and a grievous loss; but I should like to ask, why is compensation to be given by means of an Act of Parliament, and a public rate? I do not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself would be able to give a good reason for the proposals in this Bill. Now, I can understand that if the landowners and farmers had no interest in what is called the "stamping out" of this disease by the slaughtering of cattle, and if it was simply done in the interest of the public, that then there might be some claim upon the public in some cases for compensation. But, bear in mind, all the demand made to the Government in favour of this excessive, and, as I think, almost senseless slaughtering has been made by the country gentlemen and the farmers whom they represent. If ten beasts be slaughtered on one farm to save ninety on the same farm, and presuming that if Government did not order the slaughtering, the farmer himself would think it necessary, I do not see why the farmer or landowner should come to Parliament for compensation. Now, I maintain, as far as I know, as far as my memory goes, as far as my reading of late years has gone, that this is a new principle which is

divisions had often been taken at the outset of proposals, which, as in the present case, would destroy a settlement that had been adopted, after a controversy upon this subject which had lasted eleven years. It was eight years since the Oaths Consolidation Act was passed, and Parliament was now asked, after so short an interval, to disturb the settlement then made with respect to Parliamentary oaths. He held in his hand a pamphlet which had been circulated among the Members of the House. It was entitled Brief Suggestions as to the Oaths taken by Members of Parliament and Others—Her Majesty's Subjects. The tone of the pamphlet was similar to that adopted by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The substance was much the same as that of the right hon. Baronet's speech. There was no author's name appended to the pamphlet, and it was printed for private circulation. He (Mr. Newdegate) almost came to the conclusion that it emanated from the right hon. Gentleman. If the pamphlet did not emanate from the right hon. Gentleman, perhaps he had picked out such portions as he thought might be used in inducing Members of the House to accede to his proposal. He (Mr. Newdegate) would ask the attention of the House to the few observations he was about to offer on the subject of the Oaths Bill. It was quite true that the primary object of the oath taken by Members was to obtain from them a declaration of allegiance. No one had as yet been bold enough to propose the abolition of the oath of allegiance. The allegiance of Englishmen, however, was not simply the allegiance of subjects to an absolute Sovereign, but the allegiance of citizens to a Sovereign who was bound by certain conditions as to the administration and exercise of her power. The right hon. Gentleman asked, "Why not sweep away the oath of abjuration, now that the Pretender and his lineal descendants are no more?" But the right hon. Gentleman took care never to touch upon the fact that that oath limits the succession to the Crown to the descendants of the Princess Sophie of Hanover, being Protestants. Now, one condition of our allegiance is that the Sovereign shall be a Protestant. He might be told that that great advantage is secured by the Act of Settlement. But if it was thought necessary still to retain the declaration of allegiance, why was it now

sought to deprive the Protestant subjects of Her Majesty of the advantage enjoyed and the security conferred by the public recognition of the fact that the Sovereign must be a Protestant? Then the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to the oath of supremacy, and proposed to sweep away the negative portions of it. Perhaps hon. Gentlemen were not aware of what was contained in those negative portions. The man who took the oath condemned and rejected the pretensions of any foreign Power whatsoever, by whomsoever pretended rightfully to exercise any authority, ecclesiastical or temporal, spiritual or civil, within these realms. That was no slight security to abandon. The concession of the right hon. Gentleman was no slight concession to propose. He would not detain the House by going into the provisions of the Roman Catholic oath which it was proposed to repeal, since that subject had been not long since debated. Let it suffice to remind the House that it contained declarations to be made on the part of Roman Catholics that they would not use the power or privileges to which they might become entitled by virtue of the functions or offices to which they were admitted for the disturbance of the rights of property or the rights of the Church of England within these realms. He would ask whether, at the present time, when the Fenian conspiracy was at work in Ireland, when they all rejoiced to see many Roman Catholics proving by their conduct that they abide by the declaration contained in their oath that they will not sanction the disturbance of the settlement of property—he would ask whether this was a fitting and appropriate opportunity for absolving them from this public recognition of the sanctity of property? Hon. Members should remember that their oaths included and recognized, not merely the sovereignty of the Queen, but the rights of the subject, the sanctity of property, and the rights and privileges of the Established Church. If there were Members of that House who would disturb these sacred portions of our law and constitution, were they men in whose favour the House would abrogate the provisions of those oaths which had been taken willingly, cordially, and ex animo by every Member of that House within the last ten days, and for so many years past? He might ask whether the attitude of the Papacy and its agents in this country at present was such as would country than died from the lung disease in the year 1860. Any gentleman who likes may contradict that statement; I have no figures that will positively prove it; I understand it has been asserted by those who have paid great attention to the question. I want to ask hon. Gentlemen opposite if some of them do not now regret that in past times they had not joined with us in promoting a Bill by which we could have had correct agricultural statistics returned to Parliament. I have received a letter from a farmers' club in one of the midland counties, urging me strongly to press upon the House the necessity of obtaining agricultural statistics. If you had had those statistics, if you knew the mortality among cattle from the lung disease in 1860, you would have had not only evidence of the necessity of insurance, but the facts and figures upon which a safe cattle insurance company could be based. As it is, you have no figures, you have shut your eyes to the facts, you have not permitted us to gather them. The farmers throughout the country have objected to inquiry into their business and into their stock; therefore, no person wishing to establish a cattle insurance company has understood the facts on which a table could be framed: and for that reason the cattle insurance societies have been feeble, and I daresay they find themselves unable to cope with this enormous mischief which is now spreading throughout the country. I have risen on the second reading to put these two or three opinions before the House. First of all, I agree very much in the necessity, so far as the farmers are concerned, of a rigid isolation. I disagree entirely with the proposals of the Bill that this wide and indiscriminate slaughter should be left to the authorities in these different districts. I believe that the effect of giving this compensation will be that the slaughter will be unnecessary and monstrous in amount; and I contend that it is contrary to every principle on which Parliament has acted on past occasions of public suffering to vote money out of the taxes to remedy a misfortune of this kind, and that it is a grievance of which every taxpayer will have to complain, if his taxes should be taken to pay compensation to well-to-do farmers and rich landowners who may suffer from this affliction. I believe that if that system be carried out, it will lead to greater improvidence on the part of the farmers even than that which has existed in past times. They will fancy that they are an order and a class in the community which has special claims upon this House—an opinion which they held twenty years ago, and which was destructive of their independence and energy. I say that it would be unfortunate to promote such an opinion among them now, and that we ought to strike out of this Bill the power of slaughtering and the power of collecting taxes to compensate the rich man. I should be ashamed if I were a man, whether a tenant farmer or a landowner, having property left after that which the scourge had taken, to go to the humble ratepayers of towns and villages, who have no special class interest in this matter, and to ask them from their pockets to make up the loss in my trade. I put this to the House; and I hope hon. Gentlemen opposite, instead of being panic stricken, will be content with the system of isolation; will believe, as I believe, that this scourge, like all other scourges of this nature, whether they attach to our own species or they attach to what we are pleased to call in our dignity the inferior animals—that scourges of this kind have their course and their time, and they run their course, and no power of man hitherto has been able to obstruct it. I am told you have 1,500 townships or parishes in which this disease has been or now is to be found. I do not believe that, with this extent, anything this House can do by legislation can prevent it running its course. I would not, by false legislation, add to the slaughter which may be necessary; and I would never let it be said hereafter that the landowners and rich farmers of England, suffering a loss which is not greater to them than that which befalls many other classes of their countrymen, came to Parliament to ask Parliament to legislate that the losses of their special trade might be paid out of the taxation of their country.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY said, there were two Bills before the House, one went to the extent of positively prohibiting any removal of cattle, while the other admitted the desirability of cattle being removed under certain circumstances by licence, the latter Bill to which he referred, and which had been introduced by the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary, was the one which would receive the sanction of the country. He believed that the system of licences was a proper system to adopt, as it was very important that the country should go along with this Bill. Now if the regulations were too stringent they would be inoperative, and to show that, he would instance what had occurred in his own county. He was one of a committee of Berkshire magistrates who, on the issuing of the first Order in Council on this subject, were appointed to advise the court of quarter sessions. The first thing they did was to pass stringent regulations with regard to the movement of cattle; but in quarter sessions the whole power of the committee was hardly able to carry the measure, which passed only on an assurance being given that it should remain in force only three weeks, and that then its stringency should be relaxed. Still further relaxations were promised on the 1st of March, as it was represented to the committee that their stringent regulations could not be enforced, and had been and would be still more infringed. He did not dispute what the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) had said as to the system of licensing being impaired by the carelessness of magistrates who would sign anything put before them which had been signed by anybody else; but if educated gentlemen were apt to sign papers too readily, what might be expected of a constable receiving 15s. a week, whom a bribe of 10s. would induce to pass cattle over the land without further protest? If regulations were too stringent, they would be broken in every way, and however careless magistrates might be in attaching their signatures, they would be still more careless in enforcing penalties for breach of regulations which they might consider too severe. The Bill of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire would be canvassed in every homestead in the kingdom, with this inevitable result—that it would be said to be unworkable because too stringent. On the large dairy farms of Berkshire, which were bound by contract to supply all their milk to London and other large markets, when calves were dropped they must be either sold or have their throats cut. A calf was of no great value, and it might be sold for a few shillings, or if it was slaughtered it was made into sausages and there was an end of it. If it lived twelve months it was valuable. If then they killed the calves on the large dairy farms, next year when we looked out for our yearlings, we should find we were without them. If they passed the more stringent measures they would find that they had been burning their candle at both ends

—they would slaughter their calves on the one hand, and lose their cattle by the rinderpest on the other, until they had none left. The House was not aware of the difficulties that would have to be encountered by passing so stringent a measure as that of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire. The Bill of the right hon. Baronet, however, contained provisions that might be useful and that would be thankfully received and adopted by the country. Certain Resolutions which had been adopted at a meeting of Members of the House held in a part of that building on Tuesday seemed to him to be hasty and ill-considered. On the first Resolution, relative to the removal of cattle by railway, he would make no remark. On the second, to the effect that the movement of cattle on the highways ought to be prohibited by law, except for short distances, under certain regulations, he would merely say that in his opinion it would be better to allow them to be removed any distance with a licence than short distances without one. The last Resolution was that Government ought to have the power to declare certain districts free from infection, and allow cattle to be moved from one place to another by the highways in such districts. This seemed to him a dangerous measure, because if this mysterious and insidious disease broke out in such a proclaimed district, as it might do without any contact being traced, the farmer would naturally be at once desirous to get rid of his beasts, there would be no power to let or hinder him, thus this very district proclaimed to be free might be the very means of disseminating the disease over a county hitherto free. These Resolutions, carried by hon. Members, must have been framed in rather too hasty a manner. Those anxious to carry stringent regulations had paid more attention to oratorical display at meetings and by deputations than to the sober sense of their constituents; for he believed that if a Bill were carried absolutely preventing any movement of cattle it would be received with consternation throughout the country. That consternation, however, would very soon lead to this reflection—that as it would be impossible to carry out the provisions of the measure consolation must be found in the possibility of breaking them. It was some time before he could understand that when the hon. Member for Birmingham spoke of “humble curs” he was alluding to foxhounds. The hon. Member transgressed the Rules of the House by speaking of what he did not quite understand; and, eloquent as he was, he placed himself in an awkward position by talking of what he did not fully comprehend. The hon. Member said that the farmers wished foxhunting to be stopped. He saw the late Master of the Pychley Hunt under the Gallery, and he would appeal to him whether it was not the fact that, if the farmers were to declare their wish, the hounds should be at once stopped, and the country gentlemen would at once give way. He was quite satisfied they would not stand out for an instant; but he was not aware that the farmers had ever said a word about it. They were quite aware that the plague might be carried by a fly or by a bird, or in a thousand ways, but foxhounds did not carry it. Foxhounds did not hang about farm houses, and run at will about the country, but were taken to their kennels every night and locked up, and kept under proper regulations. When the hon. Member for Birmingham spoke about the losses by the cattle plague not equalling these from the foot and mouth disease—[Several hon. MEMBERS: The lung disease]—he again spoke without book. He felt great reluctance to record his vote against and speak in contradiction of Members with whom he hoped frequently to act, but he felt the strongest interest in the matter, and he was encouraged to address the House by the remark of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire that he disclaimed all party feeling on the subject. It was not a party question; it was one upon which all were entitled to express their opinions with the view of assisting the Government to carry a measure introduced with patriotic motives. He felt, therefore, bound to support the Government in attempting to carry a measure which he believed would be acceptable to the country, and which was introduced in so conciliatory a manner by the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. LOWE: Sir, the speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham is a specimen of a manufacture with which we are all, unhappily, and through his own agency, too familiar—the manufacture of grievances. The hon. Gentleman has just depicted to us, in the most graphic manner, a crowd of aristocrats, sweeping over the country with their dogs and horses, and spreading infection far and wide among the flocks and homesteads. Nay, so inveterate is his habit of setting one class against another, that he does not confine himself to the human race in these things, but he ventures to include those animals of which he thinks either that they are up to the level of the human race, or that the human race has descended in this respect occasionally to the level of them—I do not know which; but he actually tries to get up a schism, and a fight, for all I can say—between the “humble cur” and the aristocratic foxhound. But let that pass. I wish that was all the hon. Gentleman had done in this department; but he has gone further, and he has discussed the provisions of this Bill with reference to compensation, as if they were a demand on the part of the rich members of this community, and, above all, of Members of this House, that they should be indemnified from losses which this great calamity brings upon them at the expense of their poorer neighbours. Now, Sir, that is, I say, a specimen of the manner in which grievances are got up. Misrepresent the facts wholly; assume motives and objects that do not exist; take out of the extreme of one class only the persons benefited, and out of the extreme of another only those injured; and you have a receipt for converting the best and wisest institutions of the country into so many intolerable grievances. Do not take that on my authority; what is the fact? Is it proposed in this Bill, or has it ever been proposed by anybody, to compensate losses merely as such? Is it not known to every Gentleman that the object of this Bill is not to compensate for what persons have lost, but for what they have lost by the direct agency of the Government, in taking possession of and destroying their property for the public good, and for the public good alone? Is that a new principle? If it is necessary to destroy houses to fortify a town, or to destroy any other property for a public purpose, there is no civilized Government in the world that does not compensate the person whose property is taken; and why are we to be considered as doing anything wrong and invidious when we apply this principle to the present calamity? Let us go further. It is assumed that the object is to reimburse and to compensate the farmer. That is not, as I understand it, the object. The effect of this Bill may be to indemnify the farmer against part of his losses; but the object is not indemnification; it is a very different one. It is well known to all who have studied this question that the farmer has no inducement to make known the presence of the disease: he will conceal it; he will send his cattle, tainted very probably with the disease, to other places to get rid of them; and thus the disease is diffused. The first condition to dealing efficiently with the disease in any way is that its presence should be known, and the only way of making it known is to give those who are first aware of its existence an interest in disclosing the fact. This is the object of compensation; it is that the farmer should feel that he will be indemnified, to some degree, at the public expense, if he will only do the public a service by making known the existence of the cattle disease so as to enable proper precautions to be taken. The hon. Member complained that this difficulty had not been met by insurance. But the hon. Gentleman has answered himself. He has himself shown that, owing to the absence of agricultural statistics, we have not the means of calculating an average; that it is impossible to ascertain any definite proportion of risk, and without that you cannot have a system of insurance upon commercial principles. Since then it is very requisite and advisable, if there is to be slaughter of cattle, to have some system or other of compensation—that question of compensation divides itself into two parts—retrospective and prospective. I do not intend to go into the first of these points further than to say, that it seems very doubtful now whether the slaughter that has taken place has been done under legal authority. Not that I object to it. It seems to me to have been very properly done by the Government. It was, however, a stretch of authority; and when that is the case, I think there arises a good claim for compensation. But I do not think that compensation ought to be made a part of the burden imposed by this Bill upon the county rates. It seems to me that the Government has ventured to take that step without consulting any of the local authorities whatever. In my opinion, it is out of the funds of the entire country that compensation ought to come. But I will not dwell on this point. I mention it now for the purpose of suggesting to my right hon. Friend that he should withdraw the 18th clause of the Bill and adjourn the consideration of it to another time. As to the question of compensation for the future, I cordially approve the principle contained in the Bill. I come next to the second point in the Government Bill—that is the question of slaughter, and in that respect it seems to me that the Government have taken a wise course. They have made the slaughter of diseased animals compulsory, and the slaughter of animals not known to be diseased optional with the local authorities. That seems to me to be quite right. The hon. Member for Birmingham has spoken of this as an inducement to indiscriminate slaughter. But will there be any such inducement when the persons who give the order know that they will have to pay for every animal that is slaughtered by their authority? A precaution is thus taken against rash action. It appears to me, Sir, that the mode proposed by the Government is a wise way of dealing with the subject. The third part of the Bill is that which deals with the movement of cattle; and I earnestly press upon my right hon. Friend to re-consider this part of his Bill by the light of the resolutions come to yesterday. It was stated at the meeting on behalf of two great railway companies that it was time to prevent the movement of cattle by rail, and that it was impossible to prevent the risk of contagion unless a stop was put to it. I am quite certain from all I have been able to learn that that is one way, and a very common way, by which the infection is propagated. The matter which spreads the contagion, according to the opinions laid before the Cattle Plague Commission, is not supposed to be anything in the nature of a gas, but is propagated by very minute molecules which float in the air. These are capable of being carried by the wind and dropped here and there and picked up again. Well, apply that to the railway. Imagine an animal forced twenty miles an hour through the air, and imagine how much of these small molecules it is necessary should be discharged from the animal's body on the land on either side of the railway. I do hope, therefore, that the recommendation of yesterday's meeting on this point will meet with the favourable consideration of Government. The other resolution I also submit most earnestly to their consideration. As to the provisions of the Government Bill on this subject, we shall be placed in this position. The local authorities have made regulations varying much from each other, and infinitely troublesome and perplexing. Nobody can pretend to say he understands them all. A man may understand those which apply to his own neighbourhood, but nobody understands any portion except what relates to the place where he happens to reside. These regulations drop on the 1st of March, and if this Bill stands in its present form the local authorities will have to go to work to manufacture a new set of regulations while the Bill is only calculated to last for six weeks. The result will be that this Bill will be like many excellent people in this world—it will die before it is understood. I would entreat, then, the right hon. Gentleman to obviate this difficulty, and the only way to do so is to do what was suggested yesterday on the part of the meeting—to prevent by the Bill the movement of cattle, introducing such exceptions as this House in its wisdom may approve, so that the people may know—what it is the greatest possible benefit to know—the laws by which they are to be governed. I will now offer a few remarks with regard to the Bill itself. It seems to me, on the whole, that this Bill has been framed with very great care, and I think, without doubt, the House will do wisely in reading it a second time, and making it the basis of effective legislation. The hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) seemed to fear that he could not introduce such changes as he desires. I am not struck in that way. The first 17 clauses, giving definitions and appointing local authorities, may, I think, pass without discussion, for the hon. Member must bear in mind that we must have local authorities of some kind, and therefore the clauses creating those authorities are a necessary part of any Bill on this subject. The 18th clause, which deals with retrospective compensation, I hope the Government may be prevailed upon to withdraw. It must be remembered that it is one which it will take a great deal of time to discuss. Clauses 19 and 20 are with regard to infected districts. They are not of any great consequence. But from 20 to 25 are the clauses to which I have alluded, regulating the movement of cattle; and these clauses which give the whole power to the local authorities, I do hope the Government may be prevailed upon to re-consider, and to allow instead of them one simple clause framed on the basis of the two resolutions which were passed yesterday. I hope, also, that they will not give to the local authorities power to open fairs and markets. What happens in the country? I have been informed that in Sussex a new cattle market was opened last week, and in a very short time we may be sure that this example will be followed in other places. We must make the most of the Bill we can; but if we mean to introduce exceptions of this kind we might as well throw the Bill into the fire. Therefore, I hope the Government will re-consider that point, and that they will also re-consider the question of putting a second rate on cattle. It has been forcibly argued that the whole of the charge ought not to be borne by the counties. There is, no doubt, so great an advantage in having the same body to manage the slaughter of animals and the suppression of the disease, and also to pay for those measures, that it seems to me to overbalance any other consideration. But I think the stockowners have suffered, and are likely to suffer, too much to put this burden upon them. We all know that the stockowners are only put in the front of the battle. The frightful loss falls upon them first, but it will visit all in time. I think it would be a miserable and unhappy feeling if we were to insist that, because the first brunt of the evil falls upon them, they should be made liable to another burden from which the rest of the community are free. There is one other subject to which I wish to advert. I hope that no provision will be introduced into this Bill with respect to the slaughter of cattle which would render it impossible to stop that slaughter if such a stoppage should at any moment be found desirable. I am almost ashamed to allude to the possibility of a remedy for the disease after the many disappointments we have already had to encounter; but it would really appear as if Mr. Worms had hit upon something which may turn out a remedy. If some cure should at any time be discovered it would be most absurd and most unfortunate that we should still be compelled to slaughter our cattle in compliance with the Act; and I hope that a power will be reserved of discontinuing its operation in the event of its being no longer found necessary. I have only to say, in conclusion, that the Bill must impose upon every person in this country very great and heavy sacrifices, and in this House we are called upon for the special sacrifice of immolating on the altar of our country our desire to insist on the enforcement of our individual opinions. I think we ought to accept the general conclusions at which the Government have arrived upon this subject—to take all but the very largest principles on their responsibility—and I trust that we shall be able to pass the measure rapidly through Committee.

Mr. J. STUART MILL said, that in the course of the discussion on the Bill many important points had been raised, respecting some of which he was not in a position to form an opinion ; and that being the case, he thought it better that he should leave all other topics to Her Majesty's Government, who had the best means of information, and who were responsible for the failure or success of the measures they might introduce. There was one question, however, which it required no agricultural or special knowledge to understand—that of compensation—it was a purely economical question, and upon this part of the Bill alone he thought himself competent to speak. This question had been raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, and as his hon. Friend had been rather severely dealt with by the right hon. Gentleman behind him (Mr. Lowe), he thought that any one who shared the sentiments of his hon. Friend would be acting unworthily if he did not stand forward and avow them. He did not object to the principle of compensation, but he did object, in the highest degree, to the amount proposed in the Bill, and to the manner in which it was proposed to be provided. It was perfectly true, as his right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe) had pointed out, that the farmers were to receive compensation, not for their losses as such, but for what they lost through the interference of the Government. He (Mr. J. S. Mill) quite agreed that there could not be a more just claim for compensation than this ; and, moreover, the grant of it was expedient on account of the inducement it would give not to evade the provisions of the Act. He quite adopted the conclusion of his right hon. Friend, that the farmers who might be the owners of diseased cattle ought not to be placed under the temptation of concealing the fact. But, on the other hand, the more reason there was for granting compensation, the more necessity was there for taking care that the compensation should not be excessive. If, on the one hand, the owner were not to be compensated at all for his loss, there was a strong inducement for him to do, what it was the very object of this Bill to prevent him from doing—namely, to keep the infected animals as long as possible, and thus to be the means of propagating the infection. If, on the other hand, the compensation were excessive, an inducement would exist to be careless as to the spread of the disease ; because if his animals on becoming infected were ordered to be slaughtered, he knew that he should get an exaggerated compensation for them. The compensation provided by the Bill for diseased animals slaughtered was two-thirds of the value, when that sum did not exceed £20. But what were the necessary conditions to render that sum a just compensation ? It was that the animal should have two chances out of three of surviving, because if it had a less chance of recovery than this, the owner would be an absolute gainer by the compensation he would receive on its slaughter by authority. The value of an animal in the market was its value in its existing condition ; unless, therefore, the marketable value of an animal after infection was two-thirds of its value when healthy, the compensation proposed by the Bill was excessive. Whatever the chances were of the animal's surviving, that would be the measure of compensation which a reasonable person would propose. He came now to another question—in what manner, and at whose expense, the funds for compensation ought to be raised. In order to judge of that, they ought to consider what would be the natural working of economical laws, supposing no compensation were granted at all. If, setting aside merely momentary effects, they took into consideration the ultimate, and indeed speedy, result, there could be no doubt that in whatever proportion the supply of cattle was diminished, in that proportion the price would be enhanced ; and, therefore, in the end, the whole burden of the loss would be borne, not by the producer, but the consumer. Farmers and landlords would indeed suffer, but only to the same extent as other members of the community—that is to say, as consumers. As far as it was the whole community which suffered, no class of the community, as a class, had the smallest claim to compensation from the rest. Some, indeed, were less able to bear the loss than others, and it would not have been surprising if a proposal had been made to compensate them ; but now, on the contrary, it was proposed to tax them, in order to compensate those who were able to bear the loss much better. It appeared to him that the farmers as a class had no claim whatever to compensation, and the only reason for granting compensation at all was, not that the loss fell peculiarly upon the agricultural interest, but because it fell upon that interest with such extreme inequality. He apprehended that in real justice the compensation ought to be paid to the less fortunate by the more fortunate of the class : thus establishing what would be equivalent to a compulsory system of mutual insurance amongst the owners of stock. This Bill did the very contrary—though he did not blame the Government for introducing it, considering the way in which the House was constituted. It compensated a class for the results of a calamity which was borne by the whole community. In justice, the farmers who had not suffered ought to compensate those who had ; but the Bill did what it ought not to have done, and it left undone that which it ought to have done, by not equalizing the incidence of the burden upon that class, inasmuch as, from the operation of the local principle adopted, that portion of the agricultural community who had not suffered at all would not have to pay at all, those who suffered little would have to pay little, while those who suffered most would have to pay a great deal. The only argument of any validity which he could anticipate against the opinion he had expressed, was that a portion of our cattle supply is not derived from home production, but from importation ; and, as far as that portion was concerned, the compensation which the consumer would pay through the enhanced price of the commodity would not be received by our own agriculturists, but by the importers. This he must admit ; but the importation of cattle, though considerable and increasing, bore so very small a proportion to the entire consumption, that it would diminish the indemnity reaped by the home producers only to a very small extent ; and this being the case, it would be unworthy of the landed interest to lay any stress upon so small a matter. An aristocracy should have the feelings of an aristocracy, and inasmuch as they enjoyed the highest honours and advantages, they ought to be willing to bear the first brunt of the inconveniences and evils which fell on the country generally. This was the ideal character of an aristocracy ; it was the character with which all privileged classes were accustomed to credit themselves ; though he was not aware of any aristocracy in history that had fulfilled those requirements. It might also be said that the farmers would derive no benefit from the ultimate high price, because one of the effects of the cattle plague was by making them bring their cattle prematurely to market, temporarily to keep down the price. This, no doubt, was the case, but after the grant of compensation, it would no longer be so, since the inducement to hurry cattle to market would then no longer exist.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: This debate, Sir, has wandered over a wide range. We have indulged in disquisitions on the merits of foxhounds, and we have gone into the question whether the hon. Member for Birmingham can consider himself superior or inferior to the cows which are perishing. I am too polite to question the estimate of his own claims by the hon. Gentleman, and therefore I will turn to the speech of the hon. Member who has last spoken. The hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. J. S. Mill) has read the history of aristocracies, but he says that he is not aware of any which is conformable to the ideal aristocracy which he has conceived. I would ask the hon. Gentleman whether his idea of an aristocracy involves their paying the debts of the other classes of the community. My impression is that this is rather a pressing emergency, and that we had better devote ourselves to the question of the cattle plague and leave the question of aristocracies to a future time. The hon. Member for Westminster addressed himself to some important practical questions, and particularly to the question of compensation. Now, it appears to me that, with all his undoubted power of reasoning, he rather mistook the object of the Bill of the Government, and indeed of any Bill that might be proposed on the subject. One of his grounds of objection was that the compensation proposed would be an inducement to the farmer to slaughter his cattle. But the farmer is not asked to slaughter his cattle; the power to slaughter is placed in the hands of the local authorities and the inspectors appointed by them; and the local authorities have a direct interest to keep the slaughter at the lowest possible point, because they will have to pay for their dead. Therefore, instead of stimulating the slaughter of cattle by appealing to the cupidity of the farmer, we really restrain the slaughter by appealing to the economy of the local authorities. Again, the hon. Gentleman seemed to look at the question of compensation in what I venture to say is not a thoroughly practical light. He seemed to treat it as if he were one of a jury appointed to assess compensation in a case of accident. But the point for the House of Commons to consider is whether there is a great public object to be served, whether a great public benefit will be attained, if that compensation be paid.

Mr. J. Stuart Mill

Now, Sir, I confess that it appears to me a narrow view to treat this as a question affecting merely the agricultural interest. I believe if it had been we should not have had so much of it in this House. We have had many questions of the interests of the country before now, which have received the special consideration of Parliament. When the interests of Ireland called for the granting national aid, the House came to their support; and when the cotton interest was in difficulties, we very justly enabled the distressed population to seek relief in great part from the agricultural parishes to which they belonged. No one complained of injustice in those instances; it was felt that great interests were at stake, and that we ought not to look too closely into any relief which we could afford. But I assert that these arguments and considerations do not arise in the present case. It is not a case for the agriculturists, but for the whole country. The hon. Member for Westminster justly said, that if this disease went on at its present or an increase ratio the price of meat would rise; but have you at all measured the height to which it may rise? The other day I was in Belgium, and I there discussed the question with some Members of the Legislative Assembly of that country. They told me, I am happy to say, that hitherto the pressure has not been too severely felt; but they added that the demands from England were becoming so great, and the pressure on their own working classes was becoming so keen, that the idea had been seriously entertained by more than one Continental Government checking, or even of prohibiting altogether the export of cattle. Now, it is well known that, though the Continental Governments may treat the interests of some classes very cavalierly, they look most attentively to the wants of their own working population. If they see anything like famine, and apprehend those disturbances which are there the result of famine, they will not be deterred by any scruple from adopting any measures they may think necessary. If it should come to pass that the enormous slaughter or death of cattle in this country should so tax the resources of Continental nations as materially to raise the price of meat, you may depend upon it that the export of cattle will be checked, and it is then you will find what the cattle plague really means. We were told the other night by the Secretary of State that the working man will have beef; but if there is no beef for him to have, if Continental Governments prevent him from having access to the supplies, I want you to consider how far the interests and the tranquillity of this country may not be compromised by the neglect which you are now invited to approve. It is on the ground that any neglect on your part will assuredly strike the consumer quite as much as it will the producer that I ask you to regard the question of compensation, not as an agricultural, but as a national question. Now, I would like to pass a few remarks on the Government Bill. I quite agree with the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) that we ought not to look too narrowly into details, but apply ourselves to principles; and I am disposed to adopt the view of the hon. Member for North Lincolnshire on the first night of the Session, that there has been sufficient criticism for the past. I will not therefore go into the consideration of what the Government has or has not done. But I cannot help looking upon this Bill, not as the fruit of the mature deliberation of the whole recess, but rather as a flash of genius—a bright idea—which has swept across the mind of the Home Secretary within the last few days. The period of an inspiration is always difficult to fix, but, if I said Saturday evening last or Monday morning, I do not think I should be far wrong. I am ready to give credit for the best intentions, and for the utmost sincerity, but the Bill bears strong marks of inevitable haste, which is always a defect even in the greatest writers of genius. My objection is one of principle—I indicated it the other night with great accuracy when I referred to the jurisdiction exercised by the local authorities. The right hon. Gentleman has paid what seems to me an ill-timed respect to the jurisdiction of the local authorities. If the Bill merely concerned counties, there would be a great deal to say against it; but, at least, it would be dealing with large geographical districts, and, to a certain extent, it might be defended on the ground that large districts might be left to large local authorities. But in this Bill "local authorities" means the mayor and corporation of a borough or petty town that possesses them, who are to have undisputed jurisdiction over the traffic in their own district, so as to stop it or not as they think fit. Now, I want you to consider how the Bill will work with respect to counties if this jurisdiction is left to petty boroughs. According to the Bill any animals may be sent to the boroughs with a licence from the mayor; and when there they have unlimited power to go out again, unless either the local authority declares the borough an infected district, or unless they cannot obtain from the inspector appointed by the local authorities power to go out. Now, there is not the least probability that the borough authorities will be forward to declare their borough an infected district, and they have no inducement to do so. A large number of their population live on the trade in meat, and much of that trade would be stopped if no ingress or egress were permitted. It is quite true that markets for store cattle are prohibited, and markets for fat cattle in the boroughs which are declared to be infected. But egress and ingress are not prohibited unless the borough is declared to be an infected district. Now, what will be the effect? Take an instance from a county of which I know nothing—the county of Kent. Take Maidstone, Rochester, and Canterbury—they form a triangle, and are connected with each other by a railway; and unless the local authorities declare them infected, it will be competent under this Bill for persons to send cattle from borough to borough along the railways; there will be nothing to prevent them, they will have only to obtain the licence from the local authorities, and as the latter have no interest in stopping them, the licence will be easily obtained. Now, consider the condition of the country districts which lie within that triangle. They are defending a besieged fortress; they are keeping out the rinderpest by every means in their power, and you are giving them a frontier which would tax an empire to defend. Remember, it is not only the rinderpest you have to cope with—that would be bad enough, with its thousand centres of infection, and the lines of railway—but you have to deal with the human friends of the rinderpest; you have to resist what will inevitably arise, a gigantic system of smuggling on the part of abandoned persons, whose object will be to evade and defeat your legislation by every means in their power. Your object is to frame a Bill which will defeat their object. Now, it so happens that it is not the country districts which are defending their cattle that will suffer. The right hon. Gentleman fears he will destroy the supply of meat to the great towns, and thus interfere with the food of large populations. But I do not think he has sufficiently understood the bearing of his Bill on that point, for he has given each local authority the power of stopping the traffic by any railway that passes through the locality. Suppose Huntingdon were declared to be an infected district, the effect would be to tie a tourniquet round the Great Northern Railway; or Reading, for instance, would produce the same effect in reference to the Great Western Railway; and thus, by this superstitious reverence for local authorities, you would destroy the object you have in view. It appears to me that there are two classes, the interests of one or other of which might have been consulted in the Bill now before the House. The Government might have consulted the interests of the producers, by entirely prohibiting the transfer of cattle. They might have consulted the interests of the consumers, by imposing no restrictions on the transfer of cattle—by leaving it as free as it has heretofore been. But neither of these things has been done by the Government Bill—in fact, the effect of the Bill would be to place the utmost difficulty in the way of the cattle reaching the consumer, while it gave every facility for the rinderpest reaching the cattle. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will take into his serious consideration the Resolutions adopted at the meeting held yesterday. That meeting was certainly no party demonstration. That meeting was presided over by Earl Spencer; a Resolution was moved by Lord Grey, and strongly supported by Lord Lichfield. It was no party movement—it was a genuine expression of the views of the country gentlemen and farmers on the subject of the cattle plague. I complain, that in the Government Bill far too much regard has been paid to traditional jurisdictions. The right hon. Gentleman does not realize the fact that the infection is a question of geography and not of traditional jurisdiction. In ordinary cases, when dealing with men and their long-rooted feelings and opinions, it is very well to deal gently with traditional jurisdictions; but the rinderpest is not of human origin, and has no respect for long-rooted feelings. In dealing with such an extraordinary event, we should legislate boldly and firmly, entirely regardless of all human prejudices and feelings. When such a calamity as this falls upon our country, we must deal with it as we would with an enemy in the field. It is absurd to expect that we can put a stop to the rinderpest by paying respect to the opinions of every country parish, and balancing the claims of one little village against another. We should deal with the cattle plague as we would if a French marshal landed in this country at the head of 100,000 soldiers. The right hon. Gentleman has already shown great facility of conversion; I hope that he will be still further converted, that he will abandon his first hasty resolves, and that he will make such changes in the Bill as to render the action of the Government in this important matter at once comprehensive, prompt, and uniform.

Mr. AYRTON deprecated any attempt, in the discussion of this question, to cause a feeling of irritation and antagonism to spring up between town and country. When the cotton famine took place in Lancashire, he most strenuously supported the measure then adopted by the House, by which the wants caused by distress felt only in the towns were relieved by funds raised in the country as well as in the town districts. It had been said that the funds raised for the purpose of relieving the distress in Lancashire were beneficial to the poor alone. Now this was not the case, for had the support of the poor fallen on the ordinary poor rates alone, the rich taxpayers would have most severely suffered. Such being the case, he did not see how hon. Gentlemen could complain so strongly of the principle of compensation recommended by the Bill. He agreed that they should not be carried away by reverence for local traditions and authorities, but should confer power only on such authorities as were sufficiently strong to grapple with a great question like this. There was, however, one thing in the Government Bill of which he should complain—namely, the disposition evinced by the Government to respect every petty and narrow interest. They had, for instance, in dealing with the different municipalities of London, excluded the City. The result of this omission was to entirely exclude the City of London from the provisions of the Bill; whilst of all bodies responsible for the propagation of the disease the City authorities were, perhaps, the most responsible. There was no reason whatever that the City of London should be thus excluded, and he hoped the Government would direct their attention to the matter. There was another point to which he also wished to direct the attention of the Government. By the Bill which the right hon. Baronet had introduced, it was proposed to give compensation to the owners of all animals slaughtered, wherever that slaughter may have taken place. Now, in the Bill by which, on a former occasion, compensation had been given to the owners of cattle, it was enacted that the animal for which compensation was paid should have been slaughtered in some place where it had previously been for a certain space of time. Now, he regarded that as an exceedingly wise provision, and trusted that it would be inserted in the present Bill. If it were not, the result would be that animals from the country would be driven in crowds into the metropolitan and other large markets, and there slaughtered, the expense of compensation being thus shifted to the shoulders of the persons living near those markets. With reference to the measure of compensation, which some hon. Gentlemen considered excessive, he did not think the Government open to the observations that had been made. It should be remembered that the proposed sum was to be paid not on the slaughter of an animal but on its burial. The owner would thus lose not alone the carcass of the beast, but also its hide, hoofs, &c.; and remembering this important fact, he did not consider the amount of remuneration proposed at all excessive. He trusted, however, that the Government would consider the expediency of abandoning the cattle rate.

Mr. ACLAND felt convinced that the remarks of the noble Lord opposite (Viscount Cranbourne) would not prevent Her Majesty's Government from carrying into effect a Bill which, instead of being the result of three or four days' incubation, was the result of long experience and serious deliberation. He did not pretend to be in the secrets of Government, but he could bear testimony to the fact that every practical question relating to this measure had been carefully considered. The principles of the two Bills were these. The hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) proposed to stop all cattle traffic by road or rail for the next six weeks, with certain exceptions; while the Bill of the Government drew a distinction between the infected and the non-infected districts. Now, he believed that no measures, however stringent they might be, would be sufficient to stop the progress of the plague if they were in force for six weeks only. He had been in communication with many landowners and farmers upon the subject, and he believed that a very large number of practical farmers thought what the Government should do should be to enact something that would work not merely for six weeks, but for many months to come, and should rest upon a distinction between infected and uninfected districts; that there should be the most stringent measures for the former, whilst in the latter the system should be one which could be carried out by farmers who had to live by their farms. He wished to make one suggestion. He would strongly advise the Government to secure for the proper carrying out of the provisions of the Bill the co-operation of practical men through the country. The Government should also retain in its hands the power of overruling any local authority which should, from some local feeling, such as the influence of some crotchety individual or from any other reason, shrink from doing its duty. He had lately waited on the Home Secretary with a deputation from the Royal Agricultural Society and pointed out the wants of the West of England. In that part of England they were more anxious about the breeding than the feeding of cattle. Indeed, that observation applied to the whole of Wales and the West of Scotland; it was, therefore, important that they should have well-guarded means of moving cattle to the feeding districts. That deputation was in favour of the scheme proposed by the late Member for Whitby—namely, that no prohibition should be placed in the way of sending cattle to market, but that no animal should leave any market alive. The deputation impressed on the Home Secretary the necessity of making this Order, and the reply of the right hon. Gentleman was, “Why don’t you do that yourselves? you have full power to do it.” Many of the gentlemen present were not up to that period quite aware of the powers which the Order in Council gave to the local authorities. On the day after the interview with the right hon. Gentleman, he (Mr. Acland) returned to his county, and induced a Society representing six counties to put itself in communication with the lords-tenant and justices of peace of those counties. They then took certain precautions, the result of which was, that while Cornwall was full of the disease, Devon had almost entirely escaped. A regular cordon was established round the county as a whole, and round all infected parishes; information of the state of the disease was continually being received; and, in short, precautions were taken by the local authorities that it would be absurd to expect from any Government. He therefore thought that while on the one hand Government ought not to entirely give up their control over the local authorities, on the other it would be a most foolish and disastrous course to withdraw all discretion from these authorities.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, that representing one of the largest agricultural constituencies in the kingdom (East Somerset), he should be sorry to allow the Bill to pass into Committee without saying a few words on the subject. He represented a large cheesemaking county, and were the plague to inflict it, it would perhaps suffer more than any other county in England. It was a county where the most stringent regulations had been carried out. His experience, however, convinced him that Government action was decidedly necessary. However strict were the orders of quarter sessions, they were found to work most inconveniently, as they differed materially from those of the different boroughs in their districts. The very transit of cattle by railways created great confusion; and he had heard farmers say that from the vexation arising from the different regulations on the one side and the other, the remedy was almost worse than the disease. A farmer within his district had been recently summoned before the petty sessions on a charge of having transgressed the orders of the magistrates. For his defence the farmer produced the letter which he (Mr. Grenville) would now read to the House—

“Sir,—In reference to your letter of the 18th I am directed by Sir G. Grey to inform you that farmers may drive fat cattle to a railway station not situated in their own parish, provided it be the nearest available for the purpose.—I am yours, H. WADDINGTON.”

It thus appeared that the Orders in Council, as expounded by the Secretary of State, differed altogether from those of the magistracy. In the face of such mortifying facts it appeared to him that Government action was highly necessary. He therefore hailed the Bill before the House, not because it contained all that they wished, but because it showed the Government were in earnest in their endeavours to meet the evil, and he sincerely hoped that the result of the operation of the measure would be as beneficial to the country generally as they all desired. The orders of the quarter sessions differed not only from those of the Privy Council, but the construction put upon them by the magistrates and their clerks was most conflicting. In his county there had recently sprung up a feeling that the time had come for, to some extent, modifying the very stringent regulations in force to prevent the spread of the cattle disease. At a recent quarter sessions held in the county, a discussion took place with reference to this subject. But the chairman, Sir William Miles, a gentleman who had for many years sat in the House of Commons, expressed his opinion in favour of maintaining untouched the regulations at present in force, and read memorials supporting his view of the case from the two largest unions in the county. At the same time memorials, urging that the present regulations should be modified, were read from seven unions in the county. Before resuming his seat, he wished to make a remark with reference to the subject of compensation. From the manner in which this subject had been treated by some hon. Members, one would think that the farmers and stockowners when asking for compensation were asking for relief from a misfortune which had fallen upon them in the ordinary course of things. Now that view of the case would be quite correct if the agriculturists asked for compensation for cattle that died of disease. But it was one thing to have an animal die of disease and another to have a Government officer come into a man's shed and volens volens knock his cow on the head. It was said that farmers asking for relief under such circumstances was similar to a merchant's asking Government for relief if his vessel were shipwrecked. Now, if a man's vessel were shipwrecked it was quite true that he had no right to look for relief to Government, but it would be a very different matter if a Government officer went on board a vessel, scuttled it, and sent it to the bottom. A good deal had also been said about the manner of raising the fund for compensation. Now he objected to the 5s. head money on cattle. There was not, he believed, a union in the county which had not established its own assurance company, the subscribers to which were obliged to pay 5s. a head on their cattle. It would, therefore, be a hard case to increase the liability of those gentlemen to 10s. a head. He trusted that this Bill would be agreed to, and that no measure would be brought forward to encourage the destruction of calves, which would inflict lasting evils upon the country.

SIR GEORGE GREY: On one point the House is unanimous, whatever difference of opinion exists respecting the Bills that have been introduced—that is that whatever is done should be done quickly. There is a general agreement that the Bill of the Government should be read a second time—the Government taking the same course in regard to the Bill of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire—the point of difference between us being one which can be efficiently dealt with in Committee, and on which we shall be glad to have the opinion of the House. Therefore, I shall refrain from making any reply to the criticism of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire on this Bill, and shall likewise refrain from offering any criticism on his Bill. The debate, according to the rule of the House, must stop at a quarter before six o'clock; and I hope, therefore, that hon. Gentlemen will allow the two Bills to be read a second time, in order to fix the Committee for to-morrow.

MR. LIDDELL said, that considering the great importance of the Bill, he would suggest that there should be a morning sitting to-morrow.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that if at such very short notice the House determined on having a morning sitting to-morrow, many hon. Members might be prevented from attending. Should the Bill not make rapid progress in Committee, he would consider the propriety of having a morning sitting.

Motion agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

Then the CATTLE PLAGUE BILL [Bill 7] read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

CATTLE PLAGUE QUESTION.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Several Petitions presented.

LORD CAMPBELL inquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, upon further consideration, to give effect to the suggestion made to them on Tuesday last by a noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) to the effect that, with a view of insuring more immediate action, Resolutions should be submitted to both Houses of Parliament, and as soon as these were adopted, that Orders in Council based upon them should be issued?

EARL GRANVILLE: I am not aware of anything that has occurred since the discussion of Thursday last that would induce the Government to proceed by way of Resolution. As far as I am aware, from what has occurred in another place, there seems to be a very general concurrence of opinion in favour of proceeding by Bill; and, without agreeing with the Government measure in every particular, that whatever is done in that way should be done as quickly as possible. At no distant date, therefore, I hope to be able to lay the measure itself before your Lordships. We are dealing with the subject as promptly as possible, and as several important points are raised by the new Bill my answer must be that it is not the intention of the Government to anticipate the introduction of the measure to your Lordships by moving Resolutions in both Houses of Parliament.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in moving for certain Returns relating to the importation of cattle into the ports of Liverpool, London, and Hull, said, it would be in the recollection of their Lordships that in the course of a discussion which took place on the subject two or three days ago, he had mentioned that a large number of diseased cattle were suffered to come into the market, and that his noble Friend opposite (Earl Granville) had said that he could give no information beyond the fact that very strict orders had been issued upon the subject. Under these circumstances, he (the Marquess of Salisbury) had caused inquiries to be made in the neighbourhood of Blackwall with a view to obtain some information with respect to the condition of cattle landed there from abroad. The person he sent had furnished him with a statement of the number of cattle landed at Brown's and the Brunswick Wharves, Blackwall, as well as the number detained, and the cause of their detention, from the 3rd of December until the 15th of January inclusive. During that time 976 animals had been landed from Hamburg, Rotterdam, or Boulogne, and nine of them had been detained. Five of those detained were kept back because they were injured; one because it cancer in the head; and the remainder eighty-five had eczema. He had inquired what eczema was, and had been informed from good authority that it was what commonly termed foot and mouth disease, a disease which is very well known to agriculturists to be one of the most infectious and most injurious diseases to horned cattle, though not necessarily destructive to life. The largest number of cattle landed at these wharves from any ship during that time was 346 from Rotterdam on the 15th of December. His informant further ascertained that of a cargo of thirty-six beasts brought from Hamburg by the ship Ca fourteen were slaughtered at the point of disembarkation, because they had eczema, but the meat was certified to be fit for human food. And the whole of a cargo of thirty-three beasts landed from the ship Planet, from Hamburg, on the 15th of January, were slaughtered because they had the same disease; but they were with one exception, passed as fit for human food. The animal excepted was condemned, not because it had eczema, but because of "general decay." The compiler of the Returns then concluded as follows:—

"Being referred to the inspector's clerk to the Custom House for further information, I attended there and saw Colonel Grey and Mr. Hood (Comptroller). The latter wrote to the inspector calling for full details for December and January, of every case of disease arriving at the port. The bearer of the letter, on his return, said that the clerk on perusing the letter, intimated that he should not send the information.' Mr. Hood then promised to compel him to do so, and to write to Mr. Nicholson with the details."

He thought the House should be made acquainted with the strict instructions the Government had issued, and should be informed whether or not diseased cattle were allowed under any circumstances to come into the London market, and he would therefore move for Returns to that effect.

Address moved for—

"Copy of the Instructions given to Her Majesty's Customs with reference to the Prevention of the Importation of diseased Cattle:

"Returns of the Number of Cattle landed at the Ports of Liverpool, London, and Hull, with the Numbers detained, and Cause of Detention, in the Month of December 1865 and January 1866."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

EARL GRANVILLE, in assenting to the production of the Returns, remarked that as the application made to the clerk referred to was somewhat irregular, he was not surprised to hear that he had declined to give the information required of him.

Motion agreed to.

PRISONS ACT (1865).

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he had endeavoured upon a previous occasion to gain some information with reference to the conduct of prisons. In reply he was requested to move for certain Returns. He did not think they would supply him with the information he desired, but he had no objection to move for them, and if the result were not satisfactory he would make his inquiry of Her Majesty's Government again. He therefore begged leave to move, in terms of his notice, an Address for—

"Copies of Letters addressed by the Secretary of State for the Home Department to Chairmen of Quarter Sessions of Counties and Mayors of Boroughs: And,

"Of Correspondence with the Inspectors of Prisons on the subject of carrying into effect the Provisions of the Prisons Act, 1865."—(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

Motion agreed to.

CATTLE PLAGUE.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH, in moving for papers, according to notice, said, he thought that the discussion which would take place in their Lordships' House upon the reading of the Bill upon the cattle plague would be much facilitated by the production of the Returns for which he asked. The noble Duke then moved an Address for—

"Copies of all Orders made by Courts of Quarter Sessions relative to the Cattle Plague since the Order in Council of 16th December, 1865; and for a Copy of a Letter from the Secretary of State to the Chairmen of Quarter Sessions relative to the said Order."

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he thought it would be desirable to have the orders issued by the mayors and magistrates in the various boroughs produced at the same time. This was the more necessary inasmuch as the orders agreed to by the magistrates in quarter sessions had appeared in the county newspapers; but he did not believe that the same publicity had been given to the notices issued by the borough mayors and magistrates.

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to say that the orders would be extremely voluminous, and he hoped that an analysis would satisfy the noble Duke.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH thought the production of the orders in quarter sessions in extenso was desirable; though the analysis of the orders in boroughs would, he believed, be quite sufficient.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that if any difficulty prevented the Returns being made in extenso, it was at all events very desirable that their Lordships should have the analysis.

Motion amended, and agreed to.

Address for—

"Copies of all Orders made by Courts of Quarter Sessions and by the local Authorities in Cities and Municipal Boroughs in England and Wales relative to the Cattle Plague since the Order in Council of 16th December, 1865, and an Analysis of the said Orders; and a Copy of a Letter from the Secretary of State to the Chairmen of Quarter Sessions relative to the said Order in Council: And the like Return and Analysis for Scotland as respects Orders made in Quarter or General Sessions, or by the local Authorities of Burghs or Towns having a Town Council."—(The Duke of Marlborough.)

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS—STATUTE 24 & 25 VICT. c. 113.—QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government to propose to continue the Act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 113, relating to Industrial Schools, which expires on the 1st day of January next?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied that it was the intention of the Government to propose the continuance of the Act in question.

FOUNDERING OF THE "LONDON." QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is true that a counsel retained by the friends of some of the passengers lost in the London to attend the inquiry into the causes which led to the foundering of that ship, retired from the investigation because he was not permitted to cross-examine the witnesses; and, if so, what steps have been taken by the Board of Trade to elicit by an inquiry the whole facts so connected with that melancholy event?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, it was true that a learned gentleman who appeared on behalf of the relatives of some of the persons who perished in the London was refused permission to cross-examine the witnesses who were examined at the inquiry. Mr. Traill, the presiding magistrate, refused that permission in order that the inquiry might be conducted according to the provisions of the Act of Parliament. The form of the investigation into cases of shipwreck, which was ordered by the Board of Trade under the Merchant Shipping Act, was prescribed by the Act; and under it a person was specially appointed to conduct the inquiry. Mr. Traill, therefore, thought that the inquiry into the loss of the London should be conducted strictly in conformity with the Act; but in the exercise of his discretion had he allowed counsel to appear on behalf of the relatives of persons who had perished he would have caused long delay, and might have unnecessarily prejudiced rights and liability which were proper to be determined in a court of law. As some misconception prevailed on the subject he wished to state that no decision was come to in these inquiries which affected the rights or liabilities of any one, and that no one had a right or claim to be heard except the captain or mate, who might be deprived of his certificate. If it appeared during the inquiry that the ship was lost through default on the part of the captain or mate, it was provided by a clause in the Act that in such a case such captain or mate should have a full opportunity of being heard either by himself or counsel. Mr. Traill had pointed out to him that there would be great practical inconvenience of various kinds if an inquiry into the cause of a wreck, instituted with the view of enabling all concerned to provide remedies against similar casualties, such as improved construction of ships, correction of charts, new lighthouses, and the like, should be made an opportunity for interested parties to anticipate proceedings, which ought more properly to take place in an ordinary court of law.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, as it seemed to him impossible that the public would be contented as respected the safety of passengers with the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, he gave notice that on a future day he would call the attention of the House to the subject.

SEWAGE OF TOWNS.—QUESTION.

MR. SCHREIBER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose, early in the present Session, any additional legislation with regard to the Sewage of large towns?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the Government did not entertain any such intention; for this reason—in the course of last Session an Act was passed giving municipal and local authorities power to acquire land, and other facilities in respect of sewage, and a Commission was also appointed to inquire into the state of rivers in the United Kingdom including the effect on them of sewage of towns. Until some experience had been obtained of the operation of that Act, and until a Report had been received from the Commission, the Government did not think it expedient to propose any further legislation on the subject.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE (IRELAND). QUESTION.

COLONEL FORDE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether any general orders have been issued by the Irish Government to the Constabulary and Revenue authorities, requiring them to inspect all vessels arriving at any place on the Irish coast, with a view to enforcing the Orders in Council prohibiting the importation of cattle and sheep? The hon. and gallant Member said there were reports in the north of Ireland that cattle were carried there clandestinely, in small vessels, from England.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he could not state what the specific instructions were, but instructions to the effect mentioned had been given. A short time ago he received a request from the Lord Lieutenant that a vigilant supervision should be exercised by the Customs authorities at the ports in England and especially in Scotland whence cattle might possibly be embarked for Ireland. The attention of the Irish Government had been closely directed to the subject, and no doubt they had given specific instructions to guard against the danger apprehended.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE asked the Attorney General for Ireland, Whether he did not think there was great danger in delaying the introduction of a measure to meet the requirement of Ireland, should the cattle plague extend there?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAWSON), in reply, said, that already an Order in Council was in force in Ireland with respect to the cattle plague, and a Bill had also been prepared on the subject, and would be submitted to the House as soon as practicable.

MAJOR KNOX wished to put a Question to the Home Secretary on a subject which had excited great alarm in the north of Ireland. He wished to know whether it was true that an Order in Council had been issued, or was about to be issued, for the admission of hides and skins of sheep and lambs into Ireland in a disinfected state?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied that no such proposal had ever been made to him, or, so far as he was aware, to any Member of the Government.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE—COMPENSATION RATE.—QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether in those counties in which a Rate for Compensation has already been raised by voluntary assessment, those who had paid such Rate would be relieved by the amount they have already paid from contributing to the Rate to be raised by the local authority?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that if there existed already a fund in hand applicable to the same purpose as the proposed rate, there could be no possible reason for a second collection. On the other hand, however, if a fund raised, either by a voluntary rate or by local contributions, was applicable to another purpose, it would still be necessary, in order to give compensation for animals slaughtered under the Bill, to raise a sufficient sum for this purpose by rate.

CATTLE PLAGUE (SCOTLAND)—MEETING OF SCOTCH MEMBERS.

QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO said, the Lord Advocate had called a meeting of Scotch Members for two o'clock to-morrow in the tea-room on the subject of the Cattle Plague. He should like to know, What was the particular question to be discussed?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, his object was to ascertain the views of Scotch Members, respecting those clauses of the Cattle Diseases Bill which applied to Scotland, and especially with respect to the machinery for carrying out the provisions of the Bill in Scotland.

NEW COURTS OF LAW.—QUESTION.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK asked, What course the Government intends to pursue in reference to the selection of the architectural designs for the new Courts of Law?

MR. COWPER said, the designs for the new Courts of Justice and Offices would be selected by competition, among architects. As the preparation of those designs would require very protracted and minute study in order to meet the special requirements of the courts and offices, competition would be restricted to a small number of architects, and the selection of the architects would be intrusted to a committee, which would include eminent members of the legal profession and Members of the Government.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Ordered, That the first Three Orders of the Day be postponed till after the other Orders of the Day.

CATTLE DISEASES BILL—[Bill 6.]

COMMITTEE.

[The Bill having been Committed, Re-committed, and Considered as Amended, without having been re-printed, great difficulty has been experienced in following out the Motions for Amendments, particularly those of which no Notice had been given. When a Clause has been agreed to, with or without Amendment, the small figures added refer to the No. of the corresponding Clause in the re-print of the Bill No. 22.]

Order of the Day for Committee read.

On Question, That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair;

MR. PUGH said, he wished to say a word with reference to that part of the country (Carmarthenshire) with which he was connected; that was at present uninfected, as were, he was happy to say, ten counties in Wales. All, of course, were for preventing diseased cattle from being brought into the district, but there seemed to be no reason for stopping the free movement of cattle throughout the whole of that uninfected area. In the interesting memorandum published in The Times yesterday on the course of the distemper in the last century, it was stated that then also an attempt was made totally to prohibit the movement of cattle for a limited period, but that it was abandoned on account of the violent opposition which it encountered. He wished that nothing of the kind should happen now; that they should have no occasion to retrace their steps; or to say of any part of the Bill improvidé emanavit. It would be seen from the same memorandum that in the subsequent outbreaks the safety of the country was sufficiently provided for by the proclamation of infected places, and the prohibition of the removal of cattle from them. He hoped that drawing a cordon around them or something of the kind might now, or soon, be found to be sufficient. There were other districts similarly situated. It would be a satisfaction to all to know that their case had been considered, though their wishes might not be gratified to the full extent. He would leave the matter in the hands of the Government. All that was wanted was, to relax the stringency of the 21st clause, so as to except the uninfected districts, which could be done when they came to that clause or in a subsequent stage of the proceedings.

COLONEL SYKES said, that on Tuesday last, before the adjournment of the House, he had made a suggestion which he thought it would be well to adopt. It was—That the compensation clauses, which excited much diversity of opinion, should be made into a separate Bill, and that the stamping out clauses should be gone through once with a view to expedite matters.

Motion agreed to :—House [in Committee.]

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 postponed.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 (Local Authority in Counties Scotland).

THE LORD ADVOCATE rose to dress the Committee—

MR. DISRAELI said, he wished to say a word with a view to the progress of the business, whether the explanation which the Lord Advocate was about to give was the same as that which he intended to give at the meeting in the tea-room to-morrow. It was his object to facilitate the progress of the Bill, which he had been in hopes would be passed through Committee to-night. But if there were an arrangement by which a section of the Government to meet a section of the Members of the House to-morrow it might have the effect of preventing the passing of the Bill through Committee that night. He trusted that the Lord Advocate would make his explanation then with the view of expediting the Bill.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the explanation which he intended to give was a reference not to the meeting to be held to-morrow, but to one which had been held two or three days ago, in which the Members were unanimously of opinion that tenant-farmers should be associated with the local authorities in working the Bill.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he would not delay the Committee on a matter which was not of first-rate importance, but to his mind there were several points in the clause which were highly objectionable, and which he would have explained. In the first place the tenant-farmers who were properly disposed to associate with the justices of counties in forming County Boards, and whom it was proper very justly to associate with the Commissioners of Supply, were to be nominated by the lord-lieutenant. That was not respectful to the tenant-farmers, who were quite as capable of electing their representatives to the Board as the magistrates themselves. In the second place, it was proposed that in case the county authorities should be remiss in enforcing the Act, the Secretary of State, through the sheriff of the county, should have power to do

Now, there was no reason whatever to introduce a provision which contemplated that the local authorities would not do their duty. No provision of the kind had been introduced with regard to England, and it was equally unnecessary with respect to Scotland.

LORD HENRY SCOTT said, he would recommend the postponement of the clause until after the meeting to be held to-morrow, as it involved questions of great importance.

LORD ELCHO said, that as it was desirable that the measure should be proceeded with without delay, this clause, which applied only to Scotland, and was likely to raise some discussion among Scotch Members, should be postponed.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he did not see how the postponement of the clause would expedite the progress of the Bill.

SIR ANDREW AGNEW said, that celerity was the object which they had in view, and he did not see how it was possible in a short time to get tenants to hold mass meetings to elect representatives.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that it was the universal opinion on this subject that whatever was to be done should be done without the slightest delay. Now, the tenant-farmers of Scotland were not a legally-constituted body, and if they were to elect the members of the County Board, providing the machinery for that election would cause much loss of time. He therefore thought it would be better to leave the election of the Board to the Lords Lieutenant and Commissioners of Supply. With regard to the latter part of the clause, he had no desire to retain it if the feeling of the Committee was against it.

MR. CUMMING-BRUCE said, he should support the Amendment. The election of the County Board ought to be left in the hands of the tenant-farmers, who were the persons interested, and not intrusted to the Lords Lieutenant, whose appointments were based on purely political grounds.

Amendment negatived.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate what number of persons the proposed County Boards were to consist of?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Not less than four, nor more than ten.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he thought that the numbers proposed were, especially for large counties, too small. He moved, as an Amendment, that the words in the clause should be "not less than four, nor more than fifteen."

Amendment agreed to.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he desired to draw attention to the omission of any qualification for the tenant-farmers who were to be nominated by the Lord Lieutenant. He would move an Amendment to insert the words "valued in the valuation roll in force for the time at £100 a year or upwards."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he consented to the proposed change.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. DUNLOP moved that the sheriff of the county should form part of the Local Board.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. CARNEGIE moved the insertion of words making "Lord Lieutenant and the convener of the county ex officio members of the Local Board."

Amendment agreed to.

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved the omission of the words at the end of the clause empowering the Home Secretary to nominate the persons to carry out the Act in Scotland, in case the Lord Lieutenant or Commissioners of Supply neglect to do so.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON moved an addition to the clause, giving the local authorities of counties power over all the boroughs within their respective counties, except as to compensation—that being left to the boroughs. He proposed to exempt Glasgow and Edinburgh. The great number of local jurisdictions in the counties had been the great difficulty in putting the Orders in Council into execution. Any disputes arising should be left to the arbitration of the sheriff, whose decision should be final.

The LORD ADVOCATE said, he could not agree to the Amendment. The clause was framed like the similar clause relating to England. If the burghs were to be legislated for by the County Board, it would be necessary for them to be represented at the Board.

COLONEL SYKES said, that if Edinburgh and Glasgow were to be exempted, he should claim a similar exemption for Aberdeen.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, that unless his Amendment were agreed to, it would be possible for the boroughs to neglect carrying out the regulations. In some of the Scotch boroughs the Orders in Council and those of the county local authorities had been set at naught. If the Government objected to his Amendment in its present shape, he would suggest that the chief magistrate in the boroughs should be associated with the county authorities.

MR. CUMMING-BRUCE said, he hoped that the Amendment would be accepted; although he admitted that, if Edinburgh and Glasgow were exempted, Aberdeen, Dundee, and one or two other of the larger towns should enjoy a similar exemption.

SIR ANDREW WAGNEW said, he trusted that the operation of the Bill would not be frustrated by the clashing of the local authorities. He thought that the Lord Advocate might frame a proviso that would meet the wishes of the hon. Member for Ayrshire.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that if the Government would adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) and define the powers to be exercised, then these discretionary powers would not be required; but if the Bill were to remain in its present shape, the Amendment of the hon. Baronet would defeat the whole object of the Bill.

Amendment put, and negatived.

Clause 6 (Power to assemble General Sessions).

MR. ADDERLEY said, there appeared to be an intentional omission in this clause. By the clause it would appear that the justices would have power to convene a general sessions at any time. What he would propose was, that it should be confined to the first convening of the sessions, they having power to adjourn from time to time. The object of the Bill was simplification; but he was afraid confusion would be increased if general sessions could be convened by any two justices, each session acting independently and antagonistic to the other.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, the clause ran thus—

"Any two or more Justices of a County may, by writing under their hands, require the Clerk of the Peace to summon a General Sessions of the Justices of the County for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this Act."

Now, he apprehended it was quite necessary that the local authorities in the various counties should be at once constituted without delay under the Act, in order to be in readiness to carry out its provisions, and it might so happen that in certain counties the justices might altogether object to the Act being brought into operation there. He would, therefore, suggest that the clause should be made imperative in its language, and instead of beginning with the words "any two or more justices may," should commence thus:—"The Clerk of the Peace in every county in England and Wales shall be and hereby is required to summon a General Sessions," &c. The effect of that would be to have the proper local authority constituted at once in every county.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the object of the clause was to facilitate the meeting of a general sessions without delay where the quarter sessions have not been adjourned, and to obviate the inconvenience arising from the necessity of giving a lengthened notice. He had addressed a letter to the chairmen of quarter sessions, pointing out the expediency of adjourning for short periods, and in many cases they had done that. Where that was so, it was not necessary that these general sessions should be convened, because the quarter sessions could meet from time to time. In some counties that had not been done, and in these it was necessary there should be power to convene a general sessions. Perhaps it would be better to provide that where no adjourned sessions was appointed to be held within two or three days from the passing of that Act a general sessions should be convened forthwith. He would prepare a clause which should meet the object of the Amendment.

MR. HUNT said, it would be better to postpone the clause and bring up a fresh one on the Report.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he would do so.

MR. HENLEY said, he hoped that care would be taken not to set up two authorities, for as the Bill was now drawn it was very doubtful whether the general sessions and the quarter sessions would not be in existence both together.

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE suggested that the Secretary of State should insert the words "in England and Wales," so as to make it clear that the provisions should not clash with those of Clause 5.

Clause postponed.

Clause 7 (Power of Local Authority to form Committee of its own Members and others).

MR. ADDERLEY said, that under this clause there might be an unlimited number of committees, leading to greater confusion than that which even now existed. At first the Government began with the petty sessions; afterwards they felt it necessary to extend the area to the quarter sessions; but even then they found that every quarter sessions throughout the kingdom drew up a set of orders all more or less differing. The object of having an Act of Parliament, therefore, was to go a step further, and make the action national and uniform. The existing machinery was sufficient in all respects except uniformity; but that clause, as it stood, was actually a retrograde step, for it disintegrated the quarter sessions, and introduced confusion worse confounded. The proper course would be to enable the quarter session of a county to delegate its authority to only one standing committee. He would have only one committee in each county except in particular cases, such as in the county of Hants, including the Isle of Wight, in which case he would have a second committee, taking care, however, to prevent the two from clashing. In that way they would avoid the issuing of clashing orders, and the committee could act within proper restrictions in the intervals between the general meetings. He hoped that that clause would also be postponed for re-construction.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, that in order to make the Bill popular it would be best that the executive committees should be of mixed composition, having non-magisterial members upon them.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that if the local authorities were to have the power of granting licences for the removal of cattle, of issuing orders for their slaughter and of regulating matters of that kind, it was absurd to suppose that one committee in the centre of a county would be sufficient in cases where immediate action was necessary at any particular spot. He suggested that the clause should be postponed.

MR. DENT said, that the powers to be given to the committee would be very large. He thought there should be only one committee from whom all the directions should emanate. If there were other committees they should be only executive.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the object of the clause was merely to afford facilities to the quarter sessions to discharge their duties. An hon. Member suggested they should have the power of appointing an executive committee. He presumed if it were found necessary to appoint more than one committee rules would be laid down for their guidance, so as to ensure uniformity. He thought this might safely be left to the quarter sessions, but he had no objection to postpone the clause and some of the subsequent clauses, as he thought that they might be discussed to greater advantage when the House had decided what the powers of the local authorities should be.

SIR JOHN SIMEON said, that the Isle of Wight eminently required to be left to deal with the case by itself, and as far as that island was concerned the Orders in Council gave a convenient authority. The Isle of Wight was a petty sessional division of the county of Hants; and it would be a great inconvenience for the inhabitants to have to receive their orders from a central committee for the whole county, sitting probably at Winchester.

COLONEL EDWARDS said, that a considerable section of his constituents living in a district containing large herds of high bred short-horned cattle, varying in value from £25 to £500 each, complained bitterly of the arbitrary power of the local authorities contemplated by the Government Bill. It appeared to him that by the provisions of that Bill the Board would have power to destroy all the animals in one farm or farm-stead, if in one solitary instance infection was proved or even suspected. He (Colonel Edwards) deprecated this arbitrary power as a gross injustice and a virtual confiscation of property when the amount of compensation was to be so disproportionate to its value. His constituents feel that as in many cases where the rinderpest has broken out, and where isolation has been resorted to at the earliest stage, many cures have been effected—also, that in cases where the immediate slaughter of the suspected animal has taken place the disease has been arrested—that exceptions might fairly be made where such an amount of property was involved, and where no proportionate compensation was allowed to the owners, many of whom must otherwise be utterly ruined.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, it would perhaps be better to postpone the whole of the first part of the Bill until the House had determined what the temporary provisions should be.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE: We should in that case come to the temporary provisions of the Bill at once. If you do not have such a clause as this you will not carry out the provisions of the Bill at all.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had no intention of abandoning this clause.

Clauses 7, 8, and 9 postponed.

Clause 10 (Appointment of Inspectors and other Officers).

MR. HUNT proposed the addition of words continuing in office inspectors already appointed under the Orders in Council.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had no objection.

Clause postponed.

Clause 11 (Power of Entry for Inspectors, &c.).

MR. LONG said, he hoped that when this clause should come under consideration, the right hon. Gentleman would make provision for the compulsory disinfection of cattle inspectors, it being strongly felt in many counties that the greatest carriers of cattle disease were the cattle plague inspectors.

Clause postponed.

Clause 12 (Limit of Duration of Part I).

MR. HUNT said, he would suggest the addition of words providing for the revival of any provisions which might have been discontinued.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he assented to the proposal.

Clause amended, and agreed to. [cl. 11.]

Clause 13 (Slaughter of diseased Animals).

MR. AYRTON said, that the clause, as it stood, held out a premium on the shifting of diseased cattle from one place to another, inasmuch as while it provided that compensation for the slaughter of a diseased animal should be paid by the local authority, it contained no condition that the animal should have been in the particular locality for a certain number of days previous to its being killed. The point was a very important one for the Metropolitan Market, for he was afraid that if any one in the country districts suspected that his cattle were diseased, he would immediately hurry them up to that market, where of course it would soon be discovered that they were attacked by the plague. They would, upon that discovery being made, be at once slaughtered, and the metropolis would be obliged to bear the burden of paying the proposed compensation.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that anybody bringing diseased cattle to the metropolis or any other market would be liable to a penalty. He had prepared a proviso in reference to compensation, the effect of which was that it should not be given in the case of any animals removed from one place to another in contravention of the Act.

MR. BRIGHT: I wish, before we go further, to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary whether he does not think it desirable to postpone for the present the clauses relating to compensation. It is admitted on both sides of the House that it would be well to pass as quickly as possible a measure which is meant to put an end to the plague; but then this question of compensation might be discussed more at leisure. I beg hon. Gentlemen to bear in mind that the purport of this Bill is almost entirely unknown in the country. There are hundreds of thousands of persons who may be called upon to pay the tax under this Bill who have never seen the Bill and do not know in the least what we are discussing at this moment. I have never known, since I have been in Parliament, a general measure of taxation, as many feel, of a very doubtful character, hurried through the House in the manner in which from the pressure of the case—I am not blaming anyone for it—but from the pressure of the case it is sought to hurry this. I yesterday made some observations to the House upon this question. I feel we are in danger in our haste of committing a mistake, which, after all, is of no great pecuniary importance probably to anyone, but is of great importance as establishing a precedent on which this House may be called upon in future times to do that which we shall find it difficult to refuse, and I hope still more difficult to grant. The three clauses which touch the question of compensation are the 13th, the 16th, and the 18th. The 31st has reference to the rate. The 13th says that every animal diseased shall be slaughtered, and that the owner shall receive, providing the amount does not exceed £20, for any beast a sum equal to two-thirds of its value. Now, bear in mind that this is an animal already ill of this complaint. It is not a sound beast—as we call it in Lancashire—in the “shippen” or in the field. It is a beast that, judging from experience, has no great chance of life. Now, this clause enacts that it shall be slaughtered by authority—that the owner of it, who in all probability would part with it with pleasure for a sovereign or two sovereigns, is to receive two-thirds of its value in case the sum is not more than £20. My hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) yesterday put this point to the House, and he put it in a manner which is absolutely unanswerable. You are killing this beast by authority, but that in all probability is precisely what the tenant, the owner himself, would do to save from danger the rest of his stock. It is not worth, at the moment you kill it, one-quarter, perhaps not one-tenth that which you propose to give, and, therefore, I say you are departing even from the recognized principle of this Bill—you are giving compensation where it is not for the public good and not to prevent the spread of the disorder. You are buying from an owner, an unfortunate owner—but fortunate, if this Bill passes—you are buying from him at a high price a beast in the last stage of existence whose price in the market would perhaps be nil. Now this is one point. I understand the hon. Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt). He believes in the efficacy of isolation. I wish some other authority—the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), for instance, who appears now he is out of office to be an authority on everything—I wish he could tell us, as one of the Cattle Plague Commissioners, whether he considers that if cattle on a particular farm can be entirely isolated from all communication with cattle on any other farm, whether, under such circumstances, it is necessary for any purpose but saving the healthy stock on the farm to destroy that portion of the stock which is diseased. I heard the other day of a gentleman, in the county of Surrey, who has some fields with a high wall round. No man is permitted under any pretence to go inside those divisions, in which he has valuable cattle. The plague has raged all round hitherto—in fact, I am told by the hon. Member for Guildford that he does not know of any part of the country in which the plague has been worse; yet in these particular spots there has been no plague whatever, because there was an entire absence of communication with any surrounding farms where the plague existed. Now, if you could assure this isolation, then I take it to be granted that you would prevent the spread of the disease from an in-fectured farm to a healthy farm. Now, if you are killing diseased cattle, supposing that my position with regard to that be right, you are killing a man's sick cattle in order that you may save the best of his cattle. [An hon. MEMBER: His neighbours'.] No! an hon. Member says his neighbours'. Of course his neighbours', if their cattle are allowed to commingle in the field. But if kept separate and isolated, then, I say, he is not doing this for the good of his neighbours, but for the good of his own stock and the good of his own farm. I think I am only arguing fairly from the statements made during these debates. Now, you come to kill the healthy stock on some farm. Why do you do it? You do it to prevent the risk to that stock from the infection spreading from the diseased portion of his stock. That is clear. Well, if you kill that healthy portion, you kill it clearly to avoid the extra risk to the farmer, and you offer him a compensation which, perhaps, it may be better for him to take than stand the risk. If the infection does not spread, he will not gain by getting the compensation; but if the infection do spread, and the rest of his herd have to be destroyed, then of course he is a great gainer by getting three quarters compensation. I am placing this before the House to show how almost entirely the course you are pursuing by the Bill is a course directed to the special advantage or the special salvation of the property and interest of the farmer. I am not at all going to argue that nobody else has any interest whatever. We all, I hope, have some interest in each other's welfare. But as far as the question of legislation is concerned, this Bill is directed—I am not going to say unwisely directed—for the advantage of those who are the owners of stock. If this be so I cannot comprehend how any man in this House can imagine that you have any claim on the general property of the country or upon the property of those who are not the owners of land, the cultivators of the soil, or the possessors of stock. If a man had his house on fire, it would be a monstrous proposition that he should bring an action against the fire-brigade because injury had been done by a deluge of water. In this case you kill diseased cattle that those around the sick may not be infected; but if you think the danger is great, you kill them, and you offer a compensation equal to three-fourths the original value of the healthy stock. Now, I believe every

Gentleman in the House will agree with me that it is a misfortune that there has not been established throughout the country long ago powerful insurance societies—I mean powerful by the possession of large capital for the purpose of providing during the ordinary course of years for calamities such as this. That, I think, is the general opinion on both sides of the House, and you now come to ask that the House shall do that on account of this pressing emergency—this unexpected calamity—shall do that which, if the farmers had been as prudent as many other people, they would have done for themselves. Now Gentlemen, do not let it be supposed that I am contending you should do nothing, or that Parliament may not wisely do much in this matter. I am not arguing that Parliament may not now, if it likes, assist the landowners and tenants by some general organization of insurance. In the ordinary form it may be now too late. It would seem to be thought so, for you look to taxation, by which the same result, as near as may be, may be brought about as would have been brought to the unfortunate farmers who have losses, had they in past years established a general and great system of insurance. I am not against that, but I ask hon. Gentlemen of this House this question, and I hope I shall not be met by insulting and offensive observations, which have nothing to do with this question, and which have nothing to do with my argument. I put it to every gentleman here who has a sympathy with farmers, and who has, as I hope we all have—a sympathy with justice—I ask him would he think it likely, were a general system of insurance established for cattle, that people that had not any cattle, or any land, should be compelled or expected to subscribe to the funds of a great insurance society for the purpose of relieving the calamities that might fall upon those concerned in agriculture? Clearly not. If there was a great insurance society for farmers' cattle, farmers and cattle-owners would be the only persons who would subscribe to that insurance association. Therefore now, when Parliament wishes, as it were, to bring into one comprehensive scheme a general plan of relief, I think we ought to have regard to that principle and that fact, and abstain from the imposition of any rate or tax whatsoever in connection with this matter except upon that great, influential, and most wealthy class of society connected with the ownership and cultivation of the Hon. Gentlemen may fancy that I am arguing this way from some personal position to that class. I have never put to any Member on that side of House so mean a motive for anything which he did. In all probability—in—certainly, as far as I am concerned this matter will have the least possible influence—it would not take more probably out of one's pocket than the dinner a week. I am not speaking with reference to what any person will have to pay. I think the House—and I hope they believe me—are about to adopt a principle which heretofore they have never adopted and which, if they accept it now, will bring them into great difficulty at some future time. I think it will have a most precious influence upon every class of country that may chance to come under any special calamity. Lately we have had some great calamities. There was Yorkshire, a few years ago, the bursting of a reservoir at Holmfirth. At Sheffield there was but recently another accident the same kind, which caused an enormous amount of damage. In Lancashire there has been a failure in the supply of cotton. In all these cases there has been a magnificent generosity shown on the part of the public, so much so that in each case there was a very considerable percent of the money subscribed returned to those who subscribed it. Nothing could be more generous on the part of the nation; nothing could give more pleasure than such a failure. But if you establish the principle of this Bill, that when the cotton spinners or shipowners on the one hand, or the farmers on the other, shall come under the pressure of a great calamity like this—and especially a calamity against which they may have provided—that they may come to the House for assistance, it will do much to dry up the springs of benevolence, and bring many other persons to the Bar of this House asking for similar measures founded on the pernicious principle which this Bill is built. I appeal to the Gentlemen opposite, as the most wealthy class in this country—as the class with the greatest amount of certain property—as the possessors of the income, I would say, that is most unvarying except that it is constantly increasing. Hon. Gentlemen know perfectly well—much better than I do—how much their incomes have increased since we ruined them in the last about twenty years ago. Supposing that compensation must be given—if the measure be confined as it ought to be confined to owners and occupiers of land—you may give extensive relief as much as you will by this Bill, and it will not make any essential difference to any Gentlemen I see before me or to any of their friends. On the other hand, it will keep Parliament from the commission of an error that if committed now will bring us, I am persuaded, into many occasions of difficulty hereafter. The clauses of this Bill are so intimately connected that it is almost impossible to offer observations upon one of them without touching upon the others. I may be allowed to say, therefore, that the proposition to give retrospective compensation is one that the House should not tolerate for one moment. We have heard from many Members of the House what has been done in different counties. There have been subscriptions, insurance societies, and arrangements suited to the ideas of the different gentlemen and farmers in the different counties, and compensation of one kind or another has been made. That is infinitely better than what is proposed by this Bill. There was not a single landholder or farmer who anticipated, until the Bill was introduced, that the Government measure would contain a provision for retrospective compensation. It would be well that the Government should consent to have that clause left out of the Bill. I have heard of a case to-day in which a farmer, who was very foolish, bought three or four beasts that were not in good health when he bought them. He introduced them amongst sixty or eighty head of cattle, and lost nearly the whole of them. He had a sympathising and generous landlord, who told him it was a bad thing, a great misfortune, and said he would help him to pass over the difficulty. But though this farmer was a foolish man in buying sickly stock, he was a man of great independence and pluck. He confessed to the landlord that he had done a foolish thing; but that it was entirely his own fault, and that being his own fault he would carry himself through it, and would not ask the landlord to give him anything. I see an hon. Gentleman who looks very much as if he wished his tenants were of the same mould. In the generosity of that landlord, and the independence and courage of that tenant you have, if you like, the model for the best class of landlords and tenants throughout the country. I beg the House also to bear in mind what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) as to the question of the extent of the compensation. I protest against the Chancellor of the Exchequer coming here in two characters. My right hon. Friend confines to a sixpence in a speech on the Budget. If we want to get rid of the most trumpery licence duty, the fate of the whole country might be depending upon it. But now, because this is a matter of county expenditure—and local expenditure—that does not come into his great speeches; he has not a word of sympathy for the persons who are to pay the tax, nor does he seem to care how much the House is likely to saddle the country with. I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give us his opinion on this matter. He ought to be as much an economist now on a question of local taxation as if the measure had reference to the taxation of tea or coffee, or to the expenditure for the military or civil service. I have spoken fully; therefore, although it would be possible to say a great deal more, I will just in a few words of summary put the matter to the House thus:—This Bill has been brought in in great haste, and under a feeling of great excitement. The haste is apparent in the fact that there are almost as many opinions on it in the House as there are persons. Clauses are postponed, Amendments are proposed, and possibly in this emergency a Bill satisfactory to no one, and least of all to those who brought it in, will be passed. The districts not being known no one in the country can discuss it, nor will an opportunity be afforded for their doing so. It is not put off till the Easter holidays—that every one may see it. It would not be wise that it should be so; but it is a thing unusual that we should go on from day to day with the different stages of a Bill of this kind involving a large amount of taxation—it may be an entirely new kind of taxation—for a purpose hitherto never recognized by this House. I have had no communication from Birmingham. I have had no communication from Lancashire, except from one person, who wrote that surely the Members for his town will not be likely to let a Bill of this kind pass in a hurry, involving as it does this new principle. The House will not do wisely if it passes the compensation clauses of this Bill, goes through Committee with it to-night, and reads it a third time to-morrow, it having been read a second time so recently as yesterday. Avoid this precipitation in a matter of taxation about which the great body of the people know nothing, having never been consulted in the matter. I have only further to move that this clause, and the other clauses respecting compensation, shall be postponed for the further consideration of the Government.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, my hon. Friend has just laid down the principle that the clauses of this Bill are so connected together that it is impossible to discuss any one of them without considering the others at the same time, and I must say he has acted very largely in accordance with that principle. I must, however, be allowed to say, that if his impression be shared by many Members of the House, we have but little chance of gaining the object most of us have at heart—namely, that of passing this Bill quickly. Differing respectfully from him, there appears to me no reason whatever why the various questions, doubtless very important ones, referred to by my hon. Friend, should be discussed on the consideration of the clause before us. My hon. Friend has spoken upon the amount of compensation, if any, that should be given; upon the sources from whence that compensation is to be raised; upon the question as to whether the Bill ought to be hastily passed; upon the principles of isolation and of slaughtering, and of the manner in which I am disposed to treat the question. Now, these questions are entirely distinct from each other. In the first place, I will answer the question addressed to myself. My hon. Friend says I have no interest or care for any expenditure, so long as such expenditure is local and derived from local resources. To show how far that accusation is from being correct, I will at once acknowledge that, in my opinion, both my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) hit a blot in the Bill when they pointed out that the rate of compensation for the slaughter of sick animals was too high. Still it would be a great mistake, in my opinion, to fix the rate of compensation in such cases too low. The hon. Member for Westminster says that the outside value of the sick animals is to be ascertained by taking the ratio of the number of animals that recover to those that die. No doubt the value of the animal might be easily ascertained in that manner, but there is something else to be considered before you determine this question. You must take into consideration the natural tendency of the farmer in the great multitude of cases to hope too much. He calculates too favourably on the chances of own cow or beast recovering where other people's cattle have died. It is not the interest of the farmer alone we are now considering. We wish to offer an inducement to him to come forward and make known directly any cases of disease which occur among his cattle. Under these circumstances, it would be useless to fix an amount of compensation at too low a rate, while, at the same time, I admit that there is considerable danger in fixing it at too high a rate. We should not only have magistrates meeting in quarter sessions but the tenant-farmers acting with them, and it might have the effect of slackening their energies; but I think we ought to wait until we come to that portion of the clause. I hope my hon. Friend will permit us to go on with the clause before us before he calls upon us to consider what reduction shall be made in the amount of compensation to be paid for the slaughter of animals. But I do not think it would be necessary or very wise to allow in the case of the slaughtering of such animals so much a compensation as that fixed by the Bill. Upon the question of slaughtering animals I cannot agree with the hon. Member, who says that it is only necessary to isolate a farm to prevent the spread of disease. In a part of the country, in which I am familiar, the traffic has been stopped, and the farms have been altogether isolated, yet the disease has passed from farm to farm. To use the form of compensation adopted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lush), when the volume of infection reaches a certain point the air becomes impregnated with it, and you cannot trust to isolation as a protection. It appears to me, I conclude, that the slaughtering provisions in the Bill lie at the very root of the matter. In fact, if it were not for these provisions there is no reason why we should be assembled here at all. It is in order to provide provisions of this character that this Bill has been introduced. With regard to the source from whence this compensation should be provided, that is a question which will arise upon the clause to which my hon. Friend has referred; and the question of compensation is one entirely of different character and principle from that of the source from which that compensation is to be provided. I submit that there are two questions before us arising out this clause. One is whether you are to provide for the coercive and compulsory slaughtering of infected cattle; and the other is whether you can so provide without providing also that compensation shall be given. It appears to me that these two propositions so limited hardly admit a dispute. That being so I will not trouble the Committee longer, but will wait until we come to the terms of compensation, in which I think some modification may be made.

MR. BRIGHT: I do not wish to delay the progress of the Bill; but I thought that upon the two points as to the amount of compensation and the sources from whence it was to be derived, considering their importance, and that there was a difference of opinion in the House, it might be as well for the Government to take another day for their consideration, so as not to commit the House to a hasty determination. The House will doubtless divide upon the question of the sources from whence the compensation is to be derived, and the majority can then take whatever course it thinks fit. But I think it would be wise of the House to alter the Bill in that respect. I will now withdraw my Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. JOHN HARDY said, that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham was mistaken in thinking that simple isolation of a farm would preserve it from the disease. He differed from the hon. Member in the opinion which he entertained, that the slaughtering of cattle was merely for the benefit of the farmer. He might mention an instance which occurred in the county with which he was connected, in which a farmer, finding that the plague had broken out amongst his cattle, slaughtered the whole of them in order that the disease might not spread throughout the district. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to think that the compensation proposed was too high. The hon. Member for Westminster considered that it was much beyond the value of the animal. Now he (Mr. Hardy) thought it improper to take the valuation of an animal in a dying state, which might not be worth the value of its skin. When a man had kept cattle through the winter and they were ready for market, £20 would scarcely pay for the value of any one of them. When the disease made its appearance on a farm everything was thrown into confusion, and nothing could compensate the farmer for the failure of his trade. The hon. Member for Birmingham seemed to have decided in his own mind against compensation altogether. It was very hard that it should be levied on those who had suffered. It ought rather to be levied upon those who had not suffered. The hon. Member for Birmingham had blamed the farmers for not insuring; but he could tell the hon. Member that in one county they had insured, and had at one time between £3,000 and £4,000 in hand, which had all been swept away in consequence of the breaking out of the cattle plague. In another part of the same county, a society had been established to meet the losses arising from the disease, and great credit was due to the lord-lieutenant for the efforts which he had made in procuring its formation. With regard to what had been said by the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill), that the farmer might be induced to slaughter his animals in order to obtain the price that would be paid as compensation for them, it might just as well be argued that a carpenter would be induced to burn his tools for what he would get in his insurance upon them. He did not think the compensation proposed was at all too much, and he hoped that any compensation voted by this House would come from the Consolidated Fund, in order that the whole country might join in paying it.

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE proposed to insert the word "immediately" or the words "with all convenient speed," after the words directing all animals affected with the plague to be slaughtered. If the diseased animals were to be slaughtered, there should be no delay about their slaughter, any more than about their burial, which the succeeding clause directed to be done as soon as possible.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the word "immediately" was a relative term. To what would it have reference in this clause? Immediately, after what? If they attempted to be very minute they would defeat the object of the Bill.

MR. BRIGHT said, he wished to ask whether hon. Gentlemen were desirous of adding to the force of the words compelling a slaughter. He saw in the public papers that some gentleman had discovered a treatment for the disease which was supposed to have been effectual in several cases. If an intelligent farmer found that a certain course of treatment was successful, would it not be a monstrous proposition to say that he was to slaughter his diseased cattle at once under a heavy penalty? Certainly this was an odd sort of legislation.

Amendment negatived.

COLONEL SYKES said, a remark had been made on the other side of the House, that those who had not suffered ought to pay. But nine-tenths of the population had suffered by the cattle plague. Had they not suffered by it in the payment of at least 2*d.* a pound more for meat, and in the enhanced price of milk and butter? Why should they be called on to pay over and over again? He begged to move, as an Amendment, the omission of all the words after the word "such," for the purpose of inserting the words "amount as is named in the schedule," instead of the words, "not exceeding twenty pounds as may equal two-thirds of the value of the animal."

AN hon. MEMBER said, that there were many cattle insurance associations in different parts of the country. Were the farmers to be compensated from those funds as well as by the Government? In that case they would give their animals the rinderpest at once, because they would get a double compensation.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he did not see the slightest advantage in putting off the question of compensation till they came to the schedule.

MR. HUNT said, he did not want a maximum amount for every animal, but a maximum amount for each class of animals. He therefore thought it desirable to have a schedule. He was of opinion that the clause should contain words to the effect, "not exceeding in any case the amount provided in the schedule to this Act with reference to beasts of the class to which the certificate relates." He thought it was desirable to have a schedule in which the amount of compensation should be divided into classes, taking yearlings, two-year-olds, three-year-olds, and, perhaps, making a difference between milch cows and steers as separate classes. He also called attention to the fact, that Clause 13 related not only to neat stock, but to sheep, lambs, goats, and swine, the interpretation clause providing that the word "animals" should relate to all those beasts, and that only the word "cattle" should relate to neat cattle alone. In that case, if there were no distinction between the separate classes, they might have to pay as much as £20 in compensation for the loss of a ram. A bull calf of a few days old, if it came of a valuable breed, might be worth 100 guineas. Were they to pay only £20 for it? He should support the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen.

Mr. Bright

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that if they were to go into all these details they never would get on with the Bill. Clause 17 provided that the local authority might require the value of any animal slaughtered under the Act to be ascertained by officers of the local authority, or arbitration. He thought the object of hon. Friend (Mr. Hunt) would be attained by this clause. He did not think there was any fear of more than the value of animal being given, seeing the source from which the compensation was to come.

MR. HUNT said, he did not think it would be right to pay the value of every animal. They ought to take the average value of an animal of the class.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, that in Warsaw thirty-five Russian roubles were given for a bull, twenty-five for a cow, and fifteen for a calf—a much lower rate than that proposed by the Bill.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE said, that he thought his hon. Friend had forgotten what the question of compensation meant. The object of it was to induce the owners of cattle to declare the disease. It was not merely to compensate him but to save the country. Now, if the owner of a valuable beast knew that he would get nothing for the value of his cattle after they were slaughtered, of course he would not declare the disease, and the object of this Bill, to stop the spread of the plague, would be foiled. If we were to go to the precedents of foreign countries, which in the interests of the agricultural community was much to be desired, because abroad agriculturists were better treated than in England, he thought it would be preferable to have recourse to Belgium than to Poland. In Belgium the amount of compensation, according to the declaration recently made by the Minister of State, amounted to more than the value of the animal itself, two-thirds of the value was allowed to the owners, who were also permitted to sell the meat when not unfit for human food. The result was that in the majority of cases the compensation amounted to the value of the animals. If the hon. Gentlemen had devoted as much attention to the subject as it was to be wished he had done, he would have found that the great majority of the animals killed are perfectly fit for human food. The Commission, indeed, was wholly unable to discover a case of human disease resulting from the consumption of this meat. He particularly wished to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to the example of Belgium, because it showed that the result of giving large compensation had been that the existence of the disease had always been promptly declared, and when it had broken out it had been extirpated with ease, so that Belgium had almost entirely escaped the calamity.

SIR ANDREW AGNEW said, he should oppose the Amendment. If it were proposed that the compensation should be divided into classes it ought to be done at once, and the Bill proceeded with.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he trusted that the provision would be so made, that if an animal destroyed were of any value afterwards it might be sold, and allowance made for the sale in the compensation which was provided. He also called the attention of the hon. Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) to the fact that different kinds of stock in different counties were of different values. He thought provision should be made for that, and that they ought to have two scales, so that the local authorities might be allowed to distinguish between the different values, and place the animals in those different scales. If they only laid down one scale it would not be found to work properly.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he should support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Aberdeen, because it embodied the recommendation put forward by the hon. Member for Birmingham—a recommendation which deserved a greater amount of consideration than it had met with in the House. When the right hon. Gentleman (the Secretary of State for the Home Department) announced this measure, he said it would be a matter for the consideration of the House whether it might not be desirable to deal at once with those parts of the question in which all were agreed, and postpone those with regard to which there existed differences of opinion. Now, these questions of slaughtering and compensation involved such difficulties that he would even now press on the Government whether they ought not to be embodied in different Bills, and whether it would not be desirable to deal at once with that portion of the subject on which a large proportion of the House was agreed. He was surprised at the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) asking whether isolation had not failed. He might, perhaps, refer to localities where the system of isolation had led to a great diminution in the amount of disease; but then, on the other hand, it might be asked whether the system of slaughter had not failed. The Report of the Royal Commission gave a history of ten years of the disease in the last century, when upwards of 180,000 animals were slaughtered without any signal result, and the disease at last died out of itself. As to the system of compensation it was one of despair, and declared the utter inutility of any remedial system. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey), who brought forward the Bill, remarked that there had been a great change of opinion on the subject during the last fortnight. In his belief public opinion was changing at the present moment. Hitherto public opinion had been chiefly founded upon the solitary case of Aberdeenshire. Well, in that county the disease had broken out again. It was all very well to say you can slaughter, and you will put down the disease; but the question was whether, by adopting that plan, the disease could be put down altogether. For his part, he did not believe it could. Did hon. Gentlemen read the newspapers, and had they seen a letter written by the Member for Kincardineshire, and which appeared in The Times of yesterday? In that letter the hon. Gentleman gave an extract from a communication he had received from Kincardineshire. It was as follows:—

"Farmers here have generally been in favour of the 'stamping out' on the same plan as in Aberdeenshire, but within the last week a change of opinion has taken place, in consequence of the successful treatment of the cattle disease by Mr. Alexander. Mr. Garland, of Cairnton, has followed the same treatment; he has a stock of seventy-five, forty of which were attacked, and only one died. In my parish, of which I am convener of the plague committee, I find one herd all recovering from similar treatment, while, at another farm, where no salt had been given, but as much straw and turnips laid before the beasts as they could eat, all had died. As far as our experience has gone, all who have used salt for some time and liberally have had no losses. I have been using it for three months, and have had only one case. I killed the beast because I was in front of the advance, but I believe it would have recovered."

In Aberdeenshire there was a case where a man was foolish enough to place a diseased animal in the same byre with fifteen others which were not suffering from it. Now, that was a natural result of the "stamping out" principle, which taught people to be negligent. He had that morning read an account of a meeting held at Ayrshire, at which one gentleman said—

"We find the treatment so successful in some instances that we are not at all in favour of the killing principle now."

It was clear that public opinion was undergoing a change even now—in Scotland, at all events—and he, for one, would not subscribe to the doctrine that we ought to use the language of despair, and adhere to it as if it was our only resort. The House ought, however, to stick to that part of the Bill on which all were agreed. In his own neighbourhood he did his utmost to teach the people self-reliance. Local assurance societies had been formed, both there and in other parts of the county, and had met with signal success. If a large amount of compensation were granted in addition to what was received from these societies, people would be anxious that their cattle should catch the rinderpest. [Cries of "No, no!"] At all events some persons would, though the great body of the owners of cattle might not be so unscrupulous.

MR. BANKS STANHOPE: I think that it would be comparatively easy for those Members of the House who are connected with the farming interest to draw up a compensation schedule, stating a maximum sum per head to be allowed for cows, for three-year-olds, for two-year-olds, for one-year-olds, and for animals above and under six months. Any arrangement such as that alluded to by the hon. Member (Mr. Hunt) in which £20 would be given as compensation for a bull calf would be objectionable. Calves often are worth £40, £50, or £60; but at the same time great dissatisfaction would be engendered if a difference in favour of fancy cattle were made as compared with tenants' cattle. After what has passed, I must say a few words on the subject of compensation, but not in the spirit of the hon. Member for Birmingham, who, whatever his own feelings may be—and all must give him credit for honesty—has on two successive days discussed a subject which is felt to be outside of party in speeches more provocative of angry feelings than any speeches I have ever heard. Yesterday I think the hon. Member for Birmingham could not have read the Bill at all, for he talked of farmers receiving compensation for losses. They do not ask for that, and the moment it is admitted that they do not seek to be secured against accident or misfortune, all that the hon. Member for Birmingham has said on that head vanishes into air. The farmers do not ask the country to pay for any cattle that die the visitation of God; but they do ask that every animal slaughtered by Government or by local authority under its direction should be paid for. The central Government has no right to tell him what to do with the animals upon his farm, except at a particular time and for a particular reason. The approach of a meat famine and the necessities of State constitute a particular time and reason, and these facts being admitted, and the slaughtering being allowed to be not for the good of one class but for the good of all, the farmers have no moral right to demand payment, not a proportion of the value of the animals slain but of their whole value. Their leave is not asked; they must kill, whether they will or no. The hon. Member for Birmingham has talked as if the question affected only the rich landlord. ["No, no!"] beg pardon; the hon. Member instances a landlord with an income of £15,000 a year and asked if the country was to make his losses. But the question does not affect rich landlords only. There are districts in which, practically, the landlords are no richer as the tenants under them. In the county where I live there is a perfect uniformity; but, curiously, in the other part of the county an enormous proportion of losses has been sustained by the small tenants and by large farmers who live on the land of landlords who are not practically so rich as their tenants. It is not, however, a question between a big man and a little man. The farmers ask for nothing as a gift. They ask only for that to which they have a right. If this House, in its wisdom, declares that a man's farm shall be entered and his cattle slain, the demand is that he should be paid for them. The money paid is not a gift, and the farmers will thank the House for it; they will accept that the action of the Government is necessary; and because it is, they will give the assistance they can to the Government. But I must ask, and I will ask the hon. Member for Birmingham with greater assurance than I could ask any other person, whether the consumer has no interest in the matter. Many of the hon. Member's constituents are hardworking men, artificers in industry whose heavy toil makes animal food a necessity. If its price rise to 1s. or 2s. a pound, what increase must be made in the wages of the artificers of Birmingham to enable them to eat that amount of meat which is necessary to the maintenance of the health and strength required in work? I was quite astonished to hear the hon. Member say we were creating a panic. [Mr. BRIGHT: I said—Legislating under a panic.] There is no panic—our opinions were formed two or three months ago. The alarm that was felt arose from the consumers, who are gradually becoming aware that their interests are identical with those of the producers. But I assert that the House by carrying this measure will prevent a panic. But if the hon. Member succeed in dividing one class from another, there will be a panic in less than six months; and you will find, as is invariably the case, that those who ridicule the danger are the first to lead the panic. I could not follow the argument of the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) as to the amount of the sum to be paid, but understood him to object that it was too high. But it should be remembered that, when a man is told to slaughter, he has no chance of saving his cattle, a proportion of which, if allowed to live, might recover; but by allowing nine out of ten to die naturally, a focus of infection would be permitted which might carry off his neighbour's cattle. Having been a breeder of shorthorns, I know the value of a herd and the difficulty of regaining one. It requires twelve or fourteen years, or more, and a man has, therefore, every inducement to keep his herd together, and his animals alive as long as he can. It is a delusion to suppose that the increased price of meat will compensate the producer, because the stock of young animals will be reduced, and store stock will rise enormously in value. Besides, by losing animals, he will be prevented from farming his land well. Wheat requires manure, and the making of manure necessitates the consumption of straw, and I have advised a farmer who has lost his cattle, but had his farmyard full of straw, to buy as many swine as he could, and put them into the yard, in order to get the straw upon the land. That, however, is very bad farming. And if the system were adopted on anything like a large scale, the consequences must be very serious. I assert confidently, that if to any considerable extent the number of cattle in this country were diminished, and the opportunities of having manure made in the farmyards fell off in consequence, the area of land under wheat must be diminished to a proportionate extent. The double catastrophe would thereby be entailed upon the country of having to depend to an increased amount both for meat and food upon foreign countries, while the supply of milk at home would be also greatly restricted. I put it to hon. Members opposite, representing large and populous constituencies, what would be thought of the wisdom of Parliament if we were instrumental in creating or prolonging a state of things in which we might have at once both a meat and a wheat famine. As regards healthy cattle, there is an apparent harshness in the course which has been recommended; but I am persuaded that to extirpate the disease, it is best and cheapest to kill all that are likely to die before they catch the actual disorder, for whatever their sale produces, will be so much saved from the county rates. The insurance societies alluded to by the hon. Member for Birmingham, are altogether beside the question. Within my own memory, insurance societies have existed till one fine day pleuro-pneumonia made its appearance, and they all broke. Those were societies formed upon the best possible rules, but no insurance companies can be expected to make head against a calamity which sweeps and devastates the whole land. Upon this question I can assure the Committee that it is the desire of the representatives of the agricultural interest to act fairly and honestly. Let old differences between town and country be forgotten; let the consumer join with the producer in devising the best remedy under the circumstances, and let us all join in aiding Her Majesty's Government to prevent, by every means in our power, the further progress of this foul disease which is spreading destruction and desolation through the land.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, his hon. Friend the Member for Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke) had suggested that they might proceed with those portions of the Bill upon which they were all agreed. If there was one point more than another on which such agreement appeared to exist, it was that a system of slaughter in the case of diseased animals should be adopted. That opinion had been expressed in the most unqualified terms by the Royal Agricultural Society, the conference at St. James' Hall, the Scottish Farmers' Club, the Highland Society, and by the agricultural interest generally. Now, nobody could recommend the adoption of a system of slaughter without some system of compensation. The only question, therefore, was whether the subject of compensation should be disposed of at once, or its consideration postponed till they came to the schedule. He must say he thought it was better to dispose of it at once. He had been asked to express an opinion whether owners whose cattle were slaughtered would be entitled to recover the value from insurance offices in which they might be insured and from the county rates as well. He apprehended that if there were still in existence any societies which would pay for loss of cattle occasioned by death from the rinderpest, no claim could be established against them save for actual loss, and if the owner were paid out of the county rates for the cattle belonging to him which were slaughtered he would have suffered no loss, as he would have been compensated for it.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he thought it would be a great mistake and a great evil if they made this in any way appear a compensation Bill. It would give dissatisfaction to every agricultural interest, and everybody connected with land ought to take care that not a shadow of pretence was suffered to exist for calling it a compensation Bill. If his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had only followed up his observations by making some definite proposal as to the amount, he thought the question might have been easily settled. The question of compensation ought only to be entertained so far as it bore on the means of inducing the proprietors of stock to assist in getting the cattle disease extirpated promptly by the most stringent measures, that being the sole object of the Bill. If they carried the money question at all further than this, they placed themselves in a false position. The payment of so large an amount as two-thirds of the value might give a wrong impression as to the true object of the measure.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was very desirable to detach the various points of the discussion, and to keep them apart from each other as much as possible. They were not now discussing the amount of compensation to be awarded, but simply whether it should be dealt with at once or deferred till they came to the schedule. Having settled that point, two others remained—namely, that raised by the words “not exceeding £20,” and next, whether the words “two-thirds” should be adopted.

COLONEL SYKES said, the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) having improved upon the phraseology of the Amendment, as originally submitted, with the leave of the Committee he begged to withdraw it.

Amendment withdrawn.

MR. HUNT moved the omission of the words “not exceeding £20,” and the insertion in their place of the words—

“But not exceeding in any case the amount specified in the schedule to this Act in reference to animals of the class comprising that to which the slaughtered animal belongs.”

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, he thought they ought to come at once to some definite conclusion as to whether they would name a maximum price for all beasts slaughtered, or whether a fixed proportion should be allowed of the value in each case, whatever that value might happen to be. The question was a very simple one, but they must face it at last.

Question proposed, that the words “not exceeding £20” stand part of the clause.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he wished to know on what principle that sum had been fixed?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the Motion made by the hon. Member for Northampton was that the words “not exceeding £20” be omitted. If it was intended to move subsequently the insertion of any words instead of £20, it might be convenient to put the Question on the words “not exceeding,” but if it was the wish of the Committee that he should put the Question on the words “not exceeding £20,” he should do so.

Question put, That the words “not exceeding £20” stand part of the clause; put, and agreed to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that as the clause now stood it left no discretion to the persons whose duty it might be to ascertain the value of the animals. He was of opinion, that independently of the question raised by the hon. Member for Westminster there ought to be some discretion in the matter. In Aberdeenshire one of the rules of the association allowed the owner to claim an indemnity of two-thirds of the value of his cattle that died of the disease. But when they took into account the great difference as to the chances of an animal recovering when seen in the first attack and when it had reached the last stage of the disease, it was clear that there must be a great difference in the estimate of its value at those different stages. He did not see how to meet that except by introducing the words "not exceeding." Then came the question whether they should leave the words "two-thirds," or adopt some other words. His hon. Friend had ascribed to him a position which many other hon. Members were better able to assume. His own opinion certainly was that words "not exceeding one-half the value" would be a fair arrangement. That would be, he thought, a liberal inducement for farmers to declare the existence of the disease in their stock, and would leave power to the local authorities to adjust the precise value in each case. Though he attached great weight to the Aberdeen precedent, yet he thought it would mislead them if they followed it to the letter. He understood that in Aberdeenshire there were two associations founded on a voluntary basis, one for the assurance of cattle, and the other for the extinction of the plague, and that was the reason they had placed their rate of compensation so high. He moved, therefore, to omit the words "two-thirds," and to insert the words "a sum not exceeding £20, and not exceeding one-half the value."

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he wished to ask were animals to be slaughtered compulsorily, and yet compensation be paid to only half the value?

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he had heard with great surprise and regret the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman to alter the Bill of the Government in deference to the views of the hon. Member for Birmingham. It was now sought to cut down the compensation which might be given to a person whose beast was destroyed against his will, to a sum which might be far less than the value to him of that beast. Now, in what position did they place the owners of cattle in the county which he had the honour to represent? If no Act was passed at all, they left the owner of cattle to do what he could for himself. In Suffolk they had a system of voluntary assurance, under which any one whose cattle died of the plague was entitled to compensation to the amount of two-thirds the value of the beast. But now it was proposed to pass an Act by which officers of the Government could go to a man's farm and kill his cattle, and yet they would not compensate him to the value of three-fourths or two-thirds, or even one-half, because by the substitution of words which were not in the clause as originally framed it was absolutely left open to those who had to assess the compensation to award less. What would be the consequence? If there was no Act of Parliament, under the voluntary system of insurance which existed in Suffolk a man would be entitled to three-fourths of the value. If the value was £120, he would be entitled to £90. Well, the House stepped in, and under the irresistible power of an Act of Parliament they put this man's cattle to death, deprived him of his claim against the insurance association, and, instead of £90, the utmost he could receive would be £60—it might be even less. He would not confine these observations to the county of Suffolk; they would apply to any county where there might be an assurance association. If, instead of allowing a man to do what he liked with his own, to take his chance of a cure—and that there was some hope they had heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne yesterday, and they saw from the announcements in the newspapers to-day—if when, perhaps, no mischief might be done, and the cattle might recover either by the remedy of Mr. Worms or some other person, they would not allow the cattle to be cured, but forcibly slaughtered them, they would do a grievous wrong by laying it down that the compensation should not exceed one-half. He would venture to say that they ought to adhere to the decision of the Government when framing the Bill, and should not reduce the amount below two-thirds.

MR. BARING said, that the difficulty set up by the hon. and learned Member would in no wise be affected, whether the compensation were fixed at two-thirds or one-half. It would be the same if three-fourths of the value were fixed upon as the maximum of compensation. The difficulty might be overcome by an alteration in the rules of the insurance society, and they could make their rate of compensation accord with the rate of compensation fixed by this Bill.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he very much regretted the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman, which was evidently founded upon the fallacy conceived by the hon. Member for Birmingham, who had asserted that the Bill had been framed solely for the benefit of cattle owners. If the assertion were a correct one, then the course taken would have been justified; but, as a matter of fact, the Bill established a great principle of public policy. When men were called upon to destroy their property for the public good, they should be fairly recompensed. It was true that cattle were depreciated in value immediately they were attacked by the rinderpest; but it was not proposed to act upon the principle of restoring the value of that which was almost valueless. The principle offered for the acceptance of the House was that an inducement should be offered to owners of cattle to bring up their possibly diseased stock that the inspector might deal with the animals according to law. The measure under consideration must, in his opinion, be justified upon that principle of public policy or not at all; and he earnestly urged the right hon. Gentleman to hold out a liberal inducement to the owners of cattle to declare when their stock was diseased.

MR. DENT said, in his opinion, as a practical man, knowing something of the value of cattle, one-half of the value of a sound beast was a sum sufficiently ample to induce an owner of cattle to come forward. Indeed, £20 was the highest value that could reasonably be placed upon any animal except bulls, and he did not think the House should be influenced by the prices of high-bred stock, valued according to the caprice of fashion. He thought the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was a very fair one. Many farmers had complained to him of shameful oppression in having their animals slaughtered without compensation, but he had never met with any one who would be a stickler for having more than half the value of the animal.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he quite agreed with the principle of a liberal compensation, on the ground of compulsory slaughter. When a man's property was taken from him for the purpose of carrying out some public work, he was given more than the value by way of compensation perhaps 20 per cent more, because of the compulsory sale. The principle upon which that practice was founded should not be lost sight of in the case under consideration. He also thought something should be done to induce farmers to give information. Then they came to the application of the two principles. The right hon. Baronet had admitted that the value of a beast attacked by rinderpest was reduced to next to nothing. One-half of its value when sound was, in his opinion, an ample advance upon next to nothing, and would, no doubt, act as a powerful motive upon the mind of every owner of cattle.

MR. A. W. YOUNG said, the question of value had been argued as though animals to be put to death would be healthy ones, but this Bill would give compensation to men who had diseased animals. He read the Bill as proposing compensation in accordance with the value of the beast when the inspector came to it. He was apprehensive that the clause it stood, was not quite distinct, and he in doubt whether the value allowed would be half the value of the sound or of diseased animal. It could not surely be intended that they were to take the value of the animal after it was seized by disease.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would suggest the insertion of the words "when sound." That would make the matter quite clear.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, he would remind the House that the assessment was not made by the Government but by the local authorities, who would, no doubt, be a mixed body of ratepayers with farmers among them. They would certainly not fix a higher value than was justified because the compensation would come out of their own local rates. He certainly thought the right hon. Gentleman would do well if he allowed the clause to stand as it was.

MR. W. DUNCOMBE said, the phrase "next to nothing," in reference to value had been used. But in the county he was the honour of representing a mild form of the disease existed. Many animals which had been attacked afterwards recovered and it would be unfair to the owner to reduce the compensation proportionally from two-thirds to one-half. It should always be borne in mind that an animal may possibly recover from the disease after being attacked. He very much regretted that the Government had listened to the citations of the hon. Member for Birmingham. He certainly never expected to get much from the right hon. Gentleman for the agriculturists, but he had hoped for a more liberal suggestion than that made. He did not expect the right hon. Gentleman would have proposed to cut the moiety of compensation in a meagre spirit.

AN hon. MEMBER said, that while agreeing with the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he would suggest that the words "not exceed," "as may be" or "one-half" should be substituted.

MR. BONHAM-CARTER said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would press his proposal. He was sure the Amendment would meet the views of the local authorities.

MR. DUTTON said, he thought that two-thirds of the value of an animal, compulsorily slaughtered by a Government inspector, was certainly not too much to offer its owner. That was the proportion fixed in Aberdeenshire. At the same time, he thought it was just to limit the amount of compensation to be paid for any single animal destroyed to a sum not exceeding £20. It was true that there were many animals in the country of far greater value than £20, but such fancy animals were entirely in the hands of rich proprietors of stock.

COLONEL GILPIN said, that the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) had informed the House that the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) was an authority on every subject. Now, he (Colonel Gilpin) thought that it was the hon. Member for Birmingham who had an opinion on every subject, opinions for the utterance of which it should be remembered the hon. Gentleman had no official responsibility. It did appear that those opinions had great weight with her Majesty's Government, for on that night they had seen the Chancellor of the Exchequer yield on the important subject of compensation to the advice of the hon. Member for Birmingham. He had already heard something about divided counsels in Her Majesty's Government, and in the change which had taken place the House had an example of them. He entered the House that night with the full intention of giving his support to the Bill introduced by the Home Secretary, but he should oppose the change which the Chancellor of the Exchequer, yielding to the advice of others, proposed to make in it.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the hon. Member for Birmingham had advised the farmers to protect themselves from the losses which they may suffer from the cattle plague by mutual assurance societies. The hon. Gentleman was probably not aware that in Warwickshire there were many mutual assurance societies in operation, largely profited by the farmers of that county. These assurance societies—though compulsory slaughter was not enforced—paid to the owners of all cattle destroyed by the plague the very sum which the Government had originally proposed—namely, two-thirds of the value of each animal. There surely was no reason for the Government reducing the scale of compensation below that paid by the assurance companies.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he must call attention to the strangeness of the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government. After one of the illogical and violent speeches of the hon. Member for Birmingham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer suddenly, without notice, announced his intention to alter the proposal of the Government. But the Home Secretary, who was responsible for the contents of the Bill, had not given the slightest inkling of his intention to yield on this point, or any indication that he had based his calculations upon an erroneous principle. The right hon. Gentleman stated that those animals which were to be slaughtered were purchased by the State, and called upon the Committee to decide whether that principle was right or wrong. But was the House now to be told that the principle on which the Government had acted was erroneous, and that they were wrong? The Government were prepared to obey the hon. Member for Birmingham, who seemed on this and other occasions to be virtually the Government. This was a surprise on the House of Commons, and he hoped that the Committee would vindicate the conduct of the Government up to within half an hour ago, and carry this clause as it originally stood in the Bill.

MR. BRIGHT said, the noble Lord ought to bear in mind that he had made no proposition to the House, and that the proposition of the Government received the support of the hon. and gallant Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Wilson Patten), whose opinion on the subject was as valuable as that of any other Member. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) said the insurance association of that county gave two-thirds as compensation; but there it was given in return for a premium of insurance which the farmers had paid. He maintained that it was a monstrous proposition that there should be paid out of the rates the same proportion as was given in return for premiums. He hoped the Committee would accept the proposition of the Government, as a reasonable settlement of a question of some difficulty.

MR. HENLEY said, he had listened with attention to the debate, and thought the reasons advanced by the hon. and gallant Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Wilson Patten) were sound. The hon. Member had said, and with this he (Mr.

Henley) agreed, that they did not ask any compensation for cattle that died, but that if the Government chose to come upon a person's property and to kill some of his cattle for the public benefit, he had a right to compensation. But at what rate was this to be fixed? From his experience, which unfortunately was large, he had come to the conclusion that more than one-half the cattle which caught the plague lived. He, therefore, thought one-half a very fair proportion. But all these questions were very difficult; they knew so little, and were groping in the dark. The cattle which recovered from the disease deteriorated; they did not come out of the disease at the same value as they went in. He thought one-half a fair value.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I am much interested in this question in common with the hon. Member for Birmingham and other hon. Members. For myself I have endeavoured to consider it with reference to the country generally, and not merely with reference to my own constituents. Some of them are more deeply involved in this great disaster and calamity than any other body of her Majesty's subjects, for they own or occupy at this moment a greater portion of grazing land of a peculiar character than probably exists elsewhere in England. They have thousands of acres—which not merely in the memory of man, but for countless generations, have never been mown—the richest and finest land in England. Giving credit to the Government from the beginning for determination to act in the manner most advantageous to the public interest, I have endeavoured as far as I could to support it in the course which it should recommend Parliament to adopt. But, notwithstanding this endeavour, I am perplexed by the position in which I am placed; because, within the last twenty-four hours, many Gentlemen on this side of the House have deigned to consult me what course they ought to adopt under circumstances of extreme difficulty, and especially with reference to the clause before us, and the principle involved in it. I have avoided all abstract consideration of the circumstances, and have said to them, "I think on the whole your best policy and duty is to support the Government under the difficult circumstances in their attempt to do their best." It is in some degree influenced by the general counsels which I have thus given that we find ourselves in the present position. But I am astonished at what I have just heard. It is perplexing, and to a degree painful—when you have made up your mind to support the Government in the course which they recommend, and then listen to a speech of the Minister of the Crown, in which suddenly we are told that Her Majesty's Government have changed their opinions. We have then come down to support the Government, and find that our support is repudiated. I find very much regret it. I cannot say that Her Majesty's Government could not have arrived at their original principle of compensation to be awarded under the clause in a harum-scarum manner. They must have given the matter deep consideration, and that consideration must have been founded on a vast multitude of facts and data. No doubt they had to do so on a question of so pressing a character, with a greater quickness and promptitude than they would have been called upon to decide on questions of importance which are not so urgent, but not also they brought to the subject the full exertion of their intellects, and the full energy and determination. It is much to be regretted that men of talents and experience, that a statesman in the position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, especially upon such a subject of which he is master, had not been in the Cabinet to arrive at a conclusion of a more consistent character than that brought before the House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would then have saved his friends, and those who sit opposite to him on this side of the House, who are anxiously desirous to support the Government, from much embarrassment. I cannot say that I have arrived at a different conclusion from that arrived at by the right hon. Gentleman originally when the Bill was brought in under circumstances of great difficulty, I think, on the supposition it was the wisest proposal that could be recommended to Parliament. But the Government has suddenly, and in half-an-hour, changed its opinion. I do not go into the merits of the question. I am ready to bow to the opinions of the able and gallant Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Wilson Patten), and my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Henley), which upon such a subject are of considerable weight. If they are not weighty, I cannot say that in a few minutes I should be prepared to change my opinions. But, on the whole, it seems to me to be unwise to oppose the opinion the Government now patronise and uphold. The Government have changed their views; if the Government had come forward and recommended originally the course which they now recommend, though I might have doubted whether it was the wisest course, I have not the slightest doubt that we should not have divided under the circumstances. This act, there cannot now be the least doubt, is one of crude legislation; but I must, on the other hand, point out the immense benefit of acting with decision. The Government have changed their views. I do not wish to sanction that change, and I am inclined to support their previous opinion. But I do not recommend my friends to divide against this change of views. At the same time, they cannot forget the strange manner in which this change of views has been brought about.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I am happy to have to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the moderation of his language during the recess, which was calculated to strengthen the hands of the Government, and I am glad that he is now prepared to give a general support to the Bill. I cannot help thinking, however, that the right hon. Gentleman has attached undue importance to the course now taken by the Government. The alteration, after all, is merely one of detail in the Bill. Having laid the Bill before the House, the Government could not refuse to agree to any modification of its clauses. Influenced by the opinion on both sides of the House, the Government have come to the conclusion that the object of the Bill will be better accomplished by proposing compensation to the extent of one-half rather than two-thirds. This is a matter on which the House has a right to express an opinion, and the Government would have been wrong to say they would insist upon their original proposal. If the object had been only to ascertain the value with a view to compensation it would have been fixed at a much lower rate, but the object is to induce owners to declare the existence of the disease with a view to the destruction of the animals infected. It was urged that this object could be effected by substituting one-half for two-thirds, and the Government accepted the alteration.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he would not divide the House.

Words "and not exceeding one-half of the value of the Animal immediately before it was affected with the cattle plague" inserted.

Clause, as amended, agreed to. [cl. 12.]

Clause 14 (Burial of diseased Animals).

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, there was reason to believe that the flesh of animals in the early stage of the disease was not unfit for human food. If, however, the present clause passed, the animal would have to be buried, flesh, skin, and all. Would it not be well now the compensation was reduced to a half, to leave some discretion to the local authority to decide whether the flesh might not be used for food?

MR. BARING said, that admitting such flesh to be fit for food, it would be unwise to allow it to be circulated. The course suggested would be the most likely means of disseminating the disease.

MR. BRIGHT said, he had heard at Manchester of a case in which a farmer had buried a diseased beast with six feet of soil over it, but earth heaped up above the level of the ground. The dogs had subsequently scratched away the earth and devoured the carcass. He would propose an addition to the clause, enacting that the cattle should be buried with not less than six feet of earth below the natural surface of the ground.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE said, he concurred in the suggestion, and wished to know whether any penalty was attached to a non-performance of the provisions of the Act? The local authorities were to "take care" that certain things were done, but no penalties, so far as he had observed, were leviable upon the owners of cattle for breach of the provisions of the Act.

MR. BARING said, that the penalties were provided for by a separate clause.

MR. HUNT said, he doubted whether it would be possible in all cases to carry out the Amendment of the hon. Member for Birmingham. In certain soils it would be utterly impossible to bury the animals eight feet deep, which would be necessary if there was to be not less than six feet of earth between the animal and the surface. Not only was such a course impracticable, but it was also undesirable. Within twelve miles of his own neighbourhood the soil was of such a character that the inhabitants objected to the burying of the dead cattle, on the ground that the springs which supplied their wells would be rendered unserviceable. Even the words in the section, as they originally stood, he thought too strict. They ought to have some other and more suitable mode of disposing of the carcasses than burying them, and, though he was not prepared to make any proposition on the subject, he thought that the Government might possibly suggest some means of getting over the difficulty.

MR. AYRTON said, that carcasses which could not be buried might be burnt, and that such a contingency should be met by a paragraph in the Bill to that effect.

MR. HUNT said, he was perfectly prepared to acknowledge the beauty of the theory, but had objections to its being put in practice. He had paid a visit to one of the London cowsheds, and was informed that the carcasses of the dead animals had at first been burnt, but the result was so offensive to the neighbours that the proprietors were threatened with indictments for nuisances.

MR. LOCKE KING said, he thought the clause had better remain in its original form; for all knew that with a sufficient quantity of quicklime the carcasses were speedily consumed. He apprehended that in the case alluded to by the hon. Member for Birmingham the dogs had got at the remains of the buried animals because no quicklime had been used.

MR. HENLEY said, he did not coincide with the summary process by which the hon. Member for Birmingham proposed to surmount the difficulty. In many places they could not dig six feet into the ground without penetrating far into the gravel, and thus affecting the purity of the springs, and the consequence of the burial of thirty, forty, or sixty beasts under such circumstances would be the poisoning of the whole of the people in the neighbourhood—a result which he believed would hardly be advocated by the hon. Member for Birmingham. Wherever the carcasses could be buried at a sufficient depth without inconvenience people would be glad enough to do so, because hillocks were regarded with no favour. Where, however, the ground from its nature could not permit of so deep a burial they ought to insist upon having the ground heaped over the carcasses, and then trust to the quicklime for preventing further mischief. He hoped that the hon. Member for Birmingham would not press his Amendment, because he believed that its adoption would lead to many inconveniences. To drag cattle any distance, and through other fields, for instance, would be tantamount to incurring great risk of spreading the infection.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he thought the object sought by the hon.

Mr. Hunt

Member for Birmingham would be insured by the use of the words "not less than six feet to the satisfaction of the local authorities." He would, therefore, move the adoption of those words.

MR. BRIGHT said, he was satisfied with this suggestion, and would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he hoped those words would compass the object. He might, however, state that in Cheshire many of the cows had been buried immediately outside the cowhouses, close to the villages, and the stench proceeding from the soil was so great that there were grave apprehensions it might breed a pestilence. He thought that some clause should be introduced forbidding the burial of the carcasses in the vicinity of dwelling-houses.

MR. WYKEHAM-MARTIN said, he could bear personal testimony to the inconvenience and unpleasantness arising from the burial of some of these animals in the Isle of Wight.

MR. DISRAELI said, he thought that, remembering the varying nature of the soil, the local authorities might be trusted as far as regarded digging the trenches sufficiently deep. In Cheshire the nature of the soil was clayey, and in the Isle of Wight chalky, and in order to avoid the inconveniences alluded to by hon. Gentlemen it would be better to leave the matter to the discretion of those whose duty it would be to see after these matters.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he would remind the House that the Bill provided for difficulties of that nature by allowing the local authorities to acquire suitable ground for burying the carcasses.

MR. LOCKE KING said, he believed that the provision for enforcing the employment of sufficient quick-lime would be found to answer every purpose. It was the best disinfectant which could be used.

Amendment negatived.

MR. SURTEES moved the addition of the words—

"Every inspector, cattle overseer, or other officer appointed by the local authority, shall report weekly to the local authority the number of animals that have died or been slaughtered through the cattle plague, and shall certify to the proper burial of such animals, and such Report shall be forwarded to the Home Secretary."

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that any such provisions should be dealt with in discussing those clauses which related to the duties of the inspectors.

MR. DENT said, he wished to know, as many of the cattle owners were poor people, whether the expenses attending the burials would be borne by the local authorities.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that where animals were ordered to be slaughtered by the local authorities the expense of their burial would not be borne by the owner.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to. [cl. 13.]

Clause 14, as amended, agreed to. [cl. 13.]

Clause 15 (Purification of Sheds, &c., of diseased Animals.)

SIR EDWARD BULLER moved the omission of the word "field." He said that he could not see how a field could be disinfected.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, it was necessary, if a diseased animal were slaughtered in a field, that the place where the animal was killed should be cleansed.

Amendment withdrawn.

SIR EDWARD BULLER moved to substitute the word "direct" for "prescribe," so that the clause should read "and every local authority shall direct the disinfection of clothes, and the use of due precautions," &c.

CAPTAIN CARNEGIE suggested that some penalty should be provided in the case of inspectors and others neglecting to disinfect themselves.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU moved an Amendment, including within the operation of the clause any place in which a diseased animal had been kept during the continuance of the disease, as well as the place where it died.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. HUNT said, the language of the clause required all hay, straw, litter, or other articles with which a diseased animal had been in contact to be burnt or destroyed. In some cases that would be impossible. An animal might die in a farmyard which was full of wet manure, and he thought they should require that manure to be disinfected.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the clause already provided for such disinfection.

LORD STANLEY said, he would suggest the insertion of some words of limitation after "burnt or destroyed," as, for example, the words "if necessary."

VISCOUNT MILTON moved the insertion of words at the end of the clause to the effect that no inspector or other officer appointed by the local authority should visit cattle in more than four separate farms or homesteads in any one day of twenty-four hours, or inspect cattle in the same close or part of a close consecutively on the same day in the same clothes, under the liability to a penalty not exceeding £10.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the last part of the Amendment should be postponed till they came to the duties of the inspectors, and the Committee had just given power to the local authorities to direct the mode in which officers employed by them should be disinfected. The first part would create serious inconveniences. The great difficulty hitherto had been to get competent persons as inspectors, and if they were not allowed to make more than four visits in a day the number must be so multiplied that they could not hope to get men fit for the duty.

Clause, as amended, agreed to. [cl. 14.]

Clause 16 (Slaughter of Cattle herded with diseased Animals.)

MR. BRIGHT: I have to suggest an alteration in accordance with the view I have taken of the Bill altogether. I am against the system of indiscriminate slaughter, and I believe the time will come when we shall look back on this Bill as not very wisely framed in this respect. I propose the second line shall run thus—

"The local authority may cause to be slaughtered, with the consent of the owner, any animal that has been in the same shed," and so on. The Committee will see that I do not wish to leave it to a local authority to determine whether the healthy cattle of any farmer in this country shall be slaughtered whether the farmer thinks it desirable or not. In support of my proposition, I should like to read to the Committee a letter which a Member of this House has placed in my hands within the last quarter of an hour, bearing upon this question, and upon a remedy which has been very much talked about within the last few days. It is a letter addressed to Baron M. de Rothschild, M.P., from a veterinary surgeon, a gentleman of intelligence, and is in these words—

"Aylesbury, Feb. 15th, 1866.

"Sir,—In reply to yours respecting the cattle plague at your farm at Pribor, I beg to inform you that there are 119 head of stock there, and the first animal was attacked on Thursday, February 8th. On Saturday, two more were affected; on Monday, one; Tuesday, four; Wednesday, three; and this morning (Thursday), two more, making a total of thirteen. On Saturday I had the honour of an interview with Mr. Worms, who very kindly detailed his plan of treatment. I immediately adopted it, and am happy to say with the greatest success, having only lost one, and that the first which was attacked. But I do not consider this a fair case, as the heifer was ill for at least forty-eight hours before we adopted Mr. Worms's treatment. All the others are doing well.

"I am adopting the same treatment on other farms with the same success. In fact, I would now as soon attend cattle labouring under the plague as any other disease, feeling assured that I should not lose a greater percentage.—I have the honour to be, your obedient servant,

"GEO. A. LEPPER.

"P.S.—Altogether I have treated twenty-seven calls, and I find great benefit from repeating the medicine in half doses every twelve hours in severe cases."

On a matter of this nature the public is very likely to have its hopes excited and to have its hopes not realized. The letter which I have read supports my view of this Bill. The hon. Member for Oxfordshire says with great truth that since the Orders were issued with reference to the cattle plague men dressed with a little brief authority, perhaps not always the most intelligent of men, have come into farmyards and told the farmers what cattle shall be slaughtered. That proceeding is a most outrageous violation of the first principles of freedom. Well, this Bill proposes by a permanent enactment to continue this state of things. It proposes that the local authority, if he thinks fit, may cause to be slaughtered any animal that has been in the same shed, the same herd, or flock, with any infected animal in his district, although the particular animal may not have shown the slightest sign of illness. We know very well that a great many cattle do not take the plague, as we find that there are persons who do not take sickness from other persons afflicted by disease. I maintain that it is contrary to common sense and to the natural right of every man that somebody should come into his farmyard and insist upon killing a beast that appears to be in ordinary health. Therefore I propose to alter this clause, so as to prevent the local authority from causing these animals to be slaughtered without the owner's consent. I do not know whether hon. Gentlemen will take that as a reasonable proposition. I have been more astonished at the disposition to slaughter than almost anything else. I think the plan of indiscriminate slaughter which has been recommended is a monstrous mistake, which shall all be ashamed of hereafter. Therefore, to move the alteration I suggested in this clause.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, does it require an Act of Parliament to produce the result sought for by the Amendment of the hon. Member for Birmingham? I should think that any animal might be slaughtered with the consent of its owner. On that point I think the Amendment of the hon. Member quite unnecessary. It also appears to me that such an Amendment would be away with the principle of compensation. If, as a result, probably, the hon. Member does not regret. Now, I hope it will be understood that I uphold the principle of compensation, not merely as a matter of course to those whose property is destroyed by the order of the local authority, but also as a matter of public prudence, and for the general advantage of the country. I feel that unless I believed it to be necessary for the general advantage I should not support the principle of compensation. I admit that those who suffer under the provisions like that we are endeavouring to mitigate ought to receive some assistance extra from that which they may acquire by their own exertions. But I must admit that public subscriptions are the only resource to appeal to under ordinary circumstances, and if all we had to consider were the losses of the farmers, it would be, I think, a legitimate question to consider whether their losses should not be supported by their own exertions and by the sympathy and charity. But a great principle is here involved. I believe that by admitting the principle of compensation you are indirectly preventing the removal of the calamity which we are now endeavouring to eradicate. It is, Sir, on that ground, I support the provisions of the Bill. The hon. Member for Birmingham seems to think this is a question of justice and not one of public policy. Looking at it, as I do, in the latter point of view, I shall support the principle of compensation. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Birmingham is quite unnecessary, inasmuch as it requires no legislation to allow an animal to be slaughtered with the consent of its proprietor.

MR. BRIGHT said, that the right hon. Gentleman had totally misunderstood what he had said. By the clause as it stands the local authorities could kill all the cattle without the consent of the owner.

The cattle might be healthy, though liable to a certain suspicion, and he insisted that the right thing was that the slaughter should only take place with the consent of the owners. Of course, the owners could slaughter the cattle without the consent of the local authorities, but by the Bill the local authorities could slaughter them without the consent of the owners.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, according to the present reasoning of the hon. Member for Birmingham, it was possible to cure diseased cattle, and that the time might come when they would repent of having framed an enactment requiring those animals to be slaughtered. Now, unless the cure on which the hon. Member so much relied proved effective before two months, being the period to which the operation of the Bill was limited, there was very little ground for supposing that they would repent of their legislation. But the hon. Member for Birmingham on a former occasion said he thought the chances of the recovery of diseased animals were so slight he did not think that they ought to grant the owners two-thirds of the value as compensation for their losses; and now the hon. Gentleman had come down to the House with a plan which he said he had discovered for the cure of the cattle plague.

MR. BRIGHT said, the noble Lord entirely misapprehended him. What he had said, in respect to the question of compensation to the owner for the loss of his cattle, had reference to the destruction of diseased beasts. What he was speaking of now had reference to cattle apparently healthy.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he had never heard before of curing cattle that were healthy. He must return the hon. Member his sincere and hearty thanks for the speeches which he had made yesterday and that night against compensation to the owners of cattle ordered by the local authorities to be destroyed; because, in the county of Huntingdon, which he (Lord Robert Montagu) had the honour to represent, there was an uncomfortable number of farmers who unfortunately felt an admiration for the hon. Gentleman, but who were not likely to indulge in such a sentiment any longer.

MR. NEATE said, he was prepared to carry the principle of compensation to a greater extent than probably anybody dared to propose in that House, and, therefore, it was not because he was afraid of compensation that he supported the Amendment, but because he believed that this indiscriminate slaughter unnecessarily added to the losses already sustained. Having intercourse with farmers, he knew that there was no disposition among them to submit to any such legislation, and, therefore, he was of opinion that the slaughter should only take place on the joint action of the owner and inspector, and that the owner should be entitled to compensation.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Amendment would completely neutralize the effect of the clause, which was framed to meet cases where the slaughter of animals which had been in contact with the disease was as essential for the prevention of disease as the slaughter of animals which had been actually attacked by the plague. Where the contiguity had not been so close as to give reasonable ground to apprehend the spread of infection, the slaughter of the animal might not be necessary, and, therefore, a discretion was given to the local authorities, which there was no reason to suppose would be unwisely exercised.

MR. DENT said, he was in favour of slaughtering all diseased animals, but he was against the indiscriminate slaughter of those which had been merely in contact with diseased cattle. They should be kept under proper surveillance, and slaughtered at the first indication of the disease. Cases had come under his notice where contact with the disease had taken place and the animals escaped, and where one animal out of a herd had been attacked with rinderpest while all the rest remained healthy. The Royal Agricultural Society, according to the resolutions which they passed, were against the indiscriminate slaughter of animals, merely because they happened to be in contact with diseased beasts. He was quite prepared to give compensation for animals slaughtered with the consent of the owners, and he did not understand the hon. Member for Birmingham to mean that the owners should not be paid.

MR. BRIGHT said, that they would be in the same position as the owners of other slaughtered cattle.

LORD BURGHLEY said, that he could tell the hon. Member for Birmingham, who seemed so confident of the success of the treatment adopted by Mr. Worms, that that gentleman had under his care thirty cows at Datchet and left them, as he fancied, cured, but they had all since died.

SIR FRANCIS CROSSLEY said, he hoped the House would give due consideration to the proposal of the hon. Member for Birmingham. He would state what had occurred in his own case. He had the rinderpest on his farm. His bailiff sent immediately for the Government inspector, who recommended the slaughter of six bullocks and four cows which had the disease, and also the whole herd of thirty bullocks that had been in contact with those that were attacked. They were sent to the London market with a Government certificate; as a great many animals had been slaughtered under similar circumstances. They were sold at a great sacrifice—at a loss of £700. He decided not to adopt the same course with eleven oxen that remained, but rather to see what could be done to cure them. Three were taken with rinderpest, while two out of the three had been completely cured, and were now well and hearty. By-and-by a fourth was affected, and that also was cured, so that three out of four had been cured. He therefore thought it hard that a bullock should be killed without the consent of its owner, and the hon. Member for Birmingham was quite right in the proposition he had made. If the owner gave his consent let the animal be slaughtered and the owner recompensed. In his own case, instead of being recompensed he had been charged £12 for the inspector coming down and giving his advice.

MR. HUNT said, he was convinced that a great deal of harm had been already done by the remedies which had been put forward for the cattle plague—all sorts of specifics had been sent to the newspapers; and the consequence was that owners of cattle taken with the disease relied on these remedies. He believed the best remedy was the poleaxe. He had at one time some little hopes that vaccination might prove an effectual remedy; but after full inquiry he had satisfied himself that it was not to be relied on. He sincerely trusted Mr. Worms' prescription might prove successful—it consisted of a very strong vegetable stimulant, but the highest authorities in London distrusted it. ["Name!"] He should, perhaps, have said the highest official authorities—he meant the officers of the Privy Council. ["Oh, oh!"] Surely those who advised the Government might be supposed to be the highest authorities. Those authorities distrusted Mr. Worms' remedy; he had not satisfied professional people that his remedy was likely to prove effective. He thought it might be most mischievous if it went forth on the authority of the hon. Member for Birmingham that there was a likelihood this remedy would prove effectual until they knew more about it. He understood that this very day an offer had been made to place a sufficient number of cattle, having undoubtedly cattle plague, under Mr. Worms' care, and if he succeeded with them there would be reason to believe that something had really been found to prevent this dreadful disease spreading. Then they might dispense with slaughter; but, meanwhile, he would implore those who had animals seized not to trust to Mr. Worms' remedy. The animals he had experimented upon might not have had the cattle plague. A great many inspectors in the country did not know cattle plague when they saw it, and he believed hundreds of cattle had been slaughtered by inspectors which never had the plague. If the animals treated by Mr. Worms really had cattle plague, he should like to wait a certain number of days to see that they did not die after all. Until something more certain was known on the subject it would be exceedingly foolish not to pass this clause. He quite agreed with what was stated the other night by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), that the Government should have power of striking out from this Act the provision relative to slaughter in case some remedy should be discovered. He did not despair of a remedy; but after all the researches which had been made in foreign countries, none had yet been discovered. A most interesting report was made on the subject by a professional man in 1701 as to the outbreak of this disease in Italy; it was made under the direction of the Sacred College. He described all the symptoms of the disease exactly; he mentioned the various attempts that were made to cure it, and his essay on the subject was very well worth perusal; but he came to the conclusion our own veterinary surgeons had come to, that nothing but the poleaxe could get rid of the disease.

COLONEL GILPIN said, that the district inspector of Bedfordshire had informed him on Tuesday last that he had thoroughly investigated the matter, and had convinced himself of the efficacy of Mr. Worms' remedy. After trying it on animals undoubtedly attacked by rinderpest he was astonished at the result. The animals presented every symptom of returning health; the eyes of the diseased animals had become quite clear, their coat sleek, and they ate ravenously; but whether there might be re-action, he could not say. His present opinion was very much in favour of Mr. Worms' remedy; and that the disease under which the cattle laboured on which it had been tried was rinderpest there could be no doubt whatever. With regard to the Datchet case, there was great difficulty in proceeding with the cure, because the place where the animals were located was wholly unsuited for trying the remedy—it was nothing better than a pigsty.

MR. CARNEGIE said, he fully agreed with the hon. Member for Northamptonshire that the public were likely to be led away by an accumulation of false remedies. He agreed that there should be some limit to the power of the local authority, and the suggestion of the hon. Member for Birmingham was, he thought, a fit and proper one. Even inspectors, it appeared, might be mistaken as to this disease, and for that reason great caution should be taken in the slaughter of healthy animals. The proposal of the hon. Member for Birmingham had been misunderstood. It was that healthy cattle should not be slaughtered without the consent of their owner, and if slaughtered with his consent, that he should be entitled to compensation. As it appeared to him that the proposal of the hon. Gentleman was reasonable, therefore he should vote for it, if the House divided upon the Question.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, that in the county he represented (Ayrshire) there were 2,500 farmers, who were in great measure dependent upon their dairy cattle, and no district could be more opposed to an indiscriminate slaughter, inasmuch as the compensation offered was a trifle in comparison with the loss of carefully bred stock which could not be replaced for years. Moreover they would lose the current profit on it, and it was out of the dairy stock that they paid their rent. But these very tenant-farmers implored Parliament to pass such a measure as the Committee were now considering, as the only thing that could save their property from total destruction. He had in his pocket a copy of a petition signed by most of those farmers praying that whenever the disease broke out among a herd the whole of that herd should be slaughtered, and compensation be awarded only at the rate of three-fourths of the value of the animals destroyed. It would be perfectly safe to place such a power in the hands of the magistrates of the county, as they would not be at all inclined to destroy the property of the farmers, or throw an undue burden on the county rates. He had seen the most extraordinary proofs of the way in which the disease might be stamped out. In one instance, where a farmer had brought the disease in his clothes from a place twenty miles distant, the whole of his stock was at once slaughtered, and the result was that the infection was destroyed. On the other hand, where, instead of slaughtering, it was attempted to cure the cattle without separation, the disease had spread in a wide radius, and in the result, 100 beasts fell victims to the plague where only ten need have been killed. Therefore, he implored the Government not to surrender the clause.

MR. MARSH also hoped that the clause would be permitted to pass as it stood. The disease had been completely stamped out in Australia by slaughtering inspected herds, whereas all attempts to effect cures had signally failed. Inoculation and vaccination had both been tried, but without success, the only result being that when the latter was tried, the tails of the animals had dropped off.

MR. GREEN said, he had for a long time protested against the slaughter of cattle infected with the disease, believing that some remedy would shortly be discovered that would stay its ravages; but he had now entirely changed his opinion, and was convinced that the only way to stay the cattle plague was—under proper authority, exercised with proper discretion—to destroy not only cattle actually diseased, but all those which had been in contact with them. He would give them some practical illustrations. He knew of a case where the disease having broken out among a number of cows in October, all the diseased cattle were slaughtered and buried, and all the sound beasts were slaughtered and sent to the market. The result was, although the herd were situated in the centre of a town, and another herd was kept in the neighbourhood, the disease was completely stamped out. In another instance, where cures had been attempted, twenty out of twenty-two cattle died of the plague. He recommended that the two remaining should be kept for the purpose of cure, if possible, and the consequence was, that they were the cause of infection to a neighbouring herd the whole of which died. These facts had convinced him that the only effectual remedy for the disease was to slaughter every beast that had been in contact with an infected animal.

MR. OWEN STANLEY hoped the House would not consent, at a time when we had lost so many animals by the disease, to give a power which would lead to the ruthless slaughter of thousands of our remaining cattle. He was certain that the disease was not so fatal as was generally supposed, for he found from Returns he held in his hand that in the only two counties in North Wales which had been attacked, more than 50 per cent of the infected animals had recovered; and he understood that the case was the same in Scotland. If they had proper statistics of the disease, he thought it would be found that it was the short-horns that the disease attacked so fatally; whereas the number of deaths of the hardier breeds which were most common in Wales and Scotland, were fewer in proportion. It might be all very well to place the power in question in the hands of the local authorities of the central parts of England, but that was a very different thing to placing it in the hands of the local authorities in the remote parts of the kingdom, who were sure to act rashly in the matter. He should certainly vote for the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Birmingham.

MR. TOLLEMACHE said, the county he represented (Cheshire) had suffered from the disease more than any other in the kingdom. After what had been said by the hon. Member for Birmingham and by the hon. Gentleman below him (Colonel Gilpin) on the subject of Mr. Worms' system of treatment, he felt bound to state what had been his experience of that treatment in Cheshire, where the frightful ravages of the disease had induced them to try every remedy that had been proposed. Immediately he saw Lord Leigh's letter in the newspapers, he sent directions to his bailiff to try Mr. Worms' system on his cattle; and he afterwards found that his brother had also tried it. So far as their experience had gone he was sorry to say it had entirely failed. It had produced no good result whatever, the mortality being as great where it had been tried as it was before. He sincerely hoped that Her Majesty's Government would maintain the clause in question in the shape in which it then stood, as nothing would please the farmers of Cheshire more than the slaughter of infected animals. He thought Parliament might, with propriety, leave a discretionary power of this kind in the hands of the local authorities.

Mr. Green

MR. BRIGHT said, he wished to one observation on the question of the Member for Northamptonshire, as to where the local authorities? The authorities were bodies who would be much guided by their inspectors, while the hon. Member had himself stated many instances did not know the result when they saw it; and he was unwilling to leave a vast amount of property in the hands of such men, to be destroyed at will. The matter was of great importance and as there had been a strong expression of opinion among the Members of the House in favour of his Amendment, he felt it his duty to divide the Committee on the question.

Question put, "That the words part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes Noes 50: Majority 338.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Clause 17 (Value of slaughtered Animals).

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he proposed to add a proviso, excluding from compensation persons who had violated the Order Clause, as amended, agreed to. [cl.]

Clause 18 (Cattle slaughtered by Order of Inspectors previous to Act).

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that clause had reference to retrospective compensation, to which many objections had been raised. He would propose that the clause should be negatived, in order that the House might have an opportunity of fully considering the subject on a future occasion.

Clause struck out.

Clauses 19 and 20 (Isolation of infected places).

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Hunt) had given notice of his intention to move the postponement of these clauses. As the Government wished to facilitate discussion on the subject, he would not object to the course proposed to be taken by the hon. Gentleman.

Clauses deferred.

Clause 21 (Regulations as to Movement of Cattle).

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the hon. Gentleman had pointed out the day that the words "except by Order" might imply that the removal of cattle by canal or river was allowed. He would, therefore, propose to substitute the words "except by sea."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. HUNT said, that the Committee was well aware that the point involved in the Amendment of which he had given notice, was whether the restrictions upon the movement of cattle and the exceptions too should be statutory, or should be left to the discretion of the local authorities. His proposal upon the Notice paper would be to leave out all the words after "land," which, however, had been converted into "sea." He did not now propose to leave out all the words, but in line 35, "No cattle shall be moved, except by railway," &c., he proposed to leave out "except by railway;" and he further proposed to add two paragraphs, separately. The first was, "No cattle shall be moved on any railway before the 25th day of March, 1866." That would be absolute, and there would be no exception whatsoever. The second paragraph was—

"No cattle shall be moved along any highway, or any canal, navigation, or river, except as this Act expressly authorizes."

If he succeeded in carrying that, he should endeavour to insert the exceptions proposed in his own Bill. It would be open to hon. Members to propose other exceptions, and to embody the third Resolution passed at the meeting in the tea-room. The principle he contended for was that all restrictions and exceptions should be expressly named in the statute, and should not be left permissive to local authorities. He now moved the omission of the word "except" by railway.

Amendment proposed, in line 35, to leave out the word "except."—(Mr. Hunt.)

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the hon. Gentleman's proposition that no cattle be removed along any railway involved the stoppage of every market for the sale of fat cattle throughout the United Kingdom. Now, it was desirable to keep certain markets open in large towns for the sale of fat cattle for immediate slaughter, subject to the licence of the local authorities, with the proviso that in towns with less than 40,000 inhabitants the licence of the magistrates of the county in which the borough was situate should be required as well as that of the local authority of the borough. If they shut up all those markets they would necessarily at once change the whole supply of live meat for the consumption of the inhabitants of every part of the kingdom into a dead meat supply. It was a question which the House, he thought, was fully competent to decide; but he hoped they would very seriously consider the consequences of the step they were now asked to take. He believed that it would much interfere with the supply of food to the people and raise the price of it very materially. Let him recall to the recollection of the House observations which, at the time they were made, produced a considerable impression on the House—which were addressed to him by Mr. Thompson, the chairman of the West Riding Association. Mr. Thompson pointed out forcibly—and he had had various communications from other parts of the country confirming what he said—that the sending of the butcher to the farm in every case to slaughter animals would not only have the effect in some cases of making the meat so slaughtered unfit for human food and lead to diseased meat being brought to market, but would also have a tendency to spread the disease, as the butcher going from farm to farm might carry the infection with him. He reminded them of these observations in order that the House before coming to a decision might consider their bearing on the present proposal. Take the cattle from Ireland, which were landed at Liverpool and elsewhere—they would require to be immediately slaughtered, instead of being at once put into railway trucks, and forwarded to Manchester and other large towns in Lancashire and the manufacturing districts. He could not help thinking that the House would be taking a rash step in adopting a proposal which would have the effect of stopping every market in the kingdom. He had been told since the Bill was brought in, that at the present time store cattle were being moved on various lines of railway in England. He should have thought the restrictions placed by the local authorities on the movement of cattle would have prevented that. If that was the case it ought to be stopped. He did not wish that cattle should be moved by railway further than was necessary to supply great markets for fat beasts, and he would restrict railway companies from conveying cattle except to some place where a market was licensed for fat cattle. That would prevent the possibility of any movement of store cattle by railway.

MR. HENLEY said, he desired to give the reason why he preferred the direct plan of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) to the proposals of the Government. Either course would involve great inconvenience. The Government Bill said no licence should be given to carry upon railways if the cattle would have to pass through an infected place. How was it possible for any person granting a licence to know whether any portion of a 100 miles of railway passed through an infected place? He was driven to accept the plainer and simpler proposal of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, and to stop all traffic for a certain time, which would give opportunity for the disinfection of trucks; and the time occupied in passing the Bill would be sufficient notice to those interested, and would enable them to make such provision for the supply of the food markets as the circumstances of the case might require. Seeing that the Government, who drew the Bill with a full knowledge of all the inconvenience that must be occasioned by such a regulation, felt it necessary to introduce a provision to the effect that cattle should not pass through any infected district, he felt that the expediency of the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire could no longer be questioned. For the object in view it was much more efficacious, and upon a balance of inconveniences—these things, after all, being very much questions of degree—he believed his hon. Friend's proposal would prove least vexatious. He therefore should not shrink from giving it his hearty support.

MR. AYRTON wished to throw out for the consideration of the Government a middle course. The proposition of the hon. Member opposite might be adopted if a dispensing power were admitted, under which the Queen in Council would be at liberty to issue orders applicable to any special case that might present itself. ["No, no!"] It was one thing to give authority to the Queen in Council, and another to rely upon the discretion of the local authorities.

MR. HEADLAM said, he could not disguise from himself the strong feeling of dissatisfaction with which the proposed enactment would be received in the large towns of the north of England, one of which he had the honour to represent. According to a letter which he had received from the Mayor of Newcastle, 2,000 head of cattle were sold in that town on last Tuesday, had since been slaughtered, and were now in course of consumption in that district. In the ordinary course of things, an equal number would probably be brought into the market every succeeding week. But once this clause was enacted, the 2,000 head of cattle which otherwise would find their way into the market would be excluded from it. ["No, no!"] As live cattle they certainly would. It was said that a dead meat supply would be substituted; but he had no hesitation in declaring that this substitution could not be made without the greatest possible inconvenience. One of the great trades of the country would be revolutionized, and it was presumption to suppose that people could be reconciled to the change all at once by Act of Parliament. Moreover, they were about to take this step without laying before the people of the country any case establishing the necessity. The case as shown amounted merely to a balance of chances; for the advocates of these extreme measures could not deny that even under their scheme infection might freely continue. Meat, they said, was to be killed on the farms and brought into the towns. But the animals could not be killed without butchers and inspectors going about from farm to farm and from slaughterhouses to places where there were healthy cattle; and these persons might carry infection with them. At Newcastle the disease had prevailed for some time. It extended over a portion of the town, but not to the remainder; and latterly it had declined so much that, if not absolutely extinct, it was as nearly so as possible. From all he had ever heard, he believed no apprehensions were entertained in Newcastle of the entry of cattle into the town to be slaughtered; but, of course, he did not say the same with regard to egress. To stop the entry of cattle reported by the inspector to be healthy, and coming expressly to be slaughtered, did appear to be carrying matters to an extreme that was not at all warranted by circumstances.

MR. LOWE: I will not detain the House above a minute. I think my right hon. Friend (Mr. Headlam) was rather unfortunate in the instance he selected, because I cannot conceive the great town of Newcastle dying of famine with the sea and the whole Continent open to it. But my right hon. Friend has not correctly stated the case before the House. The question is not as to the degree of laxity or stringency to be applied to the movement of cattle, but whether such regulations as Parliament thinks fit to be made shall be made by Parliament itself in the clauses of an Act embodying both the rule and the exception, so that they who run may read, and so that every man throughout the country may know by what rule to regulate his conduct; or whether you will send this question back again to be legislated upon by I know not how many local authorities. These local authorities have just got through the labour, imposed upon them by the Order passed in December, of framing codes of rules. For this purpose they had to construe about twenty Orders in Council; they had the utmost difficulty in passing these rules; and now that they have been passed, in many parts of the country they are utterly discordant and at variance with each other. The question is whether you will send back the matter to these local authorities, embarrassed by a new and complicated Act of Parliament, in order that they may reconstruct, with reference to this new Act of Parliament, their own former rules, their own complicated and inconsistent codes. All that will take two or three weeks to accomplish, and when accomplished the state of things so brought about will remain in existence two or three weeks more. Will the House act upon such principles, or will it lay down one single unvarying rule, to be acted upon by the whole country? When the House has once laid down a general rule it will, of course, be competent to any gentleman to give effect to whatever opinions he may entertain as to the relaxation of the rule, by proposing such exceptions as he may think fit to introduce. But the question, in this case, where the whole interests of the nation are concerned, is, whether one uniform rule should be enacted by Parliament, or whether Parliament shall shrink from the duty which its high position imposes upon it, and delegate that which it ought to do itself to a number of local bodies, well knowing that they cannot possibly discharge that duty. If this suggestion of one simple rule had been laid down and carried out by the Government at the time when it was recommended by the whole Cattle Plague Commission, at the end of October, I believe we should not be sitting here to deliberate upon this question. The option of doing right in this matter returns to us again, and returns to us for the last time—we do not avail ourselves of the opportunity now it is gone from us, and we know not what may be the consequence. We all know that when the grass grows again, cattle must be put out to feed on that grass; and all the rules that we may enact here, like the web of a spider, will be broken through by the necessities of mankind. It is just this precious time that we have got, and we cannot be too strict or too careful in the use we make of it. We may be able to improve the opportunity; but it can never be recovered if lost. If we do not get the disease under by the middle of April prepare yourself for a calamity beyond all calculation. You have seen the thing in its infancy; wait, and you will see the averages, which have been thousands, grow to tens of thousands, for there is no reason why the same terrible law of increase which has prevailed hitherto should not prevail henceforth. It is the last opportunity we have of stopping the disorder. I hope the House will not be led aside by any local interests or feelings of selfish advantage which particular counties may fancy—and fancy most falsely—that they have in this matter, contrary to that of the nation at large.

CAPTAIN JERVIS undertook to say, from a conversation held by him with the traffic manager of one of the principal railways, that there would be no such difficulty as suggested in conveying to the metropolis a supply of dead in place of live meat for the London market. In forty-eight hours from the time the order was given the whole of the appliances of that railway, which brought more meat to London than any other of the metropolitan railways, would be so regulated as to meet the requirements of the novel traffic; and that, not merely between the points from which the supply was drawn and the metropolis, but from town to town and from market to market.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, that though nothing could be easier than to convey by railway any number of cattle to the various centres of population, they must be first brought to the railway, and in very many parts of the country there were no facilities whatever for killing cattle and then conveying them to the railway. During the course of this debate the House had been treated liberally by hon. Gentlemen with their own personal experiences. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Headlam) had been twitted for having given an imperfect instance when he stated that Newcastle would be deprived of its 2,000 head of cattle with the sea open. But he would give an instance within his own personal knowledge. His own borough (Merthyr Tydvil) was the centre of a district of 200,000 people entirely removed from the sea. Within the limits of that district for ten miles around the actual quantity of meat produced would not be sufficient for a tenth, or even a twentieth part of the population. How, then, was it possible that all of a sudden cattle could be killed and brought to such a district? If he was told that their meat might be got from Gloucester, Worcester, and other such towns, he would ask how were these first to be conveyed there, all access by railway being prohibited by the Bill, and by highways by the local authority? They made it necessary for the butcher to go to every farmhouse and kill the animals under what conditions he could, and the meat was to be conveyed to some railway station. How did the hon. Member for Northamptonshire meet the difficulty? Put up slaughterhouses in every parish he would say. But would not that keep up a constant stream of infection? In fact, the exceptions which were introduced in the Bill of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire himself were so considerable, and those which he had authorized were so great that the general rule which he proposed to lay down was no general rule at all. The hon. Gentleman and those who supported him would expose many districts of the country to great inconvenience, without giving the smallest degree of security that they would extinguish the disease.

SIR JOHN SIMEON, who was met with loud and continued cries for a Division, was understood to oppose the Amendment.

LORD ELCHO said, he could wish that this Amendment had been moved by some hon. Gentleman sitting behind the Treasury Bench, because he believed the point involved to be the touchstone of the Government Bill, and the keystone of its success. What he feared was this—that the Motion having been made by an hon. Gentleman opposite, it might assume in the division somewhat of a party character. ["No, no!"] He trusted that would not be so, because he and other hon. Gentlemen believed that we were in the midst of a great national calamity. Taking simply a national view of this great question, he firmly believed that if this Amendment was not carried the time they had spent upon the measure was so much time thrown away, and that the Bill which they would send forth as the result of their labours to-night would not be worth the paper upon which it was printed. Within the last few days he had attended two meetings, one held in St. James' Hall, the most influential he had ever seen—half the House of Lords and half the House of Commons, without distinction of party, were present on the occasion. A rule, and a wise one, was laid down that the Members of either House should not take part in the discussion, but should hear what the representatives of the agricultural interest from all parts of the country had to say. Well, without the slightest opposition, except from two butchers who came from Scotland, a Motion similar to that of the hon. Gentleman was carried unanimously. He attended on Monday last a conference, or rather meeting, of certain persons, Members of both Houses, who were specially selected as representing parties on both sides. A Whig nobleman, Lord Spencer, the Chairman of the Commission on which his right hon. Friend the Member for Calne sat, was in the chair, and the Earl of Lichfield, another Whig nobleman, lord-lieutenant of Staffordshire, and who lived in the midst of a dense population who would suffer much if the supply of meat was stopped, was the person who suggested the course which had now been followed by the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, and not a single dissentient hand was held up. Nor were the interests of the great towns neglected, because there were gentlemen present who represented the great railway interest throughout England and Scotland, and they assured the meeting that they could carry any quantity of meat as fish was now carried, and much more easily, as fish was more delicate. They also said that it would come to market in a much better condition than it did now; and they added that the difficulty which they felt was in dealing with a state of things in which one local authority did one thing and another another; whereas, if there was one rule they would then know what to do. He believed that this was not a party but a great national question, and unless they accepted the Amendment of the hon. Member a heavy responsibility would lie on the House.

MR. OWEN STANLEY said, that by this clause it was provided that all cattle coming into this kingdom by sea should be slaughtered at the ports at which it arrived. It seemed to be generally supposed that all the Irish cattle came to this country through Liverpool and Bristol; but while some 54,000 head arrived in Liverpool to be taken to London and other places, nearly 40,000 came to Holyhead. At Liverpool there might be means for slaughtering the cattle thus imported, but there were no such facilities at the small ports. He hoped that provision would be made for enabling cattle coming from Ireland to be brought to the principal markets in London and the great towns without danger.

COLONEL PACKE said, that he was one of the Members who attended the meeting alluded to by the noble Lord (Lord Elcho), and it was quite true that he then stated that the railway companies would cheerfully sacrifice their trade in the transmission of live stock to London, and undertake to bring up any quantity of dead meat, and distribute it all over London wherever required. The fact was, that there were clauses in the Bill which prevented them from carrying live stock, as it was impossible to travel from Aberdeen, Holyhead, or Bristol to London without passing through infected districts without being liable to be stopped. What were they to do with all these trucks of cattle if they were stopped? The railway with which he was connected would not attempt to do it.

MR. WEGUELIN said, that although the people of Wolverhampton were partly supplied from the agricultural districts surrounding them, they drew their chief supplies from foreign countries through the ports of Liverpool and Hull; and the members of the Town Council had asserted that if the supply of food to that large mining population were interfered with they would not answer for the peace of the borough. He desired also to assert that no case was known of the disease having followed a line of railway. In his own county of Berkshire instances had occurred of the disease having followed the river most closely, and apparently quite neglected the line of railway.

MR. CUMMING-BRUCE said, he had received particulars that morning of the disease having been communicated to cattle in Inverness by the straw which had been taken from a railway truck.

SIR GEORGE GREY inquired whether dead meat was not packed in straw to be carried.

Question put, "That the word 'except' stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 181; Noes 264: Majority 83.

MR. HUNT then moved that in the 35th line, after the word "moved," to insert, "on any railway before the 25th day of March."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. HUNT then moved that after the words now added the following words be inserted:—

"No cattle shall be carried along any highway or any canal navigation, or river, except in those cases expressly named in the Bill."

If this were assented to he should then propose to make those exceptions which he had embodied in his Cattle Plague Bill. It would be open to any number of additional exceptions, in favour of any district, in accordance with the third Resolution. The principle of the paragraph, however, was this, that the movement of cattle on highways should be restricted, and that all exceptions to that movement should be named in the Bill.

MR. BOUVERIE said, that he and many other Members had only considered the Government Bill, and they were now asked to adopt the clauses proposed by the hon. Member for Northamptonshire in his Bill. He thought that time should be given for the consideration of those clauses, and he therefore moved that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

MR. HUNT said, that if the Committee agreed to the paragraphs it would not commit itself in regard to any exceptions.

SIR GEORGE GREY concurred in the Motion for reporting Progress. It was impossible to assent to the principle that the Committee were to adopt exceptions, without knowing what the exceptions were to be.

MR. DISRAELI said, it was competent to decide whether there should be exceptions or not, and then what was to be the nature of them. He thought the proposal to report Progress a reasonable one at that advanced hour (a quarter past twelve.)

MR. HUNT asked whether the right hon. Baronet proposed to go on with the

VOL. CLXXXI. [THIRD SERIES.]

Bill to-morrow; and if not finished then, whether the House would sit on Saturday?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that by the rules of the House the first Order to-morrow must be Supply.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that no notice of Motion had been given upon the Order for Supply to-morrow; therefore, there was nothing to prevent its being the first business of the day.

MR. HUNT feared that he should have no other opportunity of giving notice of the exceptions he intended to propose. He would, therefore, state that he intended to move the exceptions enumerated in his Cattle Plague Bill with the addition that male animals might be moved for breeding purposes. With regard to the practical suggestion made by the Member for Berkshire, there might also be a special exception as to moving young calves, not on foot, but in carts.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

SAVINGS BANKS AND POST OFFICE

SAVINGS BANKS BILL—[BILL 5.]

Moved, "That the Bill be now read the second time."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. HUBBARD asked for some further explanations of this measure. The title of the last Bill would exactly suit it, for it was really a Bill for the reduction of the National Debt. It permitted the Chancellor of the Exchequer to cancel £5,000,000 Three per Cent Stock, and to substitute for it an equal value in terminable annuities. The interest of the £5,000,000 was £150,000 per annum, while the annual payment required on terminable annuities would be £330,000. The difference would be that in the first year of the operation of the Act the country would have to pay £180,000 more than the previous year on the same security. The House had been engaged the whole evening in discussing the terrible calamity of the cattle plague, and it was undesirable at the present moment to go out of their way and make a forced march with the view of reducing the National Debt. He objected to make this reduction by means of terminable annuities. The fact was, that these securities were not negotiable at all, and were only held in the Government offices. They required a constant re-investment year by year. He had, however, one serious objection to the measure. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had always displayed an extreme willingness to reduce those taxes which were most open to complaint; but by passing this measure his right hon. Friend, and the House itself, would be precluded from dealing fairly with those subjects in the Budget. His right hon. Friend might be called upon to reduce the fire insurance duty or other taxes which weighed prejudicially on the energies of the people; but if this Bill were passed, £180,000 a year would be added to the taxation of the country, and to that extent they would be precluded from an indulgent consideration of the imposts of the country. It appeared to him to be a strange time to select when 7 or 8 per cent was currently given for money, for discharging debts upon which they were only paying 3½ per cent.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER certainly could not at all complain that his hon. Friend, with the opinions he entertained, should object to the principle of the Bill; but, in considering the operation of the Bill, his hon. Friend entirely omitted to observe the effect of the former Bill. The practical effect was that one measure balanced the other. The object of the first Bill was to produce a true statement of the National Debt, by practically abolishing two funds precisely in the nature of the old Sinking Fund, which Parliament had long ago condemned. Its financial effect was to relieve the country from a very considerable annual charge, which was, of course, a set off, so far as it went, against the annual charge created by the present Bill. The Bill gave power to cancel £5,000,000 of perpetual annuities, and convert them into terminable annuities expiring in 1885; thereby creating, as his hon. Friend had said, a considerable additional annual charge in the interest of the National Debt until that year arrived. He held that it was a wise and provident proceeding in the actual circumstances of this country to use every fair and safe opportunity for the conversion of perpetual into terminable annuities, with a view to the reduction of the annual charge of the debt after a certain term of years. His hon. Friend seemed to think that the additional annual charge for the National Debt in the present instance was one of some magnitude, but it was not so; the whole amount of the increased charge occasioned by the two Bills would be £45,000. His hon. Friend said that these annuities were held only by the Government offices; but these were not the only stocks to fall back upon. There was a sum of £24,000,000 due from the Government to the savings banks, which they could convert into stock whenever it was deemed expedient to do so; therefore, they were not in the least under the necessity of considering whether the present stocks would be a good security for the savings banks. So much for the old savings banks; with respect to the new Post Office savings banks, they were receiving large deposits at 2½ per cent. The current never changed its direction for one moment, it was always setting inwards. Therefore, they were now under no necessity of considering any event so improbable as a total change of circumstances with respect to these institutions. Care would be taken to keep a considerable amount of convertible stock always in hand. If he were wrong in the opinion he held as to the expediency and wisdom of converting perpetual and terminable annuities, let the House interfere; but, if he were right, let them give effect to the measure proposed.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS concurred with the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the advisability of converting perpetual into terminable annuities; but hoped that the settlement of 1863 would not be disturbed, and that the right hon. Gentleman would insert some words in the Bill stating that there was no intention of interfering with the settlement without the sanction of Parliament.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was not proposed to interfere with the settlement to which the hon. Gentleman alluded.

MR. HENLEY said, he quite believed in the soundness of the principle advocated by the right hon. Gentleman, but suggested the desirability of striking out in Committee the 4th clause, which gave unlimited power to the Treasury to carry out the same system in future. He thought that Parliament ought from time to time to be informed of the manner in which Government was acting.

MR. AYRTON wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the fact that at the end of the twenty years the nation would still be indebted to the savings banks to its present amount, but he feared there would be no capital to represent the debt. He should like to know when the terminable annuities came to an end, and there was a deficit of millions on the part of the savings banks, what security was to be provided for them.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the calculation had been made and the value had been fixed.

MR. AYRTON feared the amount was to be made a charge on the Consolidated Fund. He wished, however, to point out the fact that the reduction of the National Debt could not be effected by means of annuities terminable at the end of twenty years, for people would not be induced to buy them unless they ran for forty or fifty years.

JAMAICA GOVERNMENT BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, in accordance with what I understand to be the opinion of the House, I will now proceed simply to lay the Bill for the Government of Jamaica upon the table of the House. I will make no statement with reference to the general subject, but merely state what are the contents of the Bill. The Bill will then be in the hands of Members, who will have the opportunity of perusing and considering it before they come to debate upon it. Now, Sir, it is in the knowledge of all those who have looked into the papers with reference to the late events in Jamaica, that the Jamaica Legislature in the first place passed an Act for the revision and re-construction of their own constitution; but upon receiving from me an intimation that I should be ready to submit the question to the judgment of the House, if it were desired that I should do so, the Governor of Jamaica communicated that to the Jamaica Legislature, and that Assembly readily assented to the substance of a new form of constitution being left entirely in the hands of the Crown; and it is stated by the Governor in his despatch that the understanding of the Legislature was, that if passed by the Crown, it should be carried out in its full and plain meaning. Now, the course we took then was this:—It is our opinion that it would not be right to call upon the House, in the present state of its knowledge with respect to the colony of Jamaica, and while the inquiry that has been ordered into the recent events that have occurred there is pending, finally to determine what the form of Government for the colony should be. We think that the wiser course would be to ask the House to ratify the measure which the Legislature of Jamaica itself has arrived at—that we should undertake the responsibility and duty of providing in the manner asked from us by the Legislature of Jamaica for the Government of the colony for a period. And the intention is that the House should agree, in the first instance, to the proposal of the Crown to substitute a Government similar to that now existing in Trinidad for that which has hitherto existed in Jamaica. We propose, then, to do that, with the permission and by the sanction of the House, by Order in Council. We propose the Bill should be in force for a limited period, and that that limited period should be for three years. That will enable the House to judge of the information which they will receive as the result of the Commission of Inquiry. It will enable them to judge whether the measures taken by Order in Council, as is proposed, for the purpose of re-constituting the Government of Jamaica, are wise and salutary measures, and likely to be productive of benefit to the colony. The House will then be called upon either to make the Bill perpetual, or to furnish some other form of Government, as in the judgment of the House may be deemed expedient and necessary. The provisions of the Bill then are simply to ratify for a limited period the measures at which the Jamaica Legislature has itself arrived. If I had time to make a statement of the grounds on which the Bill is proposed it would be evident to the House that I do not propose to make any change upon temporary grounds, but on grounds permanent in their character. I do not believe that it will be desirable at any period so proximate as to be within the scope of our present horizon, either to return to the old constitution of Jamaica, or to adopt a plan of a mixed representation and nominated Council like that which was enacted in the first Bill. As I said we propose the measure on permanent grounds, but we do not think it is fair or desirable to call upon the House finally to part with its control over the subject, with the information before us and the present investigation going on. The right hon. Gentleman then moved for leave to bring in a Bill to make provision for the Government of Jamaica.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE put it to the Government whether it would not be better to wait till some information was received from the colony before introducing a Bill which would entirely change the whole constitution of Jamaica, with the possibility of having after a very limited period, perhaps six months, to re-construct that constitution over again?

MR. WALPOLE said, it was quite clear that the Government of Jamaica had abdicated its functions and placed the government in the hands of the Crown, and it was consequently necessary to provide some other mode of government. Did the right hon. Gentlemen intend to specify in the Bill the kind of government that, by Order in Council, would be established in the colony. [Mr. CARDWELL: No!] Then he (Mr. Walpole) thought that the right hon. Gentleman would make some little mistake there. Parliament should consider the kind of Government they intended, by Order in Council, to establish in the colonies.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON declined at that late hour to enter into a discussion of the Bill, but would raise no objection to its introduction.

After a few words from Mr. REMINGTON MILLS,

MR. STEPHEN CAVE expressed his entire concurrence in the Motion just made by the Secretary of State. Although a change in the constitution of Jamaica had been forced upon them by recent events, yet some such measure as that now proposed by Her Majesty's Government had for many years past been deemed necessary by all who were conversant with the condition of the colony. As far back as 1839 the late Mr. Charles Buller expressed that opinion in the then House of Commons. As it was intended to assimilate the constitution of Jamaica to that of Trinidad, he could only hope that the result of the change would be to render Jamaica as prosperous as that sister colony.

CATTLE PLAGUE.—REPORT DR. SIMONDS.

EARL GRANVILLE read the following letter which he had received from the Inspector specially sent down on the subject of the Government to make inquiries into the mode of treatment pursued at Baron Rothschild's farm:—

"Veterinary Department of the Privy Office (Inspector's Office), Princess Street, London, S.W., Feb. 15, 1866.

"Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that, acting on your instructions, I yesterday went to Mentmore, the seat of Baron Rothschild, for the purpose of investigating the treatment of the cattle affected with cattle plague, as adopted by Mr. Worms. I found on the premises 118 head of stock divided into several lots, but the yards sufficiently contiguous to each other to afford great facilities for the spread of the contagious disease. Until Friday last, February 10th, the whole of the animals had continued in good health; but on this day a heifer, one of the twenty-four, gave indications of illness. The veterinary surgeon, Mr. Lepper, of Aylesbury, was called to the case, recognized some of the earlier symptoms of cattle plague, and the animal was placed as soon as possible under the care of Mr. Worms. Notwithstanding the attention which it received it died on the day of the attack. On Saturday, the 10th, two other heifers were also said to be affected with the plague, and consequently were placed aside by themselves. On Monday one, and on Tuesday four, and Wednesday (the day of my visit) more of the herd were removed as being the subjects of the plague. The ten animals also placed under the care of Mr. Worms, &c.

since superintended all the details of their treatment and general management. The early cases were reported to me as having been cured, and the others as going on most satisfactorily. It required but little knowledge of the diseases of cattle to at once see that none of the ten animals had been, or were, the subjects of any serious disease; and, after giving to each of them a careful examination, I failed to detect the slightest symptom of cattle plague in any one of them. Whether plague will, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, be developed in the herd remains to be seen, but should the opinion of Mr. Lepper be correct as to the cause of the death of the first animal, only a few days can pass without determining the point.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant, “JAMES B. SIMONDS.

“The Clerk of the Council.”

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH asked the noble Earl whether, in connection with this subject, he would consent to lay on the table a copy of a letter which had been published in the newspapers, he apprehended by the authority of the Government, about three weeks after the plague first broke out. It was from the Consul at Warsaw, stating that a disease had broken out in Poland in 1857, such as was represented now to exist in this country, but in no case did it extend itself to any part of the country where the water was impregnated with iron, and that cures had been effected in other parts of the country by giving animals water in iron vessels. He was astonished to find that a letter so remarkable had failed to attract public attention, and that so simple a method of treatment had not been resorted to, at all events, experimentally.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the noble Earl's suggestion should not be forgotten, but did not anticipate any very favourable results from the course of treatment indicated in the letter.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he had met the other day a gentleman who had lost a good many cattle by the plague, and on mentioning the Consul's letter to him he said it was a remarkable fact that an animal which had been in the habit of drinking from an iron vessel was the only animal he had saved.

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION (IRELAND).—NOTICE.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, I have to ask your Lordships to sit to-morrow in consequence of the condition of affairs in Ireland. The Lord-Lieutenant, on the advice of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, the Chief Secretary, and other persons, has expressed the opinion that it is absolutely necessary, considering the present state of the country, to ask for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. Her Majesty's Government have therefore resolved to make the proposal to suspend the Act, and the Secretary of State for the Home Department will do so to-morrow in the other House of Parliament. When a similar Motion was last made, the Bill was introduced at twelve o'clock on a Saturday, and passed through all its stages in the course of that day. Your Lordships will doubtless agree that, if the necessity for such a course exists, no time should be lost; and I must, therefore, ask your Lordships to put yourselves to the inconvenience of meeting to-morrow at four o'clock, when the matter shall be laid before you.

THE EARL OF DERBY: The proposal made by the noble Earl indicates a very serious state of affairs. Of course, it will be for Her Majesty's Government to justify to this and the other House of Parliament the course proposed; and if the other House should be so satisfied of the gravity of the occasion—and no doubt they will have sufficient evidence laid before them—as shall induce them to consent to take so strong a step as suspending all the Standing Orders for the purpose of passing the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, I am quite sure your Lordships will be unanimously of opinion that in such a state of affairs it would be neither expedient, desirable, nor consistent with your duty to interpose a moment's delay. Therefore, my Lords, as far as I am concerned, if the House of Commons should think fit to suspend all their Standing Orders for the purpose of passing a Bill, which I presume it is the intention of the Government to lay before them during the morning sitting of to-morrow, I should offer no opposition to it when it is laid before your Lordships in company with a statement from Her Majesty's Government, and backed up by the authority of the House of Commons. And when I say I should be prepared to assent to the passing of the Bill under the circumstances, I trust we shall have at the earliest possible opportunity such a statement from Her Majesty's Government as will justify us in having passed so strong a measure as that proposed.

LIFEBOATS ON THE COAST.

OBSERVATIONS. MOTION FOR A RETURN.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY, in drawing the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the Deficiency of Lifeboats and other Means of saving human Life on the Coasts of Great Britain and Ireland, desired to state that any observations he might make had no reference to any particular Member of Her Majesty's Government, but to the Government as a whole; and he would express the opinion that it felt less deeply than it should the necessity of providing means for the preservation of human life upon the coast. The present stormy season had produced ample evidence that the means provided were insufficient; and he would particularly direct the attention of the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty (the Duke of Somerset), as well as the President of the Board of Trade, to that statement. It was remarkable that this great maritime country, having the largest Royal and mercantile fleet in the world, should, until a few years ago, have been so deficient in this respect. In 1850 only twelve lifeboats were employed upon the coast of Great Britain. Since then, they had largely increased in number; but in all cases they had been built, kept in repair, and navigated at the expense of private persons. The subscriptions collected from charitable persons by the Royal National Society for this purpose amounted to about £30,000 a year. Of the noble institutions that had been established in this country, none was more noble, or more creditable to the honour of England than this. The Institution, notwithstanding it was supported by voluntary contributions, and received no aid from the State, had done wonders. During the past twenty years, or some similar period, it had been instrumental in saving 15,000 lives. The leading members of the Institution had told him that they would still rather continue to be left to themselves—that they wanted no subsidy, or other assistance from Government, and they believed that a subsidy would diminish their contributions. He (the Earl of Malmesbury) was rather astonished at that statement, because he had always found that when subscriptions were asked for, people were ready to give if certain others would contribute also. But the great question was, whether, with all its zeal and activity, the Institution was capable of fulfilling the duties which it took upon itself. The members believed that it was, and they had such confidence in it that, quoting the returns of the Coastguard officers, Lloyd's agents, and others, they declared that no part of the coast was unprovided with a lifeboat where one was needed, or there were a sufficient number of resident fishermen and boatmen to justify one being provided. Mr. Lewis, the Secretary of the Institution, had called upon him and left him a map of Great Britain, which showed where lifeboats were stationed, and also indicated where wrecks had taken place. From this chart he found that on a most dangerous part of the coast of Scotland no lifeboat was stationed, and on the west coast of Ireland only one lifeboat was stationed from the north to the south. This conclusively showed, in his opinion, that the Society had not sufficient machinery at its command completely to do the work it proposed to itself. On Sunday last the storm which swept the English Channel was one of the heaviest ever known, the wind blew at a strength of 40lb. upon the square inch, while the maximum pressure in Great Britain seldom exceeded 30lbs. or 35lbs. The coast between Poole and the Solent was much exposed, and only one lifeboat was stationed there. Near where he resided, at Christchurch, there were open roadsteads, exposed to southerly and westerly winds. On Sunday, when the storm was at its height, a brig was in danger, some 200 or 300 yards from shore. It was thought no common boat could live in the sea that raged there; but a gallant act was performed by some men in a fishing-boat, who put off and saved four of the crew of seven. The rest died from exhaustion; but every fisherman on the coast was ready to declare, that if succour had reached those men earlier, they would all have been saved. Why, then, was there no lifeboat at Christchurch? He found on referring to the chart that Christchurch had been transplanted to the mouth of the Southampton Water, and if the position assigned to it had only been correct, of course no lifeboat would have been required. He also learnt that the officer of the Coastguard had been asked if there was a sufficient number of boatmen in the neighbourhood to manage a lifeboat, and that his answer was that there were sufficient boatmen, but none who could be depended upon in case of emergency, unless they were remunerated for their services. He also stated that he did not know how an honorary committee could be formed among the neighbouring gentry for the purpose of managing the lifeboat station. He certainly could assert that, as far as he himself was concerned, he had never been asked to join such a committee, and he would assure their Lordships' that, if he had been, he should with pleasure have done what he could to make himself useful. He would, if required, hand in the paper from which he had obtained this information, although he would not mention the name of the Coastguard officer who, with such complete ignorance upon the subject, had yet given such advice to the National Lifeboat Institution as had prevented them from placing a lifeboat at that spot. A coroner's jury had returned a verdict in the case of the men drowned upon the foundering of the brig to which he had alluded, and in that verdict they expressed their opinion that life might have been saved if the Coastguard had rendered the fishermen that assistance which they ought to have done in preparing the boat. He thought that the Government ought to afford assistance in some way or another to this noble Institution. It was not, in his opinion, creditable to this great maritime country that the rescue of our imperilled seamen should be entirely left to the care of private generosity and benevolence. The Government had certainly done a good deal, but in the last and most pressing emergency, they refused to lend a helping hand to those who were carrying on the commerce from which this country derived its wealth and importance, and our seamen were indebted for their rescue solely to this great and noble Institution.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he quite agreed with his noble Friend that the National Lifeboat Institution was one of the noblest of the many noble institutions established by the private benevolence of the country, but he should strongly deprecate any interference with its work, because he believed such interference would only be attended with injury. If the Government undertook to do any part of the work now performed by the National Lifeboat Institution they could not avoid clashing. As the noble Earl had not informed him beforehand of the charge which he intended making against an individual branch of the Coastguard, he had of course been unable to make any inquiries into the circumstances. He could only say that the Coastguard all along our coasts had contributed largely towards saving life and property. In 1864 the value of property saved through their instrumentality amounted to £740,000, and the number of lives saved was 598. In the first three-quarters of last year they had saved 432 lives, and £390,000 worth of property. During the last three months the number of lives and the amount of property saved was proportionately still larger. If there was any case in which the Coastguard had not done their duty it must be an exceptional one. They were constantly ready to risk their own lives in the hope of rescuing the property and the lives of others. But it was not correct that the National Lifeboat Institution was not in any way assisted by the Government. The Board of Trade allowed £18 to each lifeboat when they were reported well manned and ready for cases of emergency. What the National Lifeboat Institution did was to place a lifeboat on those parts of the coast where they found the fishermen ready to drill and be trained, and offers of boats had been made to the National Lifeboat Institution which they were as yet unable to accept, because they could not find the men to undertake their management. He had no doubt that if the Government were to take upon themselves that duty their interference would be destructive of the National Lifeboat Institution; and he would remind their Lordships that the Society had excited so much admiration in France that the French Government had given their countenance to the establishment in their own country of one of a precisely similar character. The founders of that French institution had applied to their Government for assistance; but the Emperor, with that sagacity which distinguished him, had refused to accede to that application, and had stated that he would not in that matter interfere with the generous and benevolent action of his people. He admitted the excellence of the boats possessed by the Institution, and he had had some of them copied and sent to the West Coast of Africa, where they were of great advantage in landing through the surf. With regard to the rocket stations, he had to observe that they were furnished at the expense of the Government, that those stations at present amounted to about 250, and that last year they had been instrumental in saving 180 lives. He repeated that he did not think it would be wise on the part of the Government to interfere further than they had done in assisting the National Lifeboat Institution. During the past year the boats of that Institution had saved 500 lives, besides giving rewards to the owners of shore and fishing boats who had saved 200 more. Under these circumstances, he thought it would be bad policy not to leave the action of the Institution uncontrolled.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he was anxious that he should not be misunderstood in reference to the Coastguard. He had referred to the report of an inquest in a particular case which had appeared in the public newspapers. The noble Duke might be right in assuming that any interference on the part of Government might do more harm than good, but that did not alter the fact that there was a deficiency in the number of lifeboats on our coast—a fact that was amply proved by the constant endeavours to increase their number. In the case of Christchurch, to which he had referred, the lifeboat, which was offered, but refused, might have saved lives last Sunday.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he believed the National Lifeboat Institution were ready to give the most favourable consideration to any application that might be made to them for the supply of a lifeboat; but it was necessary, before a lifeboat was stationed at a place, that it should be shown that it could be advantageously employed, and that there were a sufficient number of persons willing to come forward to form a committee. Had this been the case at Christchurch a lifeboat would doubtless have been stationed at that place, although it would not have been of much use, as wrecks off that coast were very rare, it being only frequented by small coasters. With regard to the statement which had been made that the Government did not contribute in any way towards saving the lives of our sailors, he felt bound to say that Government defrayed the whole expense of the rocket stations, which were worked by the Coastguard. That body, however, had other duties to perform, from which it would not do to take them away in order to attach them to the Lifeboat Institution—especially as the efficiency of the Institution was more likely to be preserved when under the management of private persons whose local interests induced them to give a zealous watchfulness over the efficiency of the service, than when left to the services of Government officers who might have other duties to perform. He, therefore, thought it would be better for the matter to be left in the hands of those who had so efficiently managed the affairs of the Institution up to the present time. The Institution had attracted the attention of the Emperor of the French, who had requested the association to supply him with eleven boats for the use of the coast of France; but he had distinctly expressed his objection to their being placed under the control of the French Admiralty, preferring that they should be managed as they were in England by private enterprise. He should, therefore, advise the Government not to interfere further in the matter.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY repeated that the main reason why no lifeboat was stationed at Christchurch was that the Coastguard officers there declared that it was not wanted, and that there was no local committee ready to look after the undertaking. He had again to express his belief that the latter statement was unfounded.

PUBLIC LOAN ACTS.

TREASURY MINUTE 1859. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF POWIS rose to call the attention of the First Lord of the Treasury to the impediment to the beneficial working of the Public Loan Acts caused by the Treasury Minute of 1859, declining any future reduction of interest below 5 per cent. The noble Earl said that there were two kinds of loans to which the Treasury Minute of 1859 applied—one being loans to private individuals or companies, and the other to public bodies on the security of county and borough rates. Now, the Government might occasionally sustain losses from the want of sufficient security in the former case, and there was, perhaps, nothing unreasonable in their covering the risk which they incurred by charging as high an interest as 5 per cent; but there could be no danger of their not being repaid for the advances which they made on the security of public rates, and it appeared to him that they might in that instance reduce their terms to $3\frac{1}{2}$ or 4 per cent, or the rate of interest paid on Exchequer Bills for the time being. When the new Poor Law was passed in England, it led to numerous loans for the purpose of building workhouses, in all of which the Treasury reduced the rate of interest below 5 per cent. In this way £5,000 was advanced to the parish of Paddington, and £50,000 to the City of London Union. In the case of Ireland, when the Poor Law was introduced the Treasury went farther, for they granted loans, to be repaid out of the poor rate, on which no interest was to be charged for the first ten years after the buildings were fit for the reception of inmates. That, however, was an exceptional case, and he did not wish them to do anything of the sort, but merely to go back to the old practice of making such a rate only as would secure them against loss. To show the extent to which the Exchequer Loan Commissioners had granted loans, he found that between the years 1817 and 1843 they amounted to £8,670,000, the entire loss upon which, from insufficient security, was £300,000. From 1843 to 1852 the sum of £4,000,000 was advanced in a similar manner. As regarded counties, these loans were obtained chiefly for the construction of bridges, which were now thrown on the county rate, and for the gaols and lunatic asylums. In parishes they were sought principally for the construction of workhouses, and in towns for providing burial grounds, the erection of baths and washhouses, waterworks, and various other works of local improvement. There was a note to the Return he had just quoted (which was a Return made to the House of Commons in 1854), which stated that the cost to the country of the loans so made averaged 3 per cent, and as the loans were made at 3½ and 4 per cent, or Exchequer Bill interest, the Government had not incurred any loss. It further said that on the loans in Great Britain the profits were beyond the losses by bad debts. He was not asking for any eleemosynary grant. All public bodies would rather borrow money of the Public Loans Commissioners than from any private source, because they could repay it by instalments—an arrangement which was not liked by the private lender, who, when his money was returned in so fragmentary a manner, would have continually to be making new investments, and be put to new expenses. By the Treasury Minute of 1859, it was announced that no further advances could be made at a lower rate of interest than 5 per cent, and for this step various reasons were assigned, which in his opinion were wholly insufficient to justify the Government in making the change, and were rather those of an usurious money-lender than those of the Government of a great nation. Many burdens were now thrown by the Legislature upon the land, to the exclusion of any other kind of property, and they had, therefore, a right to every assistance the Government could give them without cost or risk to the country, and thus enable them to bear those burdens. What he complained of was that a practice which had been of such value to the country should be abrogated, not on any sound reason, or on account of any loss to the State, but because the Treasury thought fit to issue a Minute on the subject. He had not thought fit to make any Motion on the subject, but would be content to bring it under the notice of the noble Earl at the head of the Government, who, he trusted, would cause the Minute of 1859 to be reconsidered.

EARL RUSSELL said, there could be no doubt but that the advances made by the Public Loans Commissioners was a great advantage to the borrowers; but the noble Earl (the Earl of Powis) found fault with the change made in the rate of interest by the Treasury Minute of 1859. By a recent Act of Parliament the Treasury were empowered to lay down in their discretion rules under which loans were to be made. In 1856 they made a rule that the rate of interest should vary with the common rate of interest in the market; but it was obvious that if there was justice in this arrangement there was uncertainty and inconvenience. The Loan Commissioners were not in the position of ordinary money-lenders, and if persons could obtain money at a cheaper rate they would not go to the Commissioners. What the Treasury decided in 1859 was that the rate of interest should be fixed at 5 per cent, which was neither very high nor very low, and fair to all parties. Certain exceptions had, however, been made under the Act of Parliament. In laying down that rule the Treasury had acted wisely, and he was not disposed to make any alteration.

LORD OVERSTONE said, that these loans, though nominally loans of money, are in reality advances of the capital of the country; and what the Government did was to interpose its character and credit under the authority of an Act of Parliament. By this operation the capital was withdrawn from its natural and therefore legitimate channels of useful employment, and grave doubts may be fairly entertained whether the Government was justified in interposing in this way. With regard to the rate of interest, he thought that that should be fixed rather above than below the market rate. The noble Earl who introduced this subject complained that in 1859 a regulation was made prohibiting the advance of public money at a lower rate of interest than 5 per cent. It was remarkable that since that period there had been a constant tendency in the rate of interest to rise, and he was surprised that the present moment should be taken to recommend the loan of Government money at a lower rate. It was well known that in consequence of recent legislation speculation had been greatly stimulated, a result which he had from the first anticipated, and the country was committed to undertakings which involved a far larger amount of capital than it could command, and the rate of interest in the City had been for some months 3 per cent higher than the continental markets. This country used to supply capital to all the markets in the world: but the case is now reversed, and this country is now compelled to seek capital from other countries by the high rate of 8 per cent interest; yet this was the moment taken to urge the Government to interpose its credit to divert the capital from all private concerns to support those public works. If the Government was called upon to find capital for the construction of public works, surely justice, reason, and policy pointed out that they should not lend it at a lower rate than the market value.

CATTLE DISEASES BILL.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE, who had given notice of his intention to ask the Government Whether, in the event of the Cattle Diseases Bill coming up to the Lords before the 17th instant, they intended to proceed with it on that day, said, that when he gave that notice he thought it possible that the Bill might reach their Lordships' House earlier than it was now likely to do; but he would take the present opportunity of stating that several noble Lords on both sides of the House were of opinion that the Bill should be passed as quickly as possible.

LORD DENMAN said, that as their Lordships were to have an imperfect Bill, which could not be altered in their House, he wished, as he had attended important meetings both yesterday and to-day, at which complaint was made of ignorant persons insisting upon visiting diseased cattle in spite of all remonstrances, that some clause might be added to the Bill, to render persons liable to punishment who entered infected farms. He had himself warned off three packs of hounds which were kept separate and at large on different farms, and he had told those who were with them that they would be chargeable with malicious trespass if they persisted in hunting after notice, but he was very anxious that a stop might be put to all unnecessary danger of infection.

LORD DUNSANY asked whether the Government had received information that any cattle had been smuggled into Ireland from Scotland; and, if so, what precautions had been taken to prevent it; also, if it was the case that an Order in Council had lately been issued permitting the importation of the skin of sheep or lambs under certain conditions into Ireland. If such were the case it was desirable that the fact should be generally known, in order that the people of Ireland might be put on their guard against the purchase of cattle under such circumstances.

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to say that 126 sheep had been imported from Scotland into Ireland in the month of October last; that the importation was contrary to law, and that the parties perpetrating the offence would be prosecuted. It had not come to the knowledge of the Government that the attempt had been repeated. It was true that an Order in Council of the character of that to which the noble Earl referred had been issued.

EXTENSION OF THE UNION CHARGEABILITY ACT TO SCOTLAND. QUESTION.

MR. EDWARD CRAUFURD said, he would beg to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether he is prepared to extend to Scotland the beneficial principles of the Union Chargeability Act passed last Session for England by introducing a measure to charge the relief of the poor in each county in Scotland on a common fund to be raised over the whole county?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: I have no intention, Sir, of introducing a measure on that subject.

POLICEMEN IN PLAIN CLOTHES. QUESTION.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the employment of Police Constables in plain clothes at night in the suburban districts of the Metropolis, and to the serious results which have already occurred, and are likely to occur in consequence; and especially to the recent case at Sydenham, when Police Constable Maddock was severely wounded on the highway by a man named Joseph Ferguson, now confined in Maidstone Gaol, but who at the time of the assault believed that he was only defending himself and his property against the attacks of a robber?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that he did not know anything of the particular case to which the noble Lord had referred, and, consequently, he could give no information in regard to it. With respect, however, to the general question as to the employment of policemen in plain clothes in the metropolis, he might state that the practice was adopted in 1862 in consequence of the number of garrotte robberies which had taken place in London, and it has also been followed in certain districts where numerous burglaries had been committed. It was ascertained that those robberies were committed during the absence of the ordinary police constables in uniform, who were watched on their rounds till they were away from the spot. It was necessary, in order to put a stop to such robberies, to employ constables in plain clothes. The report of a recent trial showed that a certain class of thieves very closely watched the movements of the police.

LAW OFFICERS (IRELAND). QUESTION.

COLONEL LESLIE said, he rose to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, What arrangements are made to carry on the Government business in that Country without the presence of any Law Officer, the Law Adviser, contrary to precedent, being now in Parliament, as well as the Attorney and Solicitor General?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAWSON), in reply, said, that he was not aware that any charge had been made, or could be made, as to the mode in which the business of the Irish Government was being carried on. It was true that he and his Colleague had seats in the House, but that did not in the least interfere with the proper discharge of their duty. In fact, that duty was discharged as effectually in London as in Dublin. With respect to that part of the question which referred to the circumstance of the Law Adviser having a seat in that House, he thought it right to correct any misapprehension which might exist as to the hon. Member for Dungarvan, who did not now fill the office of Law Adviser of the Irish Government. The hon. Member resigned that office, and his resignation was accepted before the general election; but as, in the then state of affairs in Ireland, it was not deemed expedient to make any change, he (Mr. Lawson) had requested the hon. Gentleman to continue to assist him. This the hon. Gentleman had done, but he received no salary for his services. With respect to the last part of the question of the hon. and gallant Member, which seemed to complain of there being so many of the Irish Law Officers in the House, he (Mr. Lawson) must confess that he did not see why that fact should be brought forward as a charge against the Government. Indeed, if his memory served him right, the Government had been taunted on former occasions on account of the absence of the Irish Law Officers from that House.

CATTLE PLAGUE BILL.—QUESTION.

An hon. MEMBER asked, Whether, considering the extreme urgency of the case, the Cattle Diseases Bill would be proceeded with to-morrow?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It is not likely, I think, Sir, in any event, that the House will be at liberty to consider the Cattle Plague Bill to-morrow. I may take this opportunity of making the Motion, That the House at its rising do adjourn till twelve o'clock to-morrow. The cause of this is that an important matter of public business with respect to Ireland may have to be brought forward by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who will in a few minutes proceed to give notice of his Motion.

MR. BRIGHT: I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with regard to the Bill which is coming on for discussion very soon, whether it is intended to continue the experiments which have been made with a view to discover some cure for the cattle plague. I met a gentleman to-day who has been on the Commission or Committee, and he told me he supposed that after the decision of the House last night all experiments of every kind in the way of medical or scientific research would now be necessarily put a stop to. Well, I have expressed my opinion as to the folly of that proceeding, and I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is intended to continue those experiments, or not.

SIR GEORGE GREY: These experiments were not made by the Government, but by the Commission, and I do not think that any important result has followed from them. They only show how completely all attempts to cure the disease have hitherto failed. The clauses in the Bill relating to the slaughter of cattle must, of course, be carried into effect, and all I can say is that it will be the duty of every one to obey the law.

MR. BRIGHT: The same gentleman told me that at York forty-five animals had been cured. ["Order, order!"]

LOREN JOHN MANNERS said, he had a suggestion to make with reference to the Returns which professed to show the progress of the cattle plague. The Returns for the last fortnight were valueless, in consequence of many of the inspectors not having sent in their Returns. That, of course, tended to perplex the public mind, as the Returns gave no information of any kind, and tended rather to confuse the minds of those who consulted them. He begged leave to suggest that it would be better to issue the Returns once a fortnight. At all events, some method should be devised so that the Returns would correctly represent the progress of the disease in the various counties in England and Scotland.

JAMAICA GOVERNMENT BILL.

QUESTIONS.

MR. RAILLIE COCHRANE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, whether he intends that the Jamaica Government Bill shall be the first business on Monday?

MR. CARDWELL: I am afraid, Sir, I cannot give a positive answer to that question. The only answer I can give at present is that I shall not be prepared to bring it on except at an early hour of the evening.

MR. BRIGHT

Motion agreed to.

House at rising to adjourn till To-morrow, at Twelve of the clock.

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION

(IRELAND.)—NOTICE.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, I rise, with deep regret, and only under the strongest sense of what the Government believe to be an absolute necessity, to give notice that to-morrow, at Twelve o'clock, I shall move for leave to bring in a Bill to suspend for a limited time the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland.

CATTLE DISEASES BILL—[BILL 6.] COMMITTEE.

[The Bill having been Committed, Re-committed, and Considered as Amended, without having been re-printed, great difficulty has been experienced in following out the Motions for Amendments, particularly those of which no Notice had been given. When a Clause has been agreed to, with or without Amendment, the small figures added refer to the No. of the corresponding Clause in the re-print of the Bill No. 22.]

Order for Committee read.

MR. HUNT said, he wished to put a Question to the right hon Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department relative to the course of proceeding with the Government measure for the suppression of the cattle plague. He understood from the right hon. Baronet that the Government would be willing to consent to this arrangement—in fact, it was suggested by the right hon. Gentlemen to his consideration—that the Government should proceed with their Cattle Diseases Bill, accepting the decision of the Committee on Thursday night with regard to the prevention of the movement of cattle by railway; that the question of the movement of cattle in other ways should be left for consideration in a future Bill; that the clauses discussed on Thursday night should terminate with the words added by the Committee; that the clauses relating to compulsory slaughter, compensation, and razing should be retained; and that the remaining clauses should be transferred to the future Bill; or, if the Government wished it, considered as part of the Bill he had himself brought in.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had told the hon. Member in reply to a note from him: that he would readily concur in an arrangement that would facilitate the speedy passage of the Bill. In asking for leave to bring in the Bill, he stated that he thought it possible some of the provisions might be separated from others in order that those which were most urgent might be passed without delay; and on the part of the Government he was quite ready now to take that course. The clauses that related to slaughtering and compensation had been agreed to by the House; those that related to rating and the funds out of which the compensation was to be paid had not, and it would be necessary to proceed with those. After so large a majority had affirmed that for a limited time no cattle should be moved by railway, the Government would defer to the decision. While retaining their opinion as to the amount of serious inconvenience that might arise, they would not think it respectful to the House to reopen the question. Therefore he was quite willing to take the Bill, with the clauses relating to slaughtering, compensation, and rating, that prohibiting the removal of cattle for a limited time by railway, and two or three other clauses, inclusive of those relating to penalties, with respect to which he thought there would be no difference of opinion, leaving for consideration in another Bill the regulations with regard to the removal of cattle on highways, and other matters of a more permanent character, the consideration of which might occupy a considerable time. The result of the arrangement would be that the orders which were now in force would continue in operation until the 1st of March, and might be continued for a longer time, so far as they were not inconsistent with any of the provisions of the Bill.

MR. HUNT said, he wished to know whether there would be any objection to his Bill being committed pro forma that evening, in order that he might insert certain Amendments, and so give the House an opportunity of considering them.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that there would not be the least objection.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 21 (Regulations as to Movement of Cattle).

MR. HUNT, who had given notice of an Amendment, to insert after "1866" that

"No cattle shall be moved along any highway, or any canal navigation, or river, except as in this Act expressly authorized,"

said, that in accordance with the arrangement made he proposed to withdraw the

Amendment, and to strike out the rest of the clause after "1866."

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he heard the proposition to strike out the rest of the clause with great regret. He approved the Resolution come to with regard to the movement of cattle by railway, but it appeared to him that the measure would be ineffectual if the passage of cattle along highways was to be left unchecked. Local authorities would adopt diverse regulations, which would occasion great difficulty, more especially in the contiguous parts of adjoining counties, such as Leicester and Derby.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought his hon. and learned Friend did not apprehend quite distinctly the question at issue. The question was not, as he seemed to suppose, whether the subject of the movement of cattle on highways was to be abandoned; it was not even whether it was to be delayed. That was a question not yet discussed, and one which was almost certain, in the opinion of the best judges, to create a good deal of discussion. The question now under consideration was whether they should delay the operation of that which they had already fixed upon until they could also fix upon something else which might be desirable or not, but which the House had yet to decide whether it was or was not practicable. It did not, in his opinion, seem desirable to stop the operation of the clauses in question. The Bill, in any case, must be one of compromise, and he hoped the same disposition would be shown in all quarters as would be manifested by the Government in regard to the decision of the House, which the Government last night had most reluctantly yielded to.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he gathered that all the provisions relating to the movement of cattle on the highways were to be postponed. He thought it very important the House should know when the second Bill of the Government would be introduced, and whether it was likely to become the law of the land by the 1st of March next, when he understood the operation of the Orders in Council came to an end. What would be the condition of the question after the 1st of March, during the intervening time, if the second Bill proposed to be introduced did not become law by that time? He understood from the Home Secretary that all the clauses relating to compensation were to be proceeded with now, but that those which related to the removal of cattle by highway were to be postponed. He should have thought that the clauses which pointed out the funds from which compensation was to be derived would be more likely to create angry and protracted discussion than those which related to the movement of cattle by highway. If that were so, would it not be better that the clauses which related to compensation should be postponed rather than the others?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the noble Lord was mistaken in supposing that the Orders in Council would expire on the 1st March. They would certainly do so unless renewed, but the same power under the Act of Parliament which authorized the Council to make those Orders would enable it, if the necessity arose, to continue them for a longer time than was originally intended. He had that morning received a communication from the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt), to the effect that he wished the House to affirm the principle as to the non-removal of cattle on highways, while at the same time he was desirous to postpone the consideration of the exceptions. He (Sir George Grey) objected to that on the ground that it was really difficult to determine how the principle would work without seeing the exceptions to it. His advice to the hon. Member was to commit his Bill pro forma, and then the House would be able to see his various exceptions. If they were such that the hon. Gentleman could satisfy the House that no inconvenience would arise from the provision with respect to removal of cattle on highways, then they could proceed with a measure based upon that principle. In the meantime the Orders in Council would remain in force.

MR. HUNT said, that he had been prepared to proceed with his Bill through every stage, before entering into the arrangement to which he had just come with the Government. He had all his exceptions ready, and had even stated to the House on the preceding night what those exceptions would be. He thought it would be convenient that hon. Members should see those exceptions in print, and ascertain if they were sufficiently numerous, or were put in proper words. With that view he had suggested that his Bill should be committed pro forma, to give hon. Members an opportunity of seeing his exceptions.

MR. OWEN STANLEY said, he thought there should be a clause to the effect that every railway, canal, and other company engaged in carrying dead meat, should, as soon as the meat was taken out, cause every penfold, truck, &c., to be properly cleansed, disinfected, and washed out. There should be powers of inspection for this purpose. They had found at Holyhead the trucks in a filthy state, and had written to every department of the London and North Western Railway Company to have them cleansed, but nothing effective was done. In fact, they were laughed at by the railway authorities, because they had no power to compel those parties to have their trucks cleansed. Complaints had been made to the Home Office and to other departments, both by the Member for Carnarvonshire and himself, but without effect. All that was done was to forward the letters to the London and North Western Railway Company, and no notice was taken of them. He had received a letter from the chief constable at Holyhead, stating that on the morning he wrote twenty or more trucks had come in in a most filthy state.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he wished to ask the Chairman if it were competent for the hon. Member on this clause to discuss this subject of cleansing the trucks.

THE CHAIRMAN: We are now on the 21st clause, relating to the removal of cattle.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the hon. Member would see that the subject to which he had called attention was dealt with in a subsequent clause.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member for Northamptonshire wish to withdraw his Amendment?

MR. HUNT: I propose to withdraw the second paragraph after "1866."

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, supposing there were three or four counties adjoining each other in which, perhaps, the cattle plague might not have broken out, or in which it had subsided, and that the local authorities either had not made any regulations, or that those regulations had expired and not been renewed, he wanted to know whether, with respect to these three or four counties, there was to be no restriction and no legislation at all?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that there were general regulations applying to all counties, requiring that every owner of diseased cattle should give notice to the inspectors. A penalty was imposed by the present Orders on any person who removed a diseased animal, or any animal that had been in contact with it, from one place to another, without the sanction of the Government inspector. The Orders would remain in force until Parliament had decided respecting the removal of cattle by highway.

MR. LOCKE-KING said, he wished to call attention to the inconvenience that must arise from at once stopping suddenly the supply of cattle by railway to the metropolis. If it were so stopped, where was the supply for the metropolis to come from. If time were given for preparation he had no doubt that a great number could be obtained, but the machinery was not ready, and the distress in London would be very great. How could the dead-meat markets supply the wants of three millions of people. He therefore suggested that the clause should come into operation at some more distant day than was named.

MR. HUNT said, that arrangements were now being made by railway companies to bring up dead meat. He believed that butchers and sales-masters in London would be enabled, by sending orders by telegraph, to get meat in sufficient time.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to. [cl. 17.]

Clauses 22 to 24 struck out.

Clause 25 (Movement of Cattle, &c., within the Metropolis).

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he understood the clause was to be withdrawn, but he desired to call the attention of the Government to the fact that the present dead-meat market was decidedly inadequate to meet the supply of dead meat at present required for the metropolis. He believed that great improvements were in contemplation, and that already great improvements had been made; but it was a matter which the Government, in his opinion, ought to take up with a view to see what could be done by means of loans for new markets or otherwise to remedy this great defect. This was the more imperative as some of the local authorities of London were Members of the Privy Council. A great number of persons living on the Surrey side of the river were engaged in the hide trade, and cutting off the supply of hides from them would have an effect similar to that which cutting off the cotton supply would have in Lancashire. He would suggest the propriety of establishing a market for sea-borne cattle on the south side of the Thames.

MR. LOCKE said, he agreed with the

hon. Baronet that the establishment of a foreign meat market on the south side of the river would be a great benefit.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the House would understand that in this clause the Committee were making no change in the existing arrangements, for it merely embodied the Orders in Council applicable to the metropolis. By existing regulations, coupled with the decision come to by the Committee on the preceding evening, no cattle could leave the London district alive, and none come by railway from other parts of the country into the metropolis. But London being the chief port for the importation of foreign cattle, such cattle could be brought to the London market, and it would be a serious consideration, when the Committee came to restrict the movement of cattle on the highway, how far that could be done in London consistently with the necessary supply of meat to the metropolis.

Clause 26 (Notice of Disease in Cattle).

MR. ARTHUR PEEL said, he had no objection to the principle of the clause, but he wished to say a few words with reference to the mode of carrying it out. Every owner of a diseased animal was to give notice to the inspector or local authority, and by the 13th clause the local authority was to order every such animal to be destroyed. Now, the inspectors were not very numerous, and they might suppose the case of a farmer giving due notice, and the inspector, through being over-worked or from neglect, failing to come to inspect the animal until after it had died. It could not be said to have been slaughtered, but surely the farmer would be entitled to compensation. As, however, the clause stood, he would not be able to obtain it. It was a question whether he had not a legal remedy against the inspector for his neglect, and it was probable that if the farmer belonged to an association the latter also might have the same remedy. He wished to ask whether, in view of such cases, it would not be advisable to make compensation where notice had been given, and where the animal had died before it was inspected.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the hon. Member was correct in supposing that the owner of the animal would have a right of action against the inspector if he sustained loss from his wilful neglect. That legal right would be, he thought, the best security for the inspector doing his duty.

Clause struck out.

Clauses 27 and 28 struck out.

Clause 29 (Public Exposure of Diseased Cattle).

MR. MITFORD said, that in his neighbourhood there were commons extending far and wide over the whole of the county. The farmers had the right of turning their cattle upon these commons, and it would be desirable in a subsequent clause to give them the means of ingress and egress to those places. Unless some further restrictions were, however, proposed, there would be a chance of an infected animal finding its way to these commons and propagating the disease through the whole of the county. He ventured to hope that the Home Secretary and his hon. Friend (Mr. Hunt) would see whether they could not prevent infected cattle finding their way to these commons.

Clause struck out.

Clause 31 (Expenses of Local Authority).

MR. CARNEGIE said, that as the Committee had decided to adopt the slaughter and compensation principle the country would have to carry it out. He objected to the Government scheme of raising the money with which to pay the compensation as being unjust and unsound in principle. If the country wanted a man's cow, the country ought to pay for it. When the country required private property, public buildings such as the National Gallery the country paid for it; and if the country wanted cattle from the stockholder the country ought to pay for it. By the Government proposition the assessment would fall the heaviest on those districts that had suffered the most, and those districts that had escaped the disease would escape altogether. Ireland as a breeding country would be benefited by it and ought to assist in the expense. Some counties, like that which he represented, were so thoroughly infected by the disease that he doubted whether the Act would be of much service to them. The cattle plague, however, was a consumer's as well as a producer's question, and he saw no reason why the consumer should not bear his share of the loss. It was urged that local rating would prevent fraud and carelessness, but he thought that might be attained without putting the whole of the expense on the local rates. It was not competent to him to move to take any money from the Consolidated Fund, but he suggested that if his Amendment should be carried the clause should be struck out, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer should bring forward a Bill, by which the money should be provided out of the Consolidated Fund in the first instance, and afterwards by such sanction as might be thought expedient by the House. It was also desirable to have a Bill passed as speedily as possible to prevent the spread of the disease, and he thought it would be better not to encumber the Bill with the compensation clauses, but let them form the subject of another Bill. This Bill was said to have been brought forward on the principle of justice, but instead of that it would inflict injustice, and injustice carried with it the seeds of retribution. It was but natural that those counties which were highly assessed would endeavour more to keep down the rate than to stamp out the disease, and then their costly experiment would become a costly failure. He moved to strike out the words "local rate."

MR. BARROW said, he thought the person who drew up the Bill must have presumed that by a local rate the county rate would be understood, whereas a county rate could be levied only under the provisions of an Act of Parliament specially referring thereto. The clause should, therefore, be amended so as to authorize the quarter sessions to levy a special county rate under the name of a cattle rate.

MR. AYRTON said, that before this Amendment was put he had an Amendment to propose to an earlier part of the clause. It was worthy of consideration whether they ought to raise a rate which was to be levied on the particular class that had been visited with this heavy misfortune. He had been much impressed by the able speech of the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill), because he thought that hon. Gentleman had given admirable reasons why such a rate should not be imposed. There was a very large number of stock-owners in the metropolis, and if the owners of dairies there had suffered by having had the infection introduced among their herds because we had an unrestrained trade in cattle for the benefit of the rest of the community, he could not understand why on that account those dairy-owners should be taxed for the benefit of the rest of the community. It seemed to him that there might rather be special reasons for exempting the owners of stock; but he disliked making distinctions in such matters, and preferred that they should be treated as common to all classes. He conceived that in principle the proposed charge should be a national charge. But in practice it could not be so; for the simple reason that they must give power to the local authorities, who must, therefore, be restrained in its exercise by having to bear the consequences. But for that necessity, he should contend that there would be no justice whatever in creating any local charge of the kind. The metropolis, which had done so much to diffuse the plague, and which was so much interested in the cheapness of meat, was as much concerned in the question as the farmers and landowners, and ought to bear its share of the burden. But, on the other hand, if the local authorities had the control of the money of the metropolis they would act differently from what they would do if they were themselves made responsible. He was therefore in favour of the area of taxation being co-extensive with the area of administration. He moved the omission of the words "as to two-third parts thereof" in order to raise the question.

MR. J. STUART MILL said, the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) had referred to some remarks of his with reference to this subject, and as, in all probability through his own (Mr. Mill's) fault, the hon. and learned Member had not seized the point of his argument, he hoped he might be allowed, with the permission of the Committee, to repeat the substance of what he then said. The hon. and learned Member had laid down a principle which no one could dispute—namely, that taxation ought not to be partial. On that ground he urged that a particular class ought not to be taxed to defray the expense of compensation for the consequences of a calamity by which they had already suffered to so great an extent. But his (Mr. Stuart Mill's) argument was grounded expressly on this—that although they suffered more immediately, they would not ultimately suffer more than the rest of the community who were consumers of food. It followed that if they were now to tax the whole of the community in order to give a special indemnity to that class for what they suffered, they would, instead of taxing them, tax the rest of the community in order to relieve them. That was his argument, and nothing he had heard had tended to weaken it; and, consequently, that part of the provision for compensation to which the hon. and learned Member objected, the poll tax on cattle, was the only part which he considered sound in principle. It appeared to him that the valid claim for compensation was not for the burden, but for the inequality of the burden, inasmuch as some cattle owners suffered much less than others, and some not at all. The class on whom the calamity had immediately fallen would, as a class, be compensated in the natural course of things, by the increased price of meat consequent on the diminished supply; but the individuals of the class who had not suffered at all, or who had suffered less than their neighbours, should contribute for the relief of those who had not been so fortunate. In principle, therefore, the tax, whatever it might be, ought to be a rate on land only. Although the clause as it stood was very objectionable, it would be made still more so by the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster, showed a great difference between practical and political economical views. To throw the whole burden of the cattle plague upon the land might be in accordance with deep political economical views, but he could not see how the landowner could be ultimately benefited by that. He (Mr. B. Cochrane) considered it unjust that agriculturists should have to bear the whole of the burden, and it was only right and fair that a portion of the charge should be borne by the Consolidated Fund. He denied that by relieving the counties they would act with indiscretion or extravagance, or show any want of vigilance; and he ventured to say, though the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not seem to concur in his views, that the principle best to be adopted in events of national calamity was for the whole country to sympathize with the sufferers. This was a calamity which he ventured to predict, whatever it was now, would in the end become universal, and he thought it was only just to all interests that a portion of the burden should be borne by the Consolidated Fund. That was the spirit in which they had dealt with the distress in Ireland, and with other great public calamities. A sufficient stimulus to careful management on the part of the local authorities would be guaranteed by casting the rest of the charge upon them.

had been a constant tendency in the rate of interest to rise, and he was surprised that the present moment should be taken to recommend the loan of Government money at a lower rate. It was well known that in consequence of recent legislation speculation had been greatly stimulated, a result which he had from the first anticipated, and the country was committed to undertakings which involved a far larger amount of capital than it could command, and the rate of interest in the City had been for some months 3 per cent higher than the continental markets. This country used to supply capital to all the markets in the world: but the case is now reversed, and this country is now compelled to seek capital from other countries by the high rate of 8 per cent interest; yet this was the moment taken to urge the Government to interpose its credit to divert the capital from all private concerns to support those public works. If the Government was called upon to find capital for the construction of public works, surely justice, reason, and policy pointed out that they should not lend it at a lower rate than the market value.

CATTLE DISEASES BILL.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE, who had given notice of his intention to ask the Government Whether, in the event of the Cattle Diseases Bill coming up to the Lords before the 17th instant, they intended to proceed with it on that day, said, that when he gave that notice he thought it possible that the Bill might reach their Lordships' House earlier than it was now likely to do; but he would take the present opportunity of stating that several noble Lords on both sides of the House were of opinion that the Bill should be passed as quickly as possible.

LORD DENMAN said, that as their Lordships were to have an imperfect Bill, which could not be altered in their House, he wished, as he had attended important meetings both yesterday and to-day, at which complaint was made of ignorant persons insisting upon visiting diseased cattle in spite of all remonstrances, that some clause might be added to the Bill, to render persons liable to punishment who entered infected farms. He had himself warned off three packs of hounds which were kept separate and at large on different farms, and he had told those who were with them that they would be chargeable with malicious trespass if they persisted in hunting after notice, but he was very anxious that a stop might be put to all unnecessary danger of infection.

LORD DUNSANY asked whether the Government had received information that any cattle had been smuggled into Ireland from Scotland; and, if so, what precautions had been taken to prevent it; also, if it was the case that an Order in Council had lately been issued permitting the importation of the skin of sheep or lambs under certain conditions into Ireland. If such were the case it was desirable that the fact should be generally known, in order that the people of Ireland might be put on their guard against the purchase of cattle under such circumstances.

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to say that 126 sheep had been imported from Scotland into Ireland in the month of October last; that the importation was contrary to law, and that the parties perpetrating the offence would be prosecuted. It had not come to the knowledge of the Government that the attempt had been repeated. It was true that an Order in Council of the character of that to which the noble Earl referred had been issued.

EXTENSION OF THE UNION CHARGE- ABILITY ACT TO SCOTLAND. QUESTION.

MR. EDWARD CRAUFURD said, he would beg to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether he is prepared to extend to Scotland the beneficial principles of the Union Chargeability Act passed last Session for England by introducing a measure to charge the relief of the poor in each county in Scotland on a common fund to be raised over the whole county?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: I have no intention, Sir, of introducing a measure on that subject.

POLICEMEN IN PLAIN CLOTHES.

QUESTION.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the employment of Police Constables in plain clothes at night in the suburban districts of the Metropolis, and to the serious results which have already occurred, and are likely to occur in consequence; and especially to the recent case at Sydenham, when Police Constable Maddock was severely wounded on the highway by a man named Joseph Ferguson, now confined in Maidstone Gaol, but who at the time of the assault believed that he was only defending himself and his property against the attacks of a robber?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that he did not know anything of the particular case to which the noble Lord had referred, and, consequently, he could give no information in regard to it. With respect, however, to the general question as to the employment of policemen in plain clothes in the metropolis, he might state that the practice was adopted in 1862 in consequence of the number of garrotte robberies which had taken place in London, and it has also been followed in certain districts where numerous burglaries had been committed. It was ascertained that those robberies were committed during the absence of the ordinary police constables in uniform, who were watched on their rounds till they were away from the spot. It was necessary, in order to put a stop to such robberies, to employ constables in plain clothes. The report of a recent trial showed that a certain class of thieves very closely watched the movements of the police.

LAW OFFICERS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

COLONEL LESLIE said, he rose to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, What arrangements are made to carry on the Government business in that Country without the presence of any Law Officer, the Law Adviser, contrary to precedent, being now in Parliament, as well as the Attorney and Solicitor General?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAWSON), in reply, said, that he was not aware that any charge had been made, or could be made, as to the mode in which the business of the Irish Government was being carried on. It was true that he and his Colleague had seats in the House, but that did not in the least interfere with the proper discharge of their duty. In fact, that duty was discharged as effectually in London as in Dublin. With respect to that part of the question which referred to the circumstance of the Law Adviser having a seat in that House, he thought it right to correct any misapprehension which might exist as to the hon. Member for Dungarvan, who did not now fill the office of Law Adviser of the Irish Government. The hon. Member resigned that office, and his resignation was accepted before the general election; but as, in the then state of affairs in Ireland, it was not deemed expedient to make any change, he (Mr. Lawson) had requested the hon. Gentleman to continue to assist him. This the hon. Gentleman had done, but he received no salary for his services. With respect to the last part of the question of the hon. and gallant Member, which seemed to complain of there being so many of the Irish Law Officers in the House, he (Mr. Lawson) must confess that he did not see why that fact should be brought forward as a charge against the Government. Indeed, if his memory served him right, the Government had been taunted on former occasions on account of the absence of the Irish Law Officers from that House.

CATTLE PLAGUE BILL.—QUESTION.

An hon. MEMBER asked, Whether, considering the extreme urgency of the case, the Cattle Diseases Bill would be proceeded with to-morrow?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It is not likely, I think, Sir, in any event, that the House will be at liberty to consider the Cattle Plague Bill to-morrow. I may take this opportunity of making the Motion, That the House at its rising do adjourn till twelve o'clock to-morrow. The cause of this is that an important matter of public business with respect to Ireland may have to be brought forward by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who will in a few minutes proceed to give notice of his Motion.

MR. BRIGHT: I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with regard to the Bill which is coming on for discussion very soon, whether it is intended to continue the experiments which have been made with a view to discover some cure for the cattle plague. I met a gentleman to-day who has been on the Commission or Committee, and he told me he supposed that after the decision of the House last night all experiments of every kind in the way of medical or scientific research would now be necessarily put a stop to. Well, I have expressed my opinion as to the folly of that proceeding, and I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is intended to continue those experiments, or not.

SIR GEORGE GREY: These experiments were not made by the Government, but by the Commission, and I do not think that any important result has followed from them. They only show how completely all attempts to cure the disease have hitherto failed. The clauses in the Bill relating to the slaughter of cattle must, of course, be carried into effect, and all I can say is that it will be the duty of every one to obey the law.

MR. BRIGHT: The same gentleman told me that at York forty-five animals had been cured. ["Order, order!"]

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he had a suggestion to make with reference to the Returns which professed to show the progress of the cattle plague. The Returns for the last fortnight were valueless, in consequence of many of the inspectors not having sent in their Returns. That, of course, tended to perplex the public mind, as the Returns gave no information of any kind, and tended rather to confuse the minds of those who consulted them. He begged leave to suggest that it would be better to issue the Returns once a fortnight. At all events, some method should be devised so that the Returns would correctly represent the progress of the disease in the various counties in England and Scotland.

JAMAICA GOVERNMENT BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he intends that the Jamaica Government Bill shall be the first business on Monday?

MR. CARDWELL: I am afraid, Sir, I cannot give a positive answer to that Question. The only answer I can give at present is that I shall not be prepared to bring it on except at an early hour of the evening.

Mr. Bright

Motion agreed to.

House at rising to adjourn till To-morrow, at Twelve of the clock.

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION (IRELAND.)—NOTICE.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, I rise, with deep regret, and only under the strongest sense of what the Government believe to be an absolute necessity, to give notice that to-morrow, at Twelve o'clock, I shall move for leave to bring in a Bill to suspend for a limited time the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland.

CATTLE DISEASES BILL—[BILL 6.] COMMITTEE.

[The Bill having been Committed, Re-committed, and Considered as Amended, without having been re-printed, great difficulty has been experienced in following out the Motions for Amendments, particularly those of which no Notice had been given. When a Clause has been agreed to, with or without Amendment, the small figures added refer to the No. of the corresponding Clause in the re-print of the Bill No. 22.]

Order for Committee read.

MR. HUNT said, he wished to put a Question to the right hon Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department relative to the course of proceeding with the Government measure for the suppression of the cattle plague. He understood from the right hon. Baronet that the Government would be willing to consent to this arrangement—in fact, it was suggested by the right hon. Gentleman to his consideration—that the Government should proceed with their Cattle Diseases Bill, accepting the decision of the Committee on Thursday night with regard to the prevention of the movement of cattle by railway; that the question of the movement of cattle in other ways should be left for consideration in a future Bill; that the clauses discussed on Thursday night should terminate with the words added by the Committee; that the clauses relating to compulsory slaughter, compensation, and rating should be retained; and that the remaining clauses should be transferred to the future Bill; or, if the Government wished it, considered as part of the Bill he had himself brought in.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had told the hon. Member in reply to a note from him that he would readily concur in an arrangement that would facilitate the speedy passage of the Bill. In asking for leave to bring in the Bill, he stated that he thought it possible some of the provisions might be separated from others in order that those which were most urgent might be passed without delay; and on the part of the Government he was quite ready now to take that course. The clauses that related to slaughtering and compensation had been agreed to by the House; those that related to rating and the funds out of which the compensation was to be paid had not, and it would be necessary to proceed with those. After so large a majority had affirmed that for a limited time no cattle should be moved by railway, the Government would defer to the decision. While retaining their opinion as to the amount of serious inconvenience that might arise, they would not think it respectful to the House to reopen the question. Therefore he was quite willing to take the Bill, with the clauses relating to slaughtering, compensation, and rating, that prohibiting the removal of cattle for a limited time by railway, and two or three other clauses, inclusive of those relating to penalties, with respect to which he thought there would be no difference of opinion, leaving for consideration in another Bill the regulations with regard to the removal of cattle on highways, and other matters of a more permanent character, the consideration of which might occupy a considerable time. The result of the arrangement would be that the orders which were now in force would continue in operation until the 1st of March, and might be continued for a longer time, so far as they were not inconsistent with any of the provisions of the Bill.

MR. HUNT said, he wished to know whether there would be any objection to his Bill being committed pro forma that evening, in order that he might insert certain Amendments, and so give the House an opportunity of considering them.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that there would not be the least objection.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 21 (Regulations as to Movement of Cattle).

MR. HUNT, who had given notice of an Amendment, to insert after "1866" that

"No cattle shall be moved along any highway, or any canal navigation, or river, except as in this Act expressly authorized,"

said, that in accordance with the arrangement made he proposed to withdraw the

Amendment, and to strike out the rest of the clause after "1866."

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he heard the proposition to strike out the rest of the clause with great regret. He approved the Resolution come to with regard to the movement of cattle by railway, but it appeared to him that the measure would be ineffectual if the passage of cattle along highways was to be left unchecked. Local authorities would adopt diverse regulations, which would occasion great difficulty, more especially in the contiguous parts of adjoining counties, such as Leicester and Derby.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought his hon. and learned Friend did not apprehend quite distinctly the question at issue. The question was not, as he seemed to suppose, whether the subject of the movement of cattle on highways was to be abandoned; it was not even whether it was to be delayed. That was a question not yet discussed, and one which was almost certain, in the opinion of the best judges, to create a good deal of discussion. The question now under consideration was whether they should delay the operation of that which they had already fixed upon until they could also fix upon something else which might be desirable or not, but which the House had yet to decide whether it was or was not practicable. It did not, in his opinion, seem desirable to stop the operation of the clauses in question. The Bill, in any case, must be one of compromise, and he hoped the same disposition would be shown in all quarters as would be manifested by the Government in regard to the decision of the House, which the Government last night had most reluctantly yielded to.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he gathered that all the provisions relating to the movement of cattle on the highways were to be postponed. He thought it very important the House should know when the second Bill of the Government would be introduced, and whether it was likely to become the law of the land by the 1st of March next, when he understood the operation of the Orders in Council came to an end. What would be the condition of the question after the 1st of March, during the intervening time, if the second Bill proposed to be introduced did not become law by that time? He understood from the Home Secretary that all the clauses relating to compensation were to be proceeded with now, but that those which related to the removal of cattle by highway were to be postponed. He should have thought that the clauses which pointed out the funds from which compensation was to be derived would be more likely to create angry and protracted discussion than those which related to the movement of cattle by highway. If that were so, would it not be better that the clauses which related to compensation should be postponed rather than the others?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the noble Lord was mistaken in supposing that the Orders in Council would expire on the 1st March. They would certainly do so unless renewed, but the same power under the Act of Parliament which authorized the Council to make those Orders would enable it, if the necessity arose, to continue them for a longer time than was originally intended. He had that morning received a communication from the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt), to the effect that he wished the House to affirm the principle as to the non-removal of cattle on highways, while at the same time he was desirous to postpone the consideration of the exceptions. He (Sir George Grey) objected to that on the ground that it was really difficult to determine how the principle would work without seeing the exceptions to it. His advice to the hon. Member was to commit his Bill pro forma, and then the House would be able to see his various exceptions. If they were such that the hon. Gentleman could satisfy the House that no inconvenience would arise from the provision with respect to removal of cattle on highways, then they could proceed with a measure based upon that principle. In the meantime the Orders in Council would remain in force.

MR. HUNT said, that he had been prepared to proceed with his Bill through every stage, before entering into the arrangement to which he had just come with the Government. He had all his exceptions ready, and had even stated to the House on the preceding night what those exceptions would be. He thought it would be convenient that hon. Members should see those exceptions in print, and ascertain if they were sufficiently numerous, or were put in proper words. With that view he had suggested that his Bill should be committed pro forma, to give hon. Members an opportunity of seeing his exceptions.

MR. OWEN STANLEY said, he thought there should be a clause to the effect that every railway, canal, and other company engaged in carrying dead meat, should, as soon as the meat was taken out, cause every penfold, truck, &c., to be properly cleansed, disinfected, and washed out. There should be powers of inspection for this purpose. They had found at Holyhead the trucks in a filthy state, and had written to every department of the London and North Western Railway Company to have them cleansed, but nothing effective was done. In fact, they were laughed at by the railway authorities, because they had no power to compel those parties to have their trucks cleansed. Complaints had been made to the Home Office and to other departments, both by the Member for Carnarvonshire and himself, but without effect. All that was done was to forward the letters to the London and North Western Railway Company, and no notice was taken of them. He had received a letter from the chief constable at Holyhead, stating that on the morning he wrote twenty or more trucks had come in in a most filthy state.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he wished to ask the Chairman if it were competent for the hon. Member on this clause to discuss this subject of cleansing the trucks.

THE CHAIRMAN: We are now on the 21st clause, relating to the removal of cattle.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the hon. Member would see that the subject to which he had called attention was dealt with in a subsequent clause.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member for Northamptonshire wish to withdraw his Amendment?

MR. HUNT: I propose to withdraw the second paragraph after "1866."

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, supposing there were three or four counties adjoining each other in which, perhaps, the cattle plague might not have broken out, or in which it had subsided, and that the local authorities either had not made any regulations, or that those regulations had expired and not been renewed, he wanted to know whether, with respect to these three or four counties, there was to be no restriction and no legislation at all?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that there were general regulations applying to all counties, requiring that every owner of diseased cattle should give notice to the inspectors. A penalty was imposed by the present Orders on any person who removed a diseased animal, or any animal that had been in contact with it, from one place to another, without the sanction of the Government inspector. The Orders would remain in force until Parliament had decided respecting the removal of cattle by highway.

MR. LOCKE-KING said, he wished to call attention to the inconvenience that must arise from at once stopping suddenly the supply of cattle by railway to the metropolis. If it were so stopped, where was the supply for the metropolis to come from. If time were given for preparation he had no doubt that a great number could be obtained, but the machinery was not ready, and the distress in London would be very great. How could the dead-meat markets supply the wants of three millions of people. He therefore suggested that the clause should come into operation at some more distant day than was named.

MR. HUNT said, that arrangements were now being made by railway companies to bring up dead meat. He believed that butchers and sales-masters in London would be enabled, by sending orders by telegraph, to get meat in sufficient time.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to. [cl. 17.]

Clauses 22 to 24 struck out.

Clause 25 (Movement of Cattle, &c., within the Metropolis).

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he understood the clause was to be withdrawn, but he desired to call the attention of the Government to the fact that the present dead-meat market was decidedly inadequate to meet the supply of dead meat at present required for the metropolis. He believed that great improvements were in contemplation, and that already great improvements had been made; but it was a matter which the Government, in his opinion, ought to take up with a view to see what could be done by means of loans for new markets or otherwise to remedy this great defect. This was the more imperative as some of the local authorities of London were Members of the Privy Council. A great number of persons living on the Surrey side of the river were engaged in the hide trade, and cutting off the supply of hides from them would have an effect similar to that which cutting off the cotton supply would have in Lancashire. He would suggest the propriety of establishing a market for sea-borne cattle on the south side of the Thames.

MR. LOCKE said, he agreed with the

hon. Baronet that the establishment of a foreign meat market on the south side of the river would be a great benefit.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the House would understand that in this clause the Committee were making no change in the existing arrangements, for it merely embodied the Orders in Council applicable to the metropolis. By existing regulations, coupled with the decision come to by the Committee on the preceding evening, no cattle could leave the London district alive, and none come by railway from other parts of the country into the metropolis. But London being the chief port for the importation of foreign cattle, such cattle could be brought to the London market, and it would be a serious consideration, when the Committee came to restrict the movement of cattle on the highway, how far that could be done in London consistently with the necessary supply of meat to the metropolis.

Clause 26 (Notice of Disease in Cattle).

MR. ARTHUR PEEL said, he had no objection to the principle of the clause, but he wished to say a few words with reference to the mode of carrying it out. Every owner of a diseased animal was to give notice to the inspector or local authority, and by the 13th clause the local authority was to order every such animal to be destroyed. Now, the inspectors were not very numerous, and they might suppose the case of a farmer giving due notice, and the inspector, through being over-worked or from neglect, failing to come to inspect the animal until after it had died. It could not be said to have been slaughtered, but surely the farmer would be entitled to compensation. As, however, the clause stood, he would not be able to obtain it. It was a question whether he had not a legal remedy against the inspector for his neglect, and it was probable that if the farmer belonged to an association the latter also might have the same remedy. He wished to ask whether, in view of such cases, it would not be advisable to make compensation where notice had been given, and where the animal had died before it was inspected.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the hon. Member was correct in supposing that the owner of the animal would have a right of action against the inspector if he sustained loss from his wilful neglect. That legal right would be, he thought, the best security for the inspector doing his duty.

Clause struck out.

Clause 29 (Public Exposure of Diseased Cattle).

MR. MITFORD said, that in his neighbourhood there were commons extending far and wide over the whole of the county. The farmers had the right of turning their cattle upon these commons, and it would be desirable in a subsequent clause to give them the means of ingress and egress to those places. Unless some further restrictions were, however, proposed, there would be a chance of an infected animal finding its way to these commons and propagating the disease through the whole of the county. He ventured to hope that the Home Secretary and his hon. Friend (Mr. Hunt) would see whether they could not prevent infected cattle finding their way to these commons.

Clause struck out.

Clause 31 (Expenses of Local Authority).

MR. CARNEGIE said, that as the Committee had decided to adopt the slaughter and compensation principle the country would have to carry it out. He objected to the Government scheme of raising the money with which to pay the compensation as being unjust and unsound in principle. If the country wanted a man's cow, the country ought to pay for it. When the country required private property, public buildings such as the National Gallery the country paid for it; and if the country wanted cattle from the stockholder the country ought to pay for it. By the Government proposition the assessment would fall the heaviest on those districts that had suffered the most, and those districts that had escaped the disease would escape altogether. Ireland as a breeding country would be benefited by it and ought to assist in the expense. Some counties, like that which he represented, were so thoroughly infected by the disease that he doubted whether the Act would be of much service to them. The cattle plague, however, was a consumer's as well as a producer's question, and he saw no reason why the consumer should not bear his share of the loss. It was urged that local rating would prevent fraud and carelessness, but he thought that might be attained without putting the whole of the expense on the local rates. It was competent to him to move to take money from the Consolidated Fund, suggested that if his Amendment be carried the clause should be struck and the Chancellor of the Exchequer bring forward a Bill, by which the should be provided out of the Consolidated Fund in the first instance, and afterwards by such sanction as might be thought expedient by the House. It was also desirable to have a Bill passed as speedily as possible to prevent the spread of the disease, though he thought it would be better not to engraft the Bill with the compensation clause, but let them form the subject of another Bill. This Bill was said to have been brought forward on the principle of justice, instead of that it would inflict injustice, carried with it the seeds of rebellion. It was but natural that counties which were highly assessed should endeavour more to keep down the rate to stamp out the disease, and the costly experiment would become a failure. He moved to strike out the "local rate."

MR. BARROW said, he thought the person who drew up the Bill must have assumed that by a local rate the rate would be understood, whereas a rate could be levied only under the provisions of an Act of Parliament specifying thereto. The clause should, therefore, be amended so as to authorise quarter sessions to levy a special rate under the name of a cattle rate.

MR. AYRTON said, that before his Amendment was put he had an opportunity to propose to an earlier part of the clause. It was worthy of consideration whether they ought to raise a rate which was to be levied on the particular county which had been visited with this heavy misfortune. He had been much impressed by the speech of the hon. Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Stuart Mill), because that hon. Gentleman had given adequate reasons why such a rate should be imposed. There was a very large number of stock-owners in the metropolis, and the owners of dairies there had suffered having had the infection introduced into their herds because we had an unregulated trade in cattle for the benefit of the community, he could not understand why on that account those dairies should be taxed for the benefit of the community. It seemed to him that there might rather be special reaexempting the owners of stock; but he disliked making distinctions in such matters, and preferred that they should be treated as common to all classes. He conceived that in principle the proposed charge should be a national charge. But in practice it could not be so; for the simple reason that they must give power to the local authorities, who must, therefore, be restrained in its exercise by having to bear the consequences. But for that necessity, he should contend that there would be no justice whatever in creating any local charge of the kind. The metropolis, which had done so much to diffuse the plague, and which was so much interested in the cheapness of meat, was as much concerned in the question as the farmers and landowners, and ought to bear its share of the burden. But, on the other hand, if the local authorities had the control of the money of the metropolis they would act differently from what they would do if they were themselves made responsible. He was therefore in favour of the area of taxation being co-extensive with the area of administration. He moved the omission of the words "as to two-third parts thereof" in order to raise the question.

MR. J. STUART MILL said, the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) had referred to some remarks of his with reference to this subject, and as, in all probability through his own (Mr. Mill's) fault, the hon. and learned Member had not seized the point of his argument, he hoped he might be allowed, with the permission of the Committee, to repeat the substance of what he then said. The hon. and learned Member had laid down a principle which no one could dispute—namely, that taxation ought not to be partial. On that ground he urged that a particular class ought not to be taxed to defray the expense of compensation for the consequences of a calamity by which they had already suffered to so great an extent. But his (Mr. Stuart Mill's) argument was grounded expressly on this—that although they suffered more immediately, they would not ultimately suffer more than the rest of the community who were consumers of food. It followed that if they were now to tax the whole of the community in order to give a special indemnity to that class for what they suffered, they would, instead of taxing them, tax the rest of the community in order to relieve them. That was his argument, and nothing he had heard had tended to weaken it; and,

consequently, that part of the provision for compensation to which the hon. and learned Member objected, the poll tax on cattle, was the only part which he considered sound in principle. It appeared to him that the valid claim for compensation was not for the burden, but for the inequality of the burden, inasmuch as some cattle owners suffered much less than others, and some not at all. The class on whom the calamity had immediately fallen would, as a class, be compensated in the natural course of things, by the increased price of meat consequent on the diminished supply; but the individuals of the class who had not suffered at all, or who had suffered less than their neighbours, should contribute for the relief of those who had not been so fortunate. In principle, therefore, the tax, whatever it might be, ought to be a rate on land only. Although the clause as it stood was very objectionable, it would be made still more so by the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster, showed a great difference between practical and political economical views. To throw the whole burden of the cattle plague upon the land might be in accordance with deep political economical views, but he could not see how the landowner could be ultimately benefited by that. He (Mr. B. Cochrane) considered it unjust that agriculturists should have to bear the whole of the burden, and it was only right and fair that a portion of the charge should be borne by the Consolidated Fund. He denied that by relieving the counties they would act with indiscretion or extravagance, or show any want of vigilance; and he ventured to say, though the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not seem to concur in his views, that the principle best to be adopted in events of national calamity was for the whole country to sympathize with the sufferers. This was a calamity which he ventured to predict, whatever it was now, would in the end become universal, and he thought it was only just to all interests that a portion of the burden should be borne by the Consolidated Fund. That was the spirit in which they had dealt with the distress in Ireland, and with other great public calamities. A sufficient stimulus to careful management on the part of the local authorities would be guaranteed by casting the rest of the charge upon them.

Mr. EVANS said, it was not for him to object to the Motion, but he thought it only due to his constituents, the people of South Derbyshire, to say that they have not asked to have this charge thrown on the Consolidated Fund. They were willing to have it put on the county rate, and some of those with whom he had spoken did not object to a tax on cattle.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he apprehended that any proposal to put this charge on the Consolidated Fund would find an impediment in the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He concurred with the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) that it would be better to have the charge laid on the county rate than to set up the complicated system of a cattle tax. The effect of this cattle disease was prospective, and the fear of it discouraged farmers from the investment of money in any kind of stock. Now, clearly it was our interest not to discourage them still more. On the contrary, all of us were deeply interested in keeping up the breeding of stock. A man who now proposed to invest capital in a dairy farm would be regarded as mad. Already the very high price of milk in the metropolis, and in other large towns, had led to this result—that those who had milch cows were knocking all the calves on the head. These young animals were being destroyed by the thousand. This would have a considerable effect on the future supply of beef. He asked the House to consider where the county rate came from. It was a rate raised exclusively from real property. Trade profits or stock-in-trade did not pay it. It was contributed to by schedules "A" and "B," a fact which ought to satisfy hon. Gentlemen that in the country districts it would come out of the land. And in towns who paid it? The employers of labour. The manufacturers paid it on their own houses and the places in which they carried on their business; but they did not pay it on their trades. One great objection to the proposed tax was the machinery for its collection. It was proposed to collect it in the same manner as the tax on horses was collected—one was to pay on the greatest number of cattle kept within the year; but it was to be remembered that cattle were more like £5 notes than horses in that respect, so often did they change hands. An enormous proportion of the cattle of this country were reared on the hills of Scotland and the mountains of Wales, and afterwards bought up by dealers. Then as to the equality of the tax. A short-horned yearling might be worth five guineas, while a Scotch or Welsh might not be worth as many shillings. Who would be the last person to object to the proposed tax merely for the benefit of landed interest. He did so because he thought that charging the compensation on the county rate would be better for the entire community.

Mr. J. B. SMITH said, that the disease was a national calamity, and the clause dealt with it as if it were a calamity. He was afraid it would blow over in six weeks as some said, but its effects might be felt for some time. It was perfectly just that those who were to be slaughtered for public use should be compensated. The question was, out of what fund the compensation be paid? The proposal before the Committee was to pay the tax only on those counties where the disease prevailed. But besides this taxation could be no doubt the people in the affected counties would have to bear the burden in the advanced price of meat. Some hon. members anticipated that the price of meat might rise to double its present price. He would not disguise his apprehension that it would rise to a price which would be only limited by the ability of the people to consume it; but if this clause passed to compensate farmers for the slaughter of their cattle out of the Consolidated Fund, a double burden will be laid upon the people by being obliged to pay for the means by which the meat will be raised. It was quite true that in those parts of the country where no disease existed the farmers were greatly benefited by the advanced price of cattle. They would be in circumstances of prosperity in consequence of the adversity of their neighbours, while by this Bill they would be exempted from the payment of county rates or other taxes whatever. It appeared to him that the only way to meet the calamity would be, not to impose a fine taxation for compensation to the unfortunate counties where the disease existed, and thus tax the people twice, but to lay a tax upon all the cattle in the kingdom. Such a plan would be justly with all interests. Farmers would be compensated for such of their cattle as were slaughtered for public use, and the remainder would be able to command higher prices; while those farmers were so fortunate as to have suffered nothing from the disease would be great gainers by the rise of price in cattle, after having recouped themselves for their contributions to the cattle rate. This would be in accordance with the course followed in Poland under the visitation of a similar calamity. From the reports forwarded a short time back by the British Consul at Warsaw, it appeared that a law had been made enacting that all suspected animals should be slaughtered indiscriminately, and the objects most likely to spread the disease destroyed or purified. The application of this enactment was intrusted to local committees composed of landed gentlemen who had the strongest possible interest in checking the contagion, which was apparently an entire departure from the custom of intrusting the execution of laws to Government functionaries so general on the Continent. The committees, it was further stated, had acted with great zeal, and were authorized to grant compensation to proprietors of stock slaughtered by their orders, the funds for that purpose being levied by means of a rate imposed on the entire cattle of the country. It seemed to him that that was the only just principle to adopt, and that the present plan would be most unjust, since it went to tax those who had sustained serious loss, and exempted those who had sustained none at all. What was this but saying, "To him that hath shall be given, but from him that hath little shall be taken away even that which he hath."

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that without saying whether he should or should not vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), he would suggest to the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Carnegie) that a different mode might be adopted of arriving at the result he wished—namely, the deciding what was the best mode of raising the fund for compensation. The hon. Member for Forfarshire proposed to leave out the words "local rate." Now, if the hon. Gentleman merely left out those words, he would surround the question with some degree of confusion. He would therefore ask the hon. Gentleman if he would object to alter the clause by inserting the words

"Shall be defrayed, two-thirds thereof out of the local rate as defined by this Act, and the remaining one-third out of such monies as are provided by Parliament for that purpose."

If the hon. Gentleman had no objection to adopt the suggestion, he for one would go into the lobby and vote for that proposal. He agreed with the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith) that the cattle plague was a national misfortune, and he could not think it was either just or expedient to raise any part of the compensation fund by a rate on cattle. He thought the hon. Baronet the Member for Petersfield (Sir William Jolliffe) had already disposed of that point. He had, however, no objection whatever to a large portion of the funds being provided by a rate on the rateable property of the country. The money would be locally administered, and therefore it was but fair that a large portion should be paid by owners of property. Still, the misfortune was a national one. There was not a man, woman, or child who would not suffer for it. He submitted, therefore, to the Committee that a portion of the compensation fund ought to come out of the general revenues of the country. In conclusion, he would ask the hon. Member for Forfarshire whether he had any objection to raise the question fairly by adopting the Amendment which he had proposed.

MR. CARNEGIE said, he was much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for having made the proposal, and would cordially accept the suggestion. He believed, however, that the Motion now before the House would necessarily take precedence of it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have on various occasions during these debates recommended the spirit of mutual compromise. I may refer, as a proof that we are animated by this spirit, to the course taken by the Government in acquiescing in the vote of last night. The principle, however, affirmed in that Resolution has its limits, and the hon. Baronet the Member for Petersfield (Sir William Jolliffe) has done me no more than justice in supposing that I should not be disposed to consent to a charge on the Consolidated Fund. To adopt a measure of that kind at a moment's notice is manifestly impossible, and I feel that so strongly that I think it is only fair that I should make this statement in the discharge of my public duty. It would be a thing so novel, so inexpedient, so unexpected, so entirely in the nature of a surprise after what has taken place in this House, that the rapid passage of these enactments would be thereby made entirely impossible. It is necessary to import into the consideration of this question motives of policy very broad and very deep in their character, such as could not possibly be disposed of at a moment's notice. I shall enter upon the subject more fully if the proposal comes to the subject of substantive consideration in discussing the latter part of the clause. The question at present before the House is that raised by my hon. Friend (Mr. Ayrton) with respect to the cattle rate, and his proposal is that the whole of this amount should be raised out of the local rate. Now the question between cattle rate and local rate is an entirely different question from that of the local rate on the one hand and the Consolidated Fund on the other. My hon. Friend has himself stated several objections to contributing towards the compensation of cattle owners out of the general revenues of the country, and the Royal Commission took a strong view of the subject. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), stated that the principle of local administration is radically involved in this measure, and it is absolutely necessary for its success that these funds should be of a local character. The present question, however, is, whether any portion of the funds should be raised by a cattle rate. A great authority on the subject is present in the House, and we shall be glad to hear his opinion. The Government, however, made the proposal in the Bill on what appeared to us to be good and sufficient grounds. We thought the charging a portion upon cattle was, as far as justice was concerned, a measure the most exactly just which could be adopted. On the other hand, we were met by the objection that the owners of cattle have no special representatives as distinguished from other agriculturists or from other owners of rateable property. But it undoubtedly appeared to us that there is a very special interest of local cattle owners involved in this question. It is very true that the object of this Bill is not compensation for losses; but, although that is not its object, the operation of the Bill, should it be successful, will be, to a very great extent, to give compensation for losses. With regard to the clauses having reference to the sums to be paid for cattle which are slaughtered, we have, rightly or wrongly, adjusted them in such a manner as we think will tend to draw within their operation the whole of the diseased cattle which shall hereafter become subject to the provisions of the Bill. That being so, the operation of the Bill will be to a certain extent to give compensation for losses. With regard to compensation I think, as the hon. Member for Westminster has said, that the cattle owners are not suffering. That expression, though it caused some surprise in the House, appeared to me to be little more than the enunciation of a truism. There can, however, be no doubt that individual owners are suffering extremely, but as a class they are not. All have an interest in stopping the progress of the disease. But who are they who have the greatest interest? They are the cattle dealers in the neighbourhood of the infected places. I must confess that that does appear to me, considering the rate as a local rate, to be a strong argument for placing a part of the charge on the cattle owners. My hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith) proposes to impose a tax on all the cattle in the country. Would he tax the cattle of Ireland? [Mr. J. B. SMITH: No.] That is one exception. Would he tax the cattle of Wales? [Mr. J. B. SMITH: Yes.] The hon. Member says he would. The hon. Member says that the cattle owners of Wales, or, at least, of the greater part of Wales, ought to be brought in to share in the calamities of Cheshire. I confess I feel doubtful about the justice of that proposition. It so happens that the cattle owners of Wales are in a peculiar position. With two counties in Wales I am intimately acquainted—Flintshire and Denbighshire. Now, those two counties, with Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, Cheshire, and Forfarshire, have suffered more severely, perhaps, comparing size and head of cattle, than any other counties in the country. There is a large extent of country entirely untouched, and it is a curious fact, as I am informed, that during the twelve years of the cattle plague in the eighteenth century, nine out of those ten counties were never touched. I congratulate the Welsh Members with all my heart that the only county that was touched was Montgomeryshire—a county bordering upon the infected English counties. The two counties that now suffer so severely suffered severely then—Montgomeryshire, which lies close by Shropshire, and Denbighshire. I am by no means clear about the equity of laying upon the cattle owners of a district a burden which it has not pleased Providence to lay upon them; but that is a matter which may be open to discussion. When these questions come to be considered, I am not sure that we can find community of interest with the other cattle owners among the cattle owners of those parts of Wales which appear to be defended from incursion of the disease by peculiarity of soil, if not of climate, or by the great limestone range. To me it is quite clear we must not consider a national cattle rate as an escape from all the difficulties of the case. The practical objections urged by the hon. Baronet (Sir William Jolliffe) would, of course, be greatly extended in their operation, if the plague be considered as national. Those more happily circumstanced would not be very well pleased at being brought in. This proposition may fairly stand on the principle of the special interest of those cattle owners who are in the immediate neighbourhood of infection. And in that view it is perfectly just, and quite conformable to the principles of the Bill. I do not presume to say that this is a matter upon which we are entitled to form any conclusive opinion; but the ground of special interest induced us to include this proposition. I believe, also, that we gain another important object, the prevention of what would be a great misfortune in this case, a battle between town and country. There is reason to fear that if this subject were not managed in this way a conflict might arise which would waste valuable time we are anxious to spare. We were further encouraged to include it by what happened on the first night of the Session, when, immediately after the excellent speeches of the Mover and the Seconder of the Address, a Gentleman (Mr. Banks Stanhope), who has often and justly been honoured with the confidence of his party, the representative of a most important agricultural district (North Lincolnshire), rose to introduce the whole subject of the cattle plague, and on behalf, as we thought, of many of those among whom he sat, distinctly proposed a rate of a two-fold character to be levied on property and on cattle. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) makes a particular appeal to our compassion on the part of the farmers of that part of London. He thinks they have been specially exposed to contamination by the free trade in cattle carried on among them. Without entering into the vexed question, entirely unsolved, whether the plague was imported from abroad, I must say that rumour has been extremely unjust to the farmers of that part of London, if it be true that they gave no encouragement to a disease like this. They certainly have not a reputation for the cleanliness, the airiness, and the ventilation of their cattle sheds, which are supposed to contribute materially to the extension or the extinction of disease. However, this is not a matter which affects the question under consideration. I have stated generally the reasons which induced the Government to include the proposal in the Bill, and trust the House will accept it.

MR. LOWE: As to the battle, Sir, between town and country I may say Graid pandetur ab urbe, which I will translate freely—"the case for the country is taken up by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets." My right hon. Friend has adopted the arguments of the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) who is, I am afraid, a little too clever for us in the House. He reasons with a degree of closeness and refinement which some of us, at least, are not quite accustomed to. I must, however, though in fear and trembling, try to analyse a part of his speech to see what we can make of it. If I misrepresent him I hope he will correct me, because he is really difficult to comprehend, but as I understand him, he says:—As a class, owners of cattle are not sufferers by the rinderpest; individuals may suffer but the class will not, because the class will be indemnified by the higher prices that will be obtained owing to the losses and the consequent diminution of supply—I hope that is a slight mistake—and as the producers, taken as a class, sustain no loss, and the whole loss must fall upon consumers, therefore the consumers, who bear the whole loss, ought not to be called upon to pay any more quid consumers, but the loss ought to be met by the producing class. Let us look at this argument for a moment. In the first place, it has in it that error which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was too acute not to feel, in spite of his general agreement with it. It is founded on the fallacious assumption that this is a mere question of indemnity. But it is no question of indemnifying people for losses. It is a question of paying men with a view to getting rid of the cattle plague. Where does the hon. Gentleman find, in any work of political economy, that in a case like the present, where great losses are incurred by a class which losses diminish the supply of a certain article, that necessarily the class will be indemnified by increased prices? Where is the unit on which he bases the calculation—where is the common measure? Is it true that the English cattle producer will gain on account of these raised prices? Has he not powerful competitors, and will not advanced prices increase an importation of 10,000 head of cattle to 20,000? That which is to be the indemnification of the English cattle dealer will have to be divided with all Europe, and some of the money will go to transatlantic producers. It seems to me that no supposition can be more unfounded than this, that the losses of individuals will thus, of necessity, be made up. At least, you cannot call upon a class, in consideration of profits they have not yet made, to indemnify individuals, while the rest of the community stand by with their hands folded and do nothing. Suppose I am wrong, and grant that the hon. Gentleman's position is sound and that the producer loses nothing and the whole loss falls on the consumer, is that a reason why the consumer should not make every exertion in his power to prevent that loss? The object is to avert future loss, and future loss, not on behalf of a class, but on behalf of a whole community. As the loss must fall on the whole community, is it reasonable that the community should stand by and say—we will not stir a finger to prevent it? Is it not a more reasonable inference that, as the loss is to fall on the consumers, they ought to come forward in a body to bear it? Therefore, if I grant this principle it seems to me that it proves exactly the contrary of what was deduced from it. As to the simple question before us, I cannot understand the argument that those districts which suffer shall pay, and that those that escape shall contribute nothing. The question before the House is this—shall there be one simple rate, or shall it be divided into two-thirds from one source and one-third from another. The Chancellor of the Exchequer wishes to put it on cattle, and I could understand the right hon. Gentleman if he took the proposition of the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. J. B. Smith). But the proposition is that the districts already visited, or which hereafter may be visited, by the cattle plague, shall be taxed. The districts which may be visited by the cattle plague are to be trebly taxed—first, by the devastation of the scourge; secondly, by the county rate, which more fortunate districts will not pay; and thirdly, by the contribution of a percentage per head on those cattle which the plague has spared. It seems to me that these propositions ought to conciliate nobody, that this is the last quarter from which assistance should be sought in such an emergency, and that the best plan is to take the broadest view. In taxation you cannot go into refinements and minute subdivision of burdens, and similar considerations. We are seeking to avert a great national calamity, which must fall heavily on all. Let us all contribute to this special rate, as we pay our other rates. If you claim exemption, you might as well say that because a gentleman and his family are free from madness, he ought not to be taxed to pay for a lunatic asylum. Besides, this is a new tax in a Bill that is to be in force for only six weeks. You are going to impose a new tax for which you have no machinery—for which you have no statistics. You do not know the number of animals—it would be a fluctuating quantity day by day; you do not know whether the rinderpest will not be beforehand with you, and take away the very basis upon which the cattle tax would be levied. Well, then, on the other hand, we have our regularly assessed tax, and you are only asked to add to what you are in the habit of paying. It is only temporary, a matter of six weeks, and is it not better to do it by the machinery we have than resort to one of the most invidious and unfair things in the world? I entirely go with the argument of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), that in this case we ought not to go into abstract considerations of justice. It is absolutely necessary that the money which we expend should be most carefully expended—more carefully than any other, because it may become a double prodigality. If people are careless and remiss, they will first of all slaughter cattle which ought not to be slaughtered, and then pay for them. Therefore, you require a check upon them, and what check so good as that those who order the slaughter should feel that they themselves will have to pay for it?

MR. J. STUART MILL: As the arguments of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe) derive great weight from his knowledge, his character, and his talents, it seems desirable that anything which can be said in reply should be said as soon as possible, and while the impression of his arguments is still fresh. I think what is necessary may be said in a very few sentences. My right hon. Friend thinks it a complete answer to the arguments which I submitted to the notice of the House, to say that the object of the tax is not compensation, but to give a motive to the farmer to declare the disease. Now, Sir, I really think that the motive held out to the farmer to make this disclosure does not depend on the quarter from whence the compensation comes, but on the compensation itself. I should like to know whether, if the farmer receives £20 or any other sum for his beast, it makes any difference in the motive held out to him whether it is paid from a cattle tax, or from the county rate, or out of the Consolidated Fund. In the next place, my right hon. Friend stated that the scarcity of a commodity does not always raise the price in full proportion to the deficiency in the quantity. Well, Sir, that is very true, but it is also an extremely common thing that the effect should be to raise the price a great deal beyond the proportion of the loss, and the case in which this is peculiarly known to happen is when the article in deficiency is one of food. Take, for instance, the commodity which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) has brought forward into the prominence which belongs to it, the article of milk. In the case of milk, an article which is of first necessity to even the poorest people in the country, it is hardly conceivable that a scarcity should take place without raising the price immeasurably beyond the proportion of the loss. In the next place, my right hon. Friend thought it an extremely unreasonable thing in me to neglect and leave out of sight that portion of the supply of cattle which comes by importation. He said I did not mention it on a former occasion. Sir, I did mention it, and referred to it in a most special manner. And the answer which I made then I make now, in the words which my right hon. Friend himself quoted—de minimis non curat lex, the quantity imported being so small in proportion to the whole supply. There is one more point in my right hon. Friend's speech which I would wish to notice. He asked, "Is it not absurd that because a man or any of his family is not mad, he should object to being taxed for a lunatic asylum?" I ask, is there any economical law by which the patients of a lunatic asylum are compensated for the expense of their maintenance in that asylum? If there is, the cases are parallel; if not, not.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, he thought it his duty to state that, in his opinion, the Government proposition was, on the whole, the best. If there was time he would have guarded himself against ac-quiescing in the view taken by the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) which he considered neither sound in principle nor fair. He agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this Bill must be more or less in the nature of a compromise, and though it was quite fair to press the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), that this was a national calamity which ought to be met out of the national funds, nevertheless he could not disguise from himself that this payment of compensation was something in the nature of a compulsory insurance, and it was right therefore, so far as that was the case, that it should be raised by a rate-in-aid. In stating his view of it, as an insurance, he wished to guard himself from being supposed to acquiesce in the proposal that the money so raised by rate should be applied to retrospective compensation. As to that he would suggest that it should be thrown on the Consolidated Fund. With respect to prospective compensation, the burden on the whole should be a national one, and the only objection was the difficulty of watching it. It was, therefore, right in order to meet this objection to throw the burden on the local taxation, and to let the machinery be managed by the local authorities. The mode, therefore, in which the Government had met the difficulty by a cattle rate was, in his opinion, the best.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the retrospective clause was left out of the Bill.

MR. ACLAND said, he felt so strongly the force of what had been said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the burdens which ought to be borne by the immediate neighbours of owners of cattle in the infected districts, that if it were not complicating the question he should be disposed to advocate a special charge upon the highway board districts or Poor Law union districts immediately adjoining the localities where infection prevailed. The great objection to the plan, he feared, was that it would prove impracticable.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, the questions principally raised in the course of the debate have been—first, whether compensation should come from national or local funds, and next, assuming that the compensation is to come out of local funds, whether it should be provided wholly by a county rate, or partly by a county rate and partly by a cattle plague rate. I must do the agricultural interest the justice to say that, as a body, it has repudiated any claim on the national funds. The Royal Agricultural Society distinctly did so, and suggested that a Bill should be prepared giving authority to levy funds for the purposes of compensation by a county rate. The deputation from St. James' Hall were silent as to the funds out of which compensation ought to come, but individual members of the deputation expressed themselves in favour of funds locally collected and locally administered, and not one of them asked for any grant from the national funds. I am glad to find that the hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Sir William Heathcote), whose opinion on this subject is entitled to much weight, entertains the opinion that theoretically the proposal that part of the burden should be borne by a rate on cattle is a just one. No doubt, however, when we come to the machinery for carrying out such an arrangement a good deal of difficulty presents itself. With the limited time at our disposal it would be impossible to ascertain the feeling of the country generally upon the point. Under all the circumstances, and after what they found to be the feeling of the House, the Government are disposed to withdraw the proposal as to the cattle plague rate, leaving the whole expense to be provided out of the county rate.

On Question, That the words "as to two-third parts thereof" stand part of the clause, Resolved in the Negative:—Words struck out.

MR. CARNEGIE moved a further Amendment in Clause—namely, that for the words "two-thirds" the words "three-fourths" should be substituted, with the view of adding "and the remaining one-fourth shall be defrayed from money provided by Parliament for that purpose."

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he could not accept the Amendment, because if any portion of the money were to be provided by Parliament it must clearly come out of the Consolidated Fund, and upon that question the House had just expressed its opinion very clearly.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he agreed with the right hon. Baronet (Sir George Grey) that the question had been virtually decided. The fund, however, was erroneously called a compensation fund, since it was provided solely to enable the State to get possession of cattle which for the public benefit it believed ought to be destroyed. In point of principle, however, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lowe) and his right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) were perfectly right. When a great public calamity was met in the way in which this was proposed to be met, and when cattle belonging to individuals were taken for the purposes of the State, according to strict principle the State and not particular classes ought to pay the money requisite for the acquisition of the cattle.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, he would read a passage from a letter written by one of the deputation who had waited upon the Home Secretary. It was to the following effect:—

"It was thought by many of us who lost our cattle, that aid would have been granted from the Consolidated Fund for all cattle destroyed in the public interest, or that loans would have been granted to sufferers. But the principle of compensation from local rates is something like compensating the left from the right hand pocket. We poor sufferers have first to find the money and then to distribute it among ourselves."

That letter expressed the opinion of one of the most intelligent agriculturists in the kingdom.

MR. CARNEGIE said, he felt very strongly upon the point; but, under the circumstances, he would not put hon. Members to the trouble of dividing.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Amendment to omit the words "and as to remaining one-third part thereof out of the cattle rate hereinafter provided,"

MR. BARING objected to the Amendment. To meet the views of the hon. Member for Nottinghamshire, he moved that at the end of the clause the following words be inserted:—

"Every local authority shall have power, notwithstanding any limit in any Act of Parliament, to levy a local rate of the amount required for the purposes of this Act; but any rate or increase of rate levied under this section shall in all precepts for the levy thereof be described as a separate rate, or a separate item rate; and when collected from the individual ratepayers it shall be collected as a separate rate, or specified as a separate item of rate."

Amendment negatived.

Amendment (Mr. Baring) agreed to.
Words added to the clause.

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE said, that in nearly all the counties in which the cattle plague had broken out subscriptions had been raised for the relief of the persons who had lost their cattle. He considered that now, when a general rate was about to be struck, the sums previously subscribed by individuals ought to be taken into consideration. He therefore moved that the following words be added to the 31st clause:—

"In the case of counties which, previous to the passing of this Act, had entered into a voluntary assessment on account of the Cattle Plague, it shall be in the discretion of the local authority to consider such assessments as have been paid previous to the passing of the Act as part and portion of the cattle rate under this Act, and to make regulations accordingly."

MR. BARING said, he hoped the hon. Member would withdraw the Amendment, and allow him to propose a clause in which the particular question would be met. As the proposal stood it would compensate owners not only for cattle destroyed, but for cattle that had died. In reply to the question of an hon. Member as to the definition of local authorities for the purposes of the Act, municipal boroughs, having a separate quarter sessions, would be constituted a separate local authority, while all other boroughs would form part of the county in which they were situate.

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE said, that in order to alleviate the difficulty suggested by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baring), he would strike out the word "accordingly," and add to his Amendment the words "consistent with the purposes of this Act."

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, that no Member of the Government had stated how the rate was to be collected. If it was to be collected as a separate rate by overseers of the poor, it would throw great additional labour on unpaid officials.

MR. BARING said, he thought he could suggest an addition to the 33rd clause which would meet the difficulty mooted.

MR. BARROW said, he was afraid these additions would complicate the Act. He would suggest that such a matter as that under consideration be left to the discretion of the local authorities. He was himself a contributor in two different districts, and desired no reduction under the provisions of the Act. He thought it would be better that the rate should be a special county rate rather than a local rate. It would then fall in the ordinary course of collection.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the rate would be collected in the ordinary way.

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE said, as the Committee appeared to be against it, he would withdraw his Amendment, but hoped the Government would recognize the voluntary assessments which had been made, and insert such provisions in the Bill as would infer commendation of the high spirit which had dictated these voluntary assessments.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he thought some consideration should be had for the inhabitants of those counties where they had endeavoured to assess themselves. They ought to encourage the spirit of self-reliance among the farmers. If some such Amendment as was proposed were not passed, the Act would offer a premium to those who had done nothing to do the same under similar circumstances at some future time.

SIR ANDREW AGNEW said, he concurred with the last speaker's observations. The provision came quite within the spirit of the Act.

MAJOR WALKER said, that at the present time the process of destroying animals and paying compensation for them was being carried out most successfully by voluntary arrangement in several counties. If, however, a doubt were created in the minds of those so associated as to whether the money they had subscribed would be credited to them in respect of the compulsory assessment which it was proposed to make, an end would be immediately put to the most effectual machinery at present in work for the purpose of stamping out the disease. These funds were raised in anticipation of the passing of this Bill, and the gentlemen who advanced them ought to be repaid. It was obvious that, as some weeks would elapse before the Royal Assent could be given to the Bill, the event he had described as possible would be most disastrous in its results if it were permitted to occur.

MR. BARING said, he quite agreed with the hon. and gallant Member. If the hon. Member behind him (Mr. Waldegrave-Leslie) would withdraw his Amendment, he would propose the one he had already referred to. He believed it would be found to meet the case more effectually.

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause amended, as follows, and agreed to. [cl. 18.]

"All Expenses incurred by a Local Authority in pursuance of this Act, including any Compensation payable by it in respect of Animals slaughtered in pursuance of this Act, shall be defrayed out of the Local Rate as defined by this Act, or out of a separate Rate to be levied in all respects in the same Manner as the Local Rate, and included under the Term 'Local Rate.' Any Person who is not the Owner of the Premises in respect of which he is rated, under this Section, to the Local Rate may deduct from the growing Rent due to the Owner of such Premises One Half of the Rate payable by him for the Purposes of this Act, and every Owner shall allow such Deduction accordingly. 'Owner' for the Purposes of this Section shall mean the Person for the Time being entitled to receive the Rackrent of the Premises in respect of which the Rate is made on his own Account, or who would be entitled to receive the same if such Premises were let at a Rackrent, including under the Term 'Rackrent' any Rent which is not less than Two Thirds of the net annual Value of the Premises out of which the Rent issues. Every Local Authority shall have Power, notwithstanding any Limit in any Act of Parliament, to levy a Local Rate to the Amount required for the Purposes of this Act, but every Rate or Increase of Rate levied under this Section shall in all Precepts for the Levy thereof be described as a separate Rate or separate Item of Rate, and when collected from the individual Ratepayers it shall be collected as a separate Rate or specified as a separate Item of Rate."

Clause 32 (Regulations as to Cattle Rate) struck out.

Clause 33 (Power to remit Rate in certain cases).

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID moved to leave out the words "in respect of which he is not entitled to receive any compensation under this Act."

SIR GEORGE GREY assented.

Words struck out.

MR. BARING moved to add the words—

"When within the District of any Local Authority any Sum has been raised by a voluntary Rate for the Purpose of paying for cattle slaughtered with a view of preventing the spread of the Cattle Plague, the Local Authority may, with the Consent of the Managers of such Voluntary Rate, after satisfying itself that the Rate or such Portion of the Rate as has been expended has been duly expended for the purpose aforesaid, and having received from such Managers the Balance of such Rate, if any, apply it to the purposes of this Act, and in such case the sums proved to the Satisfaction of such Local Authority to have been paid by any Person to such voluntary Rate, and to have been duly accounted for, shall be deducted from any Rate payable by such Person under the Provisions of this Act."

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that where there was no balance the Amendment would have no effect.

MR. HOWES said, there were associations to compensate farmers for cattle which died as well as those which were slaughtered, and he thought both ought to be included in the clause.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, there would be an opportunity upon the Report to see whether the clause, as amended, carried out the wishes of the House.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he feared that if voluntary subscriptions as well as voluntary rates were not recognized it would occasion much disappointment. In his county there was an association in which 7,000 cattle were entered. The disease broke out, and in one herd of seventy-three head of cattle, fifty-three died in three days. The farmers thereupon bought the whole herd and had them slaughtered on the spot. That was a very spirited thing on the part of the farmers, and was done for the public benefit. It was carrying out the object of the Bill, and he regretted that, as the clause now stood, those farmers would not participate in the benefit of the measure.

MR. BARING said, that where the case was one of rate the clause would apply, but not where the farmers had raised the money among themselves. In cases where counties had imposed a voluntary rate for the purpose of slaughtering cattle the parties would come in for the benefit of the Bill, but not in the case mentioned by his hon. and gallant Friend, where the farmers had contributed for the purpose of making up a loss. The clause would meet a certain number of cases, but not all.

MR. FELLOWES said, he understood that the clause would only apply to cases of slaughter, and not to those where the animals had died.

MR. BARING said, that was so.

Amendment agreed to.

Words added.

Clause, as amended, agreed to. [cl. 19.]

Clause 34 (Mode of levying and recovering assessments in Scotland).

THE LORD ADVOCATE moved to insert the words "and collected" after the word "assessed" in line 30.

Amendment agreed to. [cl. 21.]

Clause 35 (Mortgage of Rates).

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he rose for the purpose of fulfilling an engagement which he had made with his hon. Friends the Members for Cheshire. He was, however, compelled to fulfil the engagement in a somewhat different manner to that in which it appeared on the Votes. He had given notice of his intention of moving, on the consideration of Clause 37, the following addition:—

"But in any case where the local rate levied on the average of the said seven years for meeting the charges of this Act shall exceed sixpence in the pound, the Lords of the Treasury may, upon application from the Local Authority, extend the term to any term not exceeding fourteen years."

The notice was given somewhat hurriedly, and the addition could be better made in the present clause, and he should therefore move that that course be taken. In consequence, too, of the decision of the House upon the cattle rate, he should alter the "sixpence in the pound" to "ninepence in the pound," and he should further add the words—

"And the local authorities may mortgage or assign over the said rate for any term not exceeding fourteen years accordingly."

There were one or two other alterations, but they were merely of a verbal character.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he wished to know whether, by the proposed Amendments, the local authorities would be authorized to borrow the money for seven years, and then, if they desired it, to apply to the Lords of the Treasury for the further extension of time.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that as soon as the rate had exceeded the average of 6*d.* for the seven years the local authorities would be empowered to borrow money for that period, but when it exceeded 9*d.* they might borrow the money for the longer time.

Clauses 36 to 39 agreed to.

Clause 40 (Reports by Local Authority to Privy Council).

MR. BARING proposed to substitute for the clause as it stood the following:—

"Every Local Authority shall report to the Privy Council the state of the Cattle Plague in their district, and give such other information with respect to the Cattle Plague, in such form and at such time as the Privy Council may require."

MR. HENLEY said, he could not object to the Amendment if the information which was required was to be exclusively confined to the action of the cattle plague, and was not to be the revival of an old battle. But the words were so general that, as far as he could understand them, it was difficult to see that they might not be employed for the purpose of obtaining agricultural statistics. Such a point ought not to be gained by a sidewind. If that were the object, it should be avowed, and then the pros and cons could be argued fairly. They wanted to know the simple facts as to how many cattle had died, and how many cattle had been killed owing to the disease. The matter was rather a curious one, because as soon as the disease appeared the Board of Trade, so to speak, "improved the occasion," and endeavoured to obtain the statistics.

MR. BARING said, the words of the clause were so limited as to apply only to the obtaining of information "with respect to the Cattle Plague." In that way the objection of the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire was obviated. He had no wish to obtain other information than that he had specified.

MR. LIDDELL said, he thought it very important that they should have these agricultural statistics. They would form the basis of a system of insurance for stock. They insured their ships, their houses, and other property, but not their live stock. The reason for that, he believed, was because they had not the means of ascertaining the risk to live stock, owing to the want of proper statistics. He trusted that in this matter they would profit by their experience of the present calamity, and be led to adopt the practice of insuring cattle.

MR. DENT said, it was a great misfortune to the agricultural community that they had now such few reliable data on the subject. If agricultural statistics had been at hand the House would have been better able to deal with the question of the plague.

Motion agreed to.

Clause 41 (Purchase of Land for Burial of Diseased Animals).

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, that the general practice had been to bury the cattle where they died, and it was hardly necessary to establish cemeteries for them. The conveyance of the carcasses along the high road to such places might be the means of spreading the infection.

MR. WHALLEY said, he thought it could not be necessary always to purchase the land where the carcasses were to be interred. It would be sufficient if they hired it for a time, say on a lease for seven years.

MR. HUNT said, that those who visited, as he had done, the yards of the London dairymen would find that it was impossible to bury the animals where they died. What, then, was to be done with the carcasses? Some people objected to their being carted through the streets. Unless some compulsory power was given for acquiring burying places, by purchase or otherwise, he did not see where the animals were to be buried. They could not be thrown into the river. In accordance with the suggestion just made, he moved to insert the words "or hire."

MR. BARING said, he had no objection to insert the words "or hire" after "purchase." There were cases in which it was absolutely essential to acquire the use of land for this purpose.

The words "or hire" inserted.

Clause, as amended, agreed to. [cl. 26.]

Clause 42 amended, and agreed to.

Clause 43 (Cleaning trucks, &c.)

MR. BARING said, that if the conveyance of cattle by railway was to be prohibited that clause might be expunged.

MR. OWEN STANLEY said, he thought, having regard to the carriage of diseased meat, that the clause should be retained. He proposed an addition to the clause providing that a penalty should be imposed upon railway companies and others neglecting to cleanse conveyances used for the removal of carcasses.

MR. BARING said, that the Bill of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt), which would shortly be considered, contained a provision that would effect what was required by the hon. Gentleman.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he thought the railway companies had endeavoured to meet the wishes of the House in every possible way. The various companies had expressed their readiness at once to discontinue their traffic in live stock, and at some considerable inconvenience to take such steps as would enable them to convey dead meat to all parts of the country. Although not personally connected with railway companies, he was authorized to state that they were prepared to take efficient means for disinfecting their cattle trucks to the satisfaction of persons to be appointed by Government for the purpose of inspecting them. This it was their intention to do as soon as possible if left to themselves; and, perhaps, it would be sufficient now to enact that no truck which had been used for the conveyance of live cattle should again be used until it had been thoroughly cleansed and disinfected to the satisfaction of inspectors to be appointed by Government. It would savour of oppression to enact that they should not be used till after a given time.

Mr. Hunt

MR. HUNT said, he thought that the trucks should be registered by number.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he had no objection to the registration of the trucks. It was necessary to prevent the trucks from being used until they had been thoroughly cleansed and disinfected, as in all probability they would be used for the conveyance of dead meat. He understood that the Great Western Railway Company were now using cattle trucks for that purpose, the meat being hung up on bars, so as to insure a free circulation of air.

COLONEL DOUGLAS PENNANT said, he hoped that the railway companies would be compelled to cleanse the trucks immediately the cattle were removed from them. During the last winter he found it to be the practice on the London and North Western line to send empty cattle trucks in a filthy condition from all parts of England to Holyhead to bring away other cattle.

MR. OWEN STANLEY said, he had received that morning from the inspectors at Holyhead a list of fifty trucks which had been sent to different parts of England in a filthy condition, the floors being covered with cattle manure. Any person conversant with the cattle plague must know that there was the greatest danger of the disease being conveyed by the servants of the company in going from such trucks to a farm. Therefore, although he believed all railway directors to be "honourable men," and to be desirous of doing their duty, he hoped that the inspection of trucks would be placed in other hands.

MR. LIDDELL said, he thought Government should undertake to see that the trucks were kept in a proper condition, as the inspectors appointed by local authorities might be kept at bay by powerful railway companies.

COLONEL SYKES said, it was most essential that some clause of the kind proposed should be inserted in the Bill, as it was well known that the disease had been conveyed into Inverness shire by means of the straw litter in a railway truck.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that while forbidding absolutely the carriage of cattle by railway, the Committee had entirely omitted to deal with carriage by canal.

Clause struck out.

Clause 44 (Penalty for Disobedience of Act or Order).

MR. FELLOWES said, he thought the penalty should be raised from £5 to £10 in order to prevent farmers from moving their cattle in order to sell them at an advantage, and thus clearing more than the amount of the penalty.

MR. STONE moved the addition of the following words:—

“If any inspector, cattle overseer, or other officer appointed under the provisions of this Act, shall neglect any duties, or exceed, or wrongfully use any powers with which he is intrusted in pursuance of this Act, he shall for each offence incur a penalty not exceeding £20.”

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he thought that some hold should be kept over inspectors, as many instances of improper conduct on their part had come to his knowledge. In one case an inspector had bought diseased cattle which he had himself condemned from a farmer, and had sent them up to the Metropolitan Market.

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE said, he hoped the Under Secretary would agree to this Amendment. Farmers would thus be protected from excess of zeal on the part of inspectors.

MR. CARNEGIE said, that the amount of the fine was left permissive; and where a simple error of judgment had been committed probably no penalty whatever would be inflicted. But frequently there had been a gross neglect of duty. He had heard of a case in which a certificate for the removal of cattle had been given by an inspector for a glass of whiskey. He thought it well that the Bill should contain the power given by the Amendment.

MR. HUNT said, an inspector if he exceeded his duty would be liable to an action.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 45 to 47 agreed to.

Clause 48 (Recovery of Penalties).

MR. HUNT said, that the Bill made no provision as to the application of penalties. He thought it very desirable that, as to a portion, they should be paid over to the fund out of which compensation was to come. Under the general law they would be paid into the Treasury. The informer, he thought, should receive half the penalty, and the other half should go to the fund applicable to compensation.

MR. BARING said, the fines would go to the county rate under the Act of 1848.

MR. HUNT said, he was satisfied with that assurance.

MR. NEATE said, he wished to ask what became of the penalties under the Orders in Council.

MR. BARING said, he would answer that question to-morrow. He had to propose the addition of a Proviso to the clause—

“Any Railway Company or other body corporate may appear before any justice, sheriff, or sheriff substitute by any member of their board of management, or by any officer authorized in writing under the hand of any director or manager of the Company.”

MR. SHERRIFF said, that there were now, in various parts of England, tramways which might convey cattle, unless expressly enjoined not to do so. He therefore proposed to add the word tramway after railway.

MR. AYRTON said, he doubted very much whether the difference between a railway and a tramway could be stated. He thought the introduction of the words would create a difficulty.

Amendment to the Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion agreed to; Proviso added.

Clause, as amended, agreed to. [cl. 30.]

Clause 49 (Appeal).

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to urge that the recognizances of the parties themselves before the justices should be sufficient, and that they should not be called upon also to provide two sureties. He moved that the words “two sufficient sureties” should be omitted.

Amendment negatived.

[cl. 31.]

Clause 50 (Confirmation of Orders).

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he was in favour of the adoption of the principle of retrospective compensation. All he desired was that those persons whose animals had been slaughtered by an arbitrary law should not be deprived of their claim for compensation. They had postponed the clause for retrospective compensation, and until they had made sure that such a clause would be adopted they should not pass an indemnity clause. This was an indemnity clause, and he understood that the Lord Chancellor in another place had stated that the Privy Council had no legal right to issue orders for the slaughter of cattle. If that were so the law would grant compensation to the sufferers. Under these circumstances, he thought that the House ought not lightly to pass an indemnity clause like the present. He hoped that the Government would not object to the introduction of the following words, namely :—

“ That nothing herein contained shall prevent those persons whose cattle have been slaughtered by Orders of the Privy Council availing themselves of any remedy they might have under the existing law.”

MR. BARING said, that the powers given to the Lords of the Council under the Act 11 & 12 Vict. were couched in very vague terms, and it was therefore to prevent the litigation to which the local authorities, acting under the Orders of Council, might be subjected that the present clause was required. With respect to compensation for slaughtered cattle, the opinion of persons most competent to form a judgment on the subject was contained in the 18th clause of the Bill.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, he thought that if any of those persons whose cattle had been slaughtered had any doubt as to the right of the authorities to order the slaughter of cattle, they would have tried the question legally before this time. The introduction of the words would nullify the clause.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that all he desired was that whatever right those persons now might have by law should not be taken away from them.

MR. BARING said, he had great objection to the insertion of the proposed words, as they would hold out an inducement for persons immediately to commence actions, notwithstanding the opinion of persons eminent in the legal profession that they had no such legal claim as that suggested.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he did not believe that the claims of persons, whose cattle had been slaughtered, would be vitiated by the non-insertion of the proposed words. He thought the claims of such persons should be admitted, and suggested the postponement of the clause.

MR. HUNT said, he hoped that the words would not be inserted. He thought that the Government was justified in going to the very edge of the law, if not in extending the law under the emergency. He was anxious, therefore, to confirm the Orders, and he thought it most desirable to do so, for the sake of the magistrates who had acted under them.

MR. GOODSON said, that on the bringing up of the Report some clause should be introduced to protect the local authorities from any malicious or vexatious proceedings.

Lord Robert Montagu

MR. NEATE said, that those who suffered under the operation of the Orders in Council had the same right to receive compensation as those to whom Parliament was about to give it prospectively.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he had no wish to put the Committee to the trouble of dividing on the Question and would withdraw his Amendment, if the Under Secretary for the Home Department would promise, on the part of the Government, that they would endeavour to pass such a compensation clause as they themselves had suggested. As he before said, he did not wish to prevent the confirmation of the Orders, but he wished to establish the principle of retrospective compensation.

MR. HENLEY said, the Committee were in some difficulty in respect to this question. The clause which entitled the parties to compensation for the destruction of their cattle under the orders of the inspector, or other authority authorized by the Privy Council, and which had a retrospective effect, had been withdrawn, on the suggestion, he (Mr. Henley) believed, of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), on the ground that the fund out of which they were to be paid was not the proper fund, as stated in the clause. So far as he understood no definite promise had, however, been given to introduce another clause on the subject. He thought it the duty of the House to see that those parties whose cattle had been slaughtered for the public good by order of the inspectors should not be in a worse position than those whose cattle were to be slaughtered in future under the authority of this Bill. As no Cabinet Minister was present, it was extremely difficult for the Under Secretary of State (Mr. Baring) to give the necessary pledge that the case of these persons, who so willingly sacrificed their own interests in this matter, should be considered. The absence of any Member of the Cabinet was a strong reason for postponing the clause.

MR. BARING said, the reason why the Secretary for the Home Department was not present was that he was not well. He hoped the Committee would, under the circumstances, excuse any deficiency on his part, and agree to the postponement of the clause for a short time, when his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer would, in all probability, be in his place.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, every one must be sensible of the efficiency with which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baring) invariably discharged his duties in the House. He (Lord John Manners) thought that these unfortunate persons had a strong moral claim on the Government, and he hoped that when the clause was re-introduced their case would be adequately considered.

Clause postponed.

Clause 3 (Definition of Terms).

MR. BARING said, that as the clause then stood every municipal borough was an authority in itself; but he now proposed to amend it by the insertion of words which would make the clause only constitute as a separate authority any borough "which is not assessed to the county rate of any county by the justices of such county."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BARING said, he had another Amendment to propose, and in doing so he must apologize to the hon. Members for the City. The Bill had been changed in its character during its progress through Committee, and the Amendment which he was about to propose, as well as a corresponding Amendment in the schedule, had become necessary in consequence of the change which had been made in the Bill itself, which was now one simply for slaughtering and rating purposes. He assured his hon. Friends that nothing could be further from the intention of his right hon. Friend (Sir George Grey) than to do anything derogatory to the dignity and privileges of the City of London; but it had been represented to the Home Secretary by the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works that nothing could be more unfair to the whole metropolis than that the City, which was so large and wealthy a portion of it, should be entirely excepted from the operation of the clauses relating to the metropolis. At the same time, the Chairman assured the Government that nothing should be done by the Metropolitan Board, in which body the City of London was represented, to interfere with that dignity and those privileges. Indeed, it was manifest that the provisions of the Bill could be carried out only with the co-operation of the City police. The Amendment of which he had given notice would be in the last paragraph of the clause, which paragraph was in these words—

"The Metropolis shall include all Parishes and Places in which the Metropolitan Board of Works have Power to levy a Main Drainage Rate, with the exception of the City of London and the liberties thereof."

He proposed to omit all the words after the word "rate" with the object of including the City of London. A similar course had been taken in the case of the Fire Brigade Act and other cases, and by adopting the Amendment an inequality of rating within the metropolis would be avoided. He could only say he wished it had been in the power of the Secretary of State to give that notice of the Amendment which was due to the City of London and those who represented it; but it had been impossible to do so. It was to be remembered that in this Bill, without notice to the public, provisions had been introduced which might cause great inconvenience, and he had just proposed an Amendment in another portion of the clause which would affect every borough in the country.

Amendment proposed.

MR. CRAWFORD said, that when his hon. Friend asked him to agree to the Amendment he asked too much of him; because, representing in the House the privileges of the City of London, he must feel that such a proposition ought not to have been brought forward without notice. Undoubtedly, the change which the omission of those words would introduce in the government of the metropolis was a most important one. Up to that moment the City of London had been charged with carrying out the Orders of Council in reference to the cattle plague. It had its own officers and its own machinery for that purpose. Why, then, should its functions in the matter be suddenly taken away? He saw in the Amendment the thin edge of the wedge, which two or three years ago the Secretary of State had attempted to drive home. He had had no communication with the City, and did not feel competent to argue this question in defence of their rights without notice. Therefore, all he could do was to enter his protest and that of the City against the Amendment.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he concurred in what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London. It was due to the corporation of London that some notice should have been given to them of the proposed change in the framing of this clause, so as to have enabled them at least to have known what would be its effect on the privileges of the City and usages, which had existed from time immemorial. From a long professional experience he could state that the effect of the clause, if amended as proposed, would be to indirectly repeal a number of Acts of Parliament applicable to the City of London, and that it would interfere with the functions of its officers to an extent of which no one in the House could form an adequate idea. He urged on the Government the expediency and justice of giving the corporation an opportunity, before the Bill was passed into a law, of considering what might be done in order that some qualification or exception might be introduced into this total annihilation in law of the privileges of the City of London.

MR. AYRTON said, he should have thought, after the handsome appeal of his hon. Friend the Under Secretary, that this Amendment would be adopted without observation. He must say he was surprised that his hon. and learned Friend opposite should get up, and, investing himself with all the mystic knowledge which he had acquired in the twenty-five years during which he had been standing counsel to the City of London, should say that such legal mysteries were involved in this measure that the House did not know what it was doing. He, too, had studied the constitution of the City of London a good deal, in reference to the legislation of that House, and had thus acquired some knowledge of the imaginary difficulties floating in the mind of his hon. and learned Friend. Yet he ventured to say that there was not the smallest risk or danger of injuring anybody by accepting the clause now proposed. The principle of interference was established long since, with reference to the drainage and necessary improvements in the City. At the present moment the Metropolitan Board of Works was actually demolishing houses in the vicinity of the Mansion House, and they rightly had authority in the City, because the City, like the other metropolitan districts, was represented at the Board of Works. There was no reason why the City should claim exemption as a separate jurisdiction more than Marylebone or any other metropolitan parish. There would be an extraordinary speciality if the City were to be exempted from the operation of the clause. The metropolis at large was going to be taxed in consequence of what had been done in the Metropolitan Cattle Market, and consequently, if anything had been done wrong, the fault lay with the City of London. If any conclusion was to be drawn from that, it would be that the City should alone be taxed. He deprecated the position which his hon. and learned Friend had taken in endeavouring to frighten the House out of its propriety by raking up imaginary notions as to the supposed privileges of the corporation.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he rose to meet the arguments which had been brought forward to show that the City of London should be treated in a manner different to that observed with respect to the other local authorities specially described in the Bill. The object of the Bill was to provide means for the attempted suppression of that great scourge the cattle plague, and he apprehended that it was not in any way a measure to extend or to limit jurisdictions. He thought, therefore, that this was not the time to discuss whether the City of London ought to be included in the metropolis, or whether it ought to have its jurisdiction extended so as to include the whole metropolis. The question before the House was as to the best means of suppressing the cattle plague. The Bill reserved the rights of the Liberty of St. Alban's, the Liberty of the Isle of Ely, and the Stoke of Peterborough. Why, therefore, should not the rights of the City be reserved? The City of London had been carrying out the various Orders in Council most efficiently and satisfactorily. When this Bill was introduced, the various local authorities were described in it, and certainly the City could never have thought that almost at the last moment a Member of the Government would rise in his place and state that he thought it for the advantage of the metropolis that the Bill should be so altered as to deprive the City of London of the position which it had held for ages, and place it under the management of the Metropolitan Board of Works. What was still more marvellous was the proposal that the Board of Works should be assisted by means of the City police, who were paid by, and were under the control of, the City authorities. He thought that the City of London ought to be treated with fairness. It had at all times done its duty, but if the House should think its jurisdiction ought to be limited, that was a matter which ought to be introduced in a separate Bill, and not under the guise of a

Sir FitzRoy Kelly

Bill for the suppression of the cattle plague. The Under Secretary of State had said that he had made a great change in the Bill with respect to municipal boroughs, in order that they might not be taxed twice over; but he had proposed to make a change in regard to the City of London in order that he might obtain from it a larger amount. It was no argument whatever to say that because the City was called upon to pay a larger amount it should therefore be submerged and put under the management of the Metropolitan Board of Works. He was sure that the City of London would feel that they had been taken by surprise, for they had received no notice from the Government of such a change in the Bill. It was true that the City sent Members to the Board of Works, but the City had never been adequately represented there, according to its population and its rating. Indeed, it was never intended to place the City under the Board of Works like Marylebone and the other metropolitan boroughs. He thought that the City ought to have an opportunity of making known their opinion in this matter.

MR. LOCKE said, he considered his hon. Friend who spoke last had, although he was an Alderman of the City, spoken under a misapprehension as to the exact position of the City. His hon. Friend had alluded to two things—rating and the police. With regard to the rating of the City of London, that was done at present by the Metropolitan Board of Works for Metropolitan and City improvements. They levied the Main Drainage rate in the City, and in addition it was proposed to call on them to rate the City for the purposes of the cattle plague. No man delighted more in good eating or drinking than Aldermen, and they should be the last to find fault with any attempts to put down the cattle plague. [MR. CRAWFORD: I am not an Alderman, nor do I delight in eating or drinking.] He did not know what the hon. Member did delight in, and he would not inquire. He was not an Alderman, but he (Mr. Crawford) represented the City, and if the City had submitted to be rated by the Metropolitan Board of Works for sewage and improvements he (Mr. Locke) was at a loss to know what objection the City could have on that occasion to the proposal before the Committee. Then with regard to the police. There could be no doubt that the City police were regulated by the corporation with the greatest propriety, and so were the Metropolitan police by Sir Richard Mayne. If the Metropolitan Board of Works were empowered to call in the assistance of the latter, what objection could there be to their having also the assistance of the City police. The only grievance the City had to complain of was that that courtesy had not been displayed towards it which, if they had had notice of the intention of the Government, would have enabled them to have got up an opposition to the proposal, and to have brought vividly before the Committee, with all the force they possessed, the merits of local self-government. That, no doubt, was a very good thing; but if one great piece of the metropolis was to be parcelled out to the inconvenience of the whole of the inhabitants, then the sooner that species of local self-government was put an end to the better. He contended there should be only one governing body for the metropolis. The City ought to spread its ægis over the metropolis, and its host of officers be occupied for the general benefit of the whole.

MR. HUNT said, he thought the metropolitan Members laboured under some misapprehension as to the extent of the contributions which their constituents might be called upon to make on account of beasts dying through the cattle plague. Traveling by railway having been prohibited, it was very unlikely that cattle would come into the metropolis and die there; and if hon. Members would vote with him upon a question subsequently to be discussed, that animals landed from foreign countries should be slaughtered at the port of entry, the risk would be still further diminished. The question of metropolitan government was interesting to many hon. Members, and no doubt much attention would be given to it during the Session. But on the present occasion, when time was of great importance, when they all had made great personal sacrifices in withholding criticisms, both upon clauses in the Bill and upon the objections made to them, in order that progress might be made as rapidly as possible in the attainment of a great public object, he did deprecate the introduction into the debate of such questions as metropolitan government.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he wished to ask the hon. Gentleman having charge of the Bill to point out any clause in it securing the metropolis against double taxation, first at the hands of the various counties into which its population extended, and next at the hands of the Board of Works.

MR. BARING : Not in the Bill. It is in the schedule.

Amendment agreed to.

Last paragraph of Clause struck out.

Words struck out.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Power to assemble General Sessions).

MR. BARING moved that the clause be struck out.

MR. ACLAND said, he wished to ask what were the means which the Government proposed to adopt for the purpose of securing the holding of these sessions.

MR. BARING said, that he proposed to bring up a clause providing that sessions should be held on the Monday after the passing of the Act unless they are adjourned to some earlier day, in order that no time should be lost in taking the measures necessary for giving effect to the Act.

Clause struck out.

Clause 7 (Power of the Local Authority to form Committee of its own Members and others).

MR. ACLAND said, he hoped that a little facility would be given in order to enable courts of sessions to act with freedom and without being hampered by undue formalities.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he would suggest the postponement of Clause 7. He feared that in the end the action of these several committees might tend towards the reproduction of evils similar to those which were now complained of. It would be much better, he thought, to trust to the action of a central body.

SIR JOHN SIMEON said, he approved the clause as it stood, and hoped the Under Secretary would not allow himself to be persuaded to abandon it.

MR. HUNT said, he thought the objections of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Adderley) might be met by inserting a few words to secure uniformity of action among the committees. He proposed that the clause should be amended by the addition of the words—

"But in the exercise of such powers all such committees shall act according to such uniform rules as may be laid down by such local authority."

MR. BARING said, he had no objection to the introduction of those words.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he must still insist on the necessity of making it clear by Act of Parliament how the different local authorities were to act. It had been observed that the clause was merely permissive, but it was precisely to its permissive character that he objected. He was anxious to ensure as much as possible uniformity of action.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, the court of quarter sessions would meet and appoint its committees. In some counties it would be convenient to have but one committee, in others more. It would, therefore, be very objectionable to limit the clause in the way proposed. When more than one committee was appointed, it was to be supposed that they would act upon uniform rules. The acts of the committees would impose rates upon the counties, and one of the first things upon which they would agree was the rules for slaughter.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that in the county which he represented (Suffolk) they had an association divided into as many subdivisions as there were unions in the county, and notwithstanding all their efforts it had been found, over and over again, that sometimes upon very minute points, and often upon most important matters—such as dealing with animals attacked or in danger—there were conflicting regulations. He was perfectly satisfied, therefore, that if there were a number of committees in each county there would be conflicting rules, conflicting principles, conflicting decisions, and conflicting action.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he thought that the objections of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) were addressed rather to the Government Bill as it was originally framed than as it stood at present. In the two counties with which he was most acquainted (Surrey and Lanarkshire), the appointment of several committees would be absolutely necessary, if the Act were to be carried into operation. The central authorities must delegate their powers to committees, to say whether wholesale slaughtering should be carried out or not.

MR. BONHAM-CARTER said, he hoped the Government would adhere to the clause. There would be the greatest inconvenience felt if it were made incumbent on every farmer to send to the central authority before he could kill his beast. It would defeat the object of the Bill. There should be special committees in every part of each county, in order that the members of them might be referred to without any delay or expense.

MR. HUNT said, he believed they might rely on the good sense of the committees to confer with one another. But, in order to relieve his right hon. Friend (Mr. Adderley's) fears, they might add a proviso—that on the formation of two or more committees, such committees should act according to such uniform rules as shall be agreed on by those committees, or shall be laid down by such local authority.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that unless local committees were directly responsible to the central authority there would be no uniform system, and it would be impossible to enforce the provisions of the Bill.

MR. BARING said, that the subordination of the local committees was provided for by the words of the clause. The committees would certainly act according to the rules laid down by the local authority, which was empowered to delegate powers to them.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he wished the committees to be simply executive, and not legislative. If they had legislative powers there would be greater confusion under the Bill than there was under the Orders in Council.

MR. BARING then altered his Amendment as follows:—

“In the case of the formation of two or more committees, such committees shall act according to the rules laid down for their guidance by such local authority.”

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to. [ol. 8.]

Clauses 8 and 9 struck out.

Clause 10 (Appointment of Inspectors and other Officers).

MR. BARING moved to add words taken from the Bill of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) to the effect that persons appointed inspectors before the passing of the Act should remain in office unless their appointments were revoked. He also proposed to add a proviso which at first might appear rather stringent—it was that the certificate of an inspector should be conclusive evidence of a beast having been diseased. Such a provision would be unjust if compensation were not provided, but, with compensation, some such provision was necessary in order to prevent vexatious prosecutions.

Amendment moved to insert the words—

“Provided that all Persons appointed Inspectors before the passing of this Act under the Authority of any Order of the Lords of Her Majesty's Privy Council relative to the Cattle Plague, and being such at the passing of this Act, shall be Cattle Inspectors to act in the execution of this Act in and for the Districts for which they respectively were appointed; but any such Appointment may at any Time be revoked by the Authority that would be empowered to revoke it if it had been made under this Act.

“The Certificate of an Inspector of the Local Authority that an Animal is affected by Cattle Plague shall for the Purposes of this Act be conclusive Evidence in all Courts of Justice and elsewhere of its having been so affected.”

MR. HUNT: This puts a very great power into the hands of the inspector. He may go into any farmyard and order animals to be slaughtered, and the owner would only get in the shape of compensation half the value of the slaughtered animal. Then, what is the meaning of “cattle overseers,” as distinguished from the “inspectors?”

MR. HENLEY said, that in some counties the inspectors were not persons of any veterinary knowledge at all. Indeed, he was told that many were policemen. Was it desirable that their fiat as to slaughtering should be final? If it were, the office should always be filled by properly qualified veterinary surgeons. How otherwise could their scientific judgment be relied on?

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that if an inspector's certificate were made conclusive evidence, he could not be proceeded against for fraud.

MR. HUNT said, that under the Orders in Council they were required to appoint an inspector, who should be a veterinary surgeon, “or other duly qualified person.” He believed by that was intended a person acquainted, in a sufficient degree, with the veterinary art, and he objected on that ground in his county to the appointment of policemen to be inspectors. He did not think that they were within the spirit of the words relating to qualification. He was aware, however, that in many counties they had appointed policemen, and in one county he had heard of a shoemaker being appointed inspector. What special knowledge that person might have he did not know. [MR. BARING: He deals in hides.] Yes, but I think he had better have stuck to his last. If, however, the fiat of the inspector was to be conclusive, some words on that subject would require to be introduced.

MR. FLOYER said, that in the county he represented (Dorsetshire), and also at Southampton, policemen had been appointed. He thought that no persons were better fitted for the post of cattle inspectors than the officers of police. The hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) appeared to think that veterinary surgeons were better qualified for inspectorships than the police. The inspectors throughout the country were at present the veterinary surgeons, and it would be seen by a letter that recently appeared in The Times that they complained of being overworked. Every one hoped that some remedy might be discovered for this terrible infliction; and, if it so pleased Providence, the veterinary surgeons might be better employed in attending to cattle, and applying that remedy than in attending to details most of which had nothing to do with the veterinary art. The police, on the other hand, were always present and able to see to the cleansing of sheds and places where cattle had been, and to their burial when dead, better than any veterinary surgeon could do. The only thing the latter was required for was to give his professional opinion as to whether cattle were diseased and should be slaughtered; and after he had so given his opinion, the remainder would be better in the hands of the police. He did not mean to suggest that an animal should be slaughtered on the authority of a police officer alone; what he proposed was that the chief constable or sergeant of police should consult the veterinary surgeon as to the condition of any animal which they suspected to be attacked by the disease, and should then report to the local committee, with whom the ultimate decision should rest.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he thought that the appointment of inspectors ought to be left entirely in the hands of the local committees. If the House laid down any rule enacting that no persons should be appointed inspectors unless they possessed certain qualifications, there might be districts in which no persons possessing those qualifications could be found. He did not think the clause now under discussion was sufficiently strong to prevent a man whose cattle had been slaughtered alleging that the cattle were sound. He might say, "My cattle never had the disease, and you had no right under the statute to slaughter them," and might bring an action for damages against the local authorities.

MR. BONHAM-CARTER said, that the local inspectors in his county (Hants) were police. They had no special veterinary knowledge, but were very efficient in all other respects. If a herd were declared to be infected, were they to send for the inspector, who might be twenty miles off, for every beast that was taken? That was impossible, and therefore a local cattle overseer would be required, who might be an intelligent tenant-farmer.

COLONEL NORTH said, he thought that the inspector ought to be a person who knew something about the disease. The hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Bonham-Carter) proposed that the duties of inspector should be jointly discharged by a police officer and a respectable tenant-farmer. He did not see what advantage would be gained by carrying the hon. Gentleman's proposal into effect; for a man might be a very respectable tenant-farmer, and know nothing whatever about the cattle plague.

MR. BARING said, that there were several questions now before the House. The first was whether the words "cattle overseers" ought to be omitted. He agreed with the hon. Member (Mr. Hunt) that these words ought to be left out, for in the first place they had no definite meaning and might apply to a ploughboy or other ignorant person; and in the second they were used with a special meaning in the Bill of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt), which would come before the House for discussion. He thought that it would be very imprudent to define in the Bill from what class of persons the inspectors were to be drawn, or what qualifications they should possess, the circumstances of the different counties being so varied. Their appointment ought to be left entirely in the hands of the local authorities. If that were done, he believed that the local authorities would appoint proper persons to act as inspectors. For his part he believed that in many districts chief constables and superintendents of police would render very efficient services.

MR. HUNT said, he strongly objected to the appointment of persons as inspectors without regard to their veterinary knowledge. It was not right that they should be intrusted with the power to order beasts to be killed, because they had not sufficient knowledge to justify the exercise of such power. But they had greater power. Their evidence in a court of law would be sufficient under the Orders in Council to cause a person to be punished for removing cattle declared by the inspector to be diseased. He could not see how as inspectors they were more than policemen. What were they to do as inspectors which they could not do as policemen, except that which they ought not to do?—namely, direct beasts to be killed. The clause provided that the certificate of the inspector should be conclusive in all courts of an animal having had the disease. It not only applied to the animal in question but to other animals in the same yard, or to any person who had been dealing with such animals. He should prefer the introduction of a few words protecting from actions at law inspectors acting bond fide and to the best of their judgment in the execution of their duty.

MR. HENLEY said, that the power was great. Notwithstanding, it was proposed to intrust comparatively ignorant persons with it. The duties of the local authorities also were heavy, and he thought their inspectors should be men upon whom they could depend. He could not believe they would feel safe in trusting to the word of a shoemaker. Persons having not the slightest medical knowledge might be appointed inspectors. Common constables were to have this power, that the moment a fiat went out that cattle were diseased they must be killed. It was next provided that the local authorities should set to work and cause the field in which the beast had been to be disinfected. Now it was not a very easy process to disinfect a field. Since the proviso had been introduced without notice he thought the least the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary could do would be not to press the matter, but introduce it to the notice of the House when the Report was brought up.

MR. BARING said, he was aware that notice should have been given if possible of his intention to introduce the proviso. He also felt the force of many of the objections, but time pressed, and he trusted the House would decide upon the case at once. He felt the necessity of the provision he had suggested, because without it any of the local authorities acting on the Bill would be liable to actions for so doing.

Words "cattle overseers" struck out.

Proviso agreed to, and added to clause.

Clause, as amended, agreed to. [cl. 9.]

Clause 11 (Power of Entry for Inspectors and others).

COLONEL NORTH said, he wished to have some definition of the words that persons committing "such offence should be liable to a penalty not exceeding £20." He had put the question to the Home Secretary, whether the £20 applied to each head of cattle or to each transaction. The answer was per head. He wished to know whether the meaning of the clause was for each head or for not allowing the inspector to enter different parts of the farm.

MR. BARING said, the power contained in the clause was a modified power. It did not authorize the inspector to enter at any time, but only when he had reasonable ground for suspecting that cattle infected by the plague were to be found. With respect to the question of the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel North), the point in question had not been decided by the Court of Queen's Bench at the time referred to. It was settled by the Bill.

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE said, he had seen so much during the last four months of the manner in which the cattle plague was carried about by the inspectors, that he thought some check ought to be put upon their power of entering cattle sheds at all times. The inspectors went into sheds among cattle which were infected, and then, without changing their clothes, they went among cattle which were perfectly healthy, and he thought that if that were to continue some parts of the country that had hitherto escaped the plague would become liable to it. A cattle owner was liable to a penalty if he did not send notice that his cattle were diseased, and this was a sufficient protection. He therefore moved, as an Amendment to the clause, that after the words "for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this Act," in the seventh line, the following words should be added:—

"And before entering, he shall be bound to produce an affidavit, sworn before a justice of the peace, to the effect that he has such reasonable grounds for supposing that cattle affected by the cattle plague are there to be found."

MR. CARNEGIE said, he should support the Amendment. He believed it was dangerous to allow the inspectors to go about among all the herds in the country. A man who owned a valuable herd would rather give an inspector £5, £10, or even £20 than allow him to enter his premises and spread the infection. Cases had been known where inspectors had forced their way into uninfected cattle sheds to get the fee.

MR. ST. AUBYN said, he should support the clause as it stood.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he agreed that some check ought to be put upon the power of inspectors. In many districts persons had been appointed who were utterly incompetent to discharge the duties of the office, simply for the want of competent inspectors. Instead of an affidavit, he would suggest that an inspector should obtain the authority of a magistrate to empower him to inspect cattle against the will of the owner. The inspectors would have no difficulty in obtaining that authority when it was necessary, and the authority would be some protection to the cattle owners.

MR. ACLAND said, he thought the best course would be to require the inspector to act on the information of one or more neighbouring cattle owners or other credible persons. The inspectors would then be compelled to show their authority before going into any cattle shed. In his part of the country there was no human being so detested and dreaded as the cattle inspector.

MR. AYRTON said, he was sorry to see that the zeal which had been shown at first in discussing the subject of the cattle plague had somewhat fallen off. He thought they ought to sustain the tone they had at first adopted, and support the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary in these measures, notwithstanding their stringency. There could be no fair objection to the inspectors having power to visit the cattle sheds. It was only carrying out the same principle which was observed in the case of inspectors of factories, and inspectors of mines. Why did they not strip the inspector, wash him, and fumigate him at once, instead of only making him swear an affidavit? He ridiculed the idea that inspectors would carry the plague about with them, and thought they ought to be fettered with no obstructions in the performance of their duties.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he was astonished to find the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets disagreeing with the principle that a man's house was his castle. [MR. AYRTON: Cattle shed.] He thought that the farmer ought not to have his premises invaded unnecessarily, and hoped that the hon. Member (Mr. Waldegrave-Leslie) would press his Amendment.

MR. WHALLEY said, that the object would be obtained by requiring the inspector, if he should be requested to do so, to state in writing the grounds on which he entered the premises.

MR. BARING said, he would accept the Amendment suggested by the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley).

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE said,

Sir FitzRoy Kelly

he believed that some of the inspectors were unable to write. He hoped that the Government would adopt his Amendment.

MR. HENLEY said, that first of all every constable was empowered to take action under this Bill, and now they were to be required to record their reasons for acting in writing. That was getting on, he thought. They had to provide as far as possible against the spread of the disease, and they must remember that on the first appearance of the plague in a district there were always a good many gaping people—constables sometimes, as well as others—who went to the farms where the disease existed to have what they called a “look,” thereby spreading the disease. It was always dangerous to encourage people to visit those spots at their own will and pleasure, and they should remember that the grounds upon which policemen acted were not always the soundest. By fining a man £20 if he did not announce the appearance of the disease, and by offering him compensation if he did, they were holding out the two strongest inducements by which people were influenced—hope and fear. He thought that the clause was, on the whole, likely to be more productive of mischief than of good.

MR. GOODSON said, he thought that all objections would be met by providing that the officers should act by direction of the local authorities.

MR. WHALLEY said; he thought that if the inspectors recorded in writing their reasons for acting, it would soon be seen whether they exceeded their powers or not. If, however, inspectors were only to act in individual cases upon the authority of the local authorities, they would frequently have to lose much valuable and important time in gaining access to the authorities.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that by a clause in the Bill, the disinfection of inspectors was already provided for. As it was the interest of local authorities to prevent the spreading of infection, they would take precautions against the inspectors going about to spread the infection.

MR. HENLEY said, he would suggest the omission of the words “any constable or police officer.”

MR. BARING said, he would agree to the suggestion.

MR. HUNT said, that in many instances police officers were appointed inspectors, and as they were always bound to appear in uniform, their disinfection would not be an easy matter. So notorious had this fact become, that in some counties, instead of being called "inspectors," the people styled them "infectors." He thought it might be better to strike out the whole clause.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he approved the omission of the words "any constable or police officer." The objection of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) was a sound one. It was advisable that the inspection should be limited to officers properly qualified. It was, however, necessary to retain the clause, because as the local authorities were empowered to slay suspected animals, they must have means of arriving at a judgment upon the matter. He thought the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member (Mr. Whalley) would act as a check on inspectors.

MR. WHALLEY then moved the addition of the following words at the end of the clause:—

"Provided always that such inspector shall, if required, state in writing the grounds upon which he has entered such premises for the purpose aforesaid."

MR. M'LAGAN moved an Amendment that inspectors should be required to visit the places in which diseased animals were buried, and see that the requirement was carried out.

MR. BARING said, that would lead to the spread of infection.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to. [cl. 10.]

Clause 50 (Confirmation of Orders).

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that the clause was intended to indemnify all persons who had acted under the Orders of the Privy Council, and, indeed, to indemnify the Privy Council themselves for the Orders they had issued; and the fact that it was proposed at all was a proof that the Government had a doubt as to the legality of their proceedings. The Lord Chancellor was reported to have said the other day that although the Government had acted under his advice in promulgating these Orders of the Privy Council, yet it might be doubtful whether they came under the terms of the Act, or, in other words, whether they were legal; and if they were not legal all persons whose animals had been killed under those Orders had an undoubted right to bring an action at law and claim damages. The farmers throughout the country had, however, behaved most submissively. For the good of the nation they had never resisted the Orders in Council or questioned their legality; and not only had they had their diseased animals slaughtered, but many sound cattle had also been slaughtered through the ignorance of the inspectors. Now, the effect of the clause would be to take away the farmers' legal right in such cases. He did not desire to prevent the passing of the clause; but he thought the Government should state that they were willing to bring up the 18th clause, which they had themselves originally introduced, and grant retrospective compensation.

MR. HUNT said, he did not see the necessity of raising that question then, because when the 18th clause was left out it was understood that they were to deal with it subsequently. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) had suggested to the Secretary of State that the clause should be withdrawn, on the ground that it ought to be considered separately, and that it was doubtful whether the retrospective compensation ought to come out of the same fund as that which was to be provided by the Bill; and it had been withdrawn in accordance with that suggestion. It was understood when Clause 18 was struck out that something of a similar kind was to be proposed subsequently, not in this Bill, but in another shape. He hoped, therefore, no doubt existed that the Government were pledged to the retrospective principle.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was very sorry that his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary had been obliged, through over exertion and the pressure of public business, to quit the House, and also that he had had no opportunity of consulting with his right hon. Friend as to his exact meaning in respect to that dropped clause relating to retrospective compensation. But having himself been present when it was dropped, he could say that it was dropped, not because the case of these parties ought not to be considered, but because relating to a back claim, whatever it was, it was in no way urgent, and need not interfere with the other parts of the Bill that required to be pushed forward. His right hon. Friend, he was sure, was now quite as much disposed to consider the case of these persons as when he introduced the clause.

MR. HENLEY said, the explanation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was quite satisfactory if the right hon. Gentleman meant to say that those persons who had willingly obeyed what they thought to be the law should not be put in a worse position than those whose cattle might be slaughtered hereafter.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not say, nor would he then pretend to form an opinion on the subject, that the parties who preferred retrospective claims should be dealt with precisely like those who had to be dealt with prospectively. He thought the former case was different in some respects from the latter, but he had no doubt his right hon. Friend would be as ready as he was at first to consider it upon its merits.

MR. HENLEY: Nullum simile est idem. I take it to be admitted that they have a fair claim to compensation, and that the Government will, at all events, bring up some clause upon the subject.

Clause agreed to. [cl. 32.]

On Motion of Mr. BARING, Clause 6 A (Power to assemble adjourned Sessions), and Clause 7 B (Meeting of Local Authority in Scotland), added to the Bill.

MR. BARING moved to add a new clause (Clause 20 C)—

"Where any animal has been slaughtered under the provisions of this Act, the owner of such animal shall not be entitled to receive, in respect of the insurance of such animal, any sum which, together with the payment he receives for such animal under the provisions of this Act, shall exceed the sum which he would otherwise have been entitled to receive in respect of such insurance."

The relief such a clause would give to the insurance associations would enable them to continue in existence. The object of the provision was to ensure the proper working of the insurance companies, and of the means of providing proper compensation.

MR. HUNT said, he thought that if the clause passed the persons assuring should have returned to them a proportionate part of the premiums paid to the insurance associations, since they would only receive a small sum from the associations.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, the effect of the clause would be to do justice between the parties. It would be unfair to compel the insurance companies to pay the whole sum assured for animals slaughtered under the Act, but they could scarcely complain of having to pay £100 out of £400, the remaining £300 being paid to the assurer by way of compensation out of the county rate.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he thought the clause would operate unjustly to the assurer, inasmuch as he would have paid the premium to the association, as well as having to contribute towards the county rate, while his more unthrifty neighbour would get the same amount of compensation having only contributed to the county rate.

MR. NEATE said, he thought the matter required further consideration.

LORD HENRY THYNNE moved that the clause be postponed. He said that it benefited the insurance offices at the expense of the county rate.

MR. BARING said, he hoped the Committee would pass the clause, as it would benefit the insurance associations without throwing any additional burden upon the county rate. Unless the clause were carried the Act would impose great hardship upon the insurance associations, since the sound cattle slaughtered under the provisions of the Act might not have died from the effects of the disease, and therefore the Act, without the clause, would simply deprive the associations of so much money. The effect of the clause had been quite correctly stated by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir FitzRoy Kelly). If it were not inserted in the Bill the owner of an animal ordered to be slaughtered would be entitled to receive three-fourths of the value of the animal, and the same amount from the insurance company, so that he would receive the full value of the animal and one-half more. The county rate would, under the clause proposed, be bound to pay compensation, and then the insurance company would pay any difference there might be between the amount of the compensation and the sum for which the animal was insured.

MR. AYRTON said, the clause merely enabled the owner to deduct from the compensation what he received from the insurance office. The principle of the insurance company was only to pay the salvage.

Clause agreed to.

MR. BARING proposed a clause that the Act should continue in force until the first day of June, 1867, and until the end of the then Session of Parliament, and no longer.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Mr. HUNT reminded the Government that power was to be taken to discontinue the Bill supposing a remedy were found for the cattle plague. He did not understand that any clause to that effect had been introduced.

Mr. BARING said, a clause would be brought up to that effect on the Report.

Clause agreed to. [cl. 34.]
Schedule 1.

Amendment proposed, to insert the words "counties including any town or place which does not return or contribute to return a Member to Parliament."—(The Lord Advocate.)

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON moved to insert words limiting the operation of the schedule in the case of Scotch towns to such as have a population of not less than 20,000.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, by adding, at the end thereof, the words "and which has not a population of twenty thousand inhabitants."—(Sir James Fergusson.)

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 26: Majority 2.

On Question that the Schedule, as amended, stand part of the Bill,

Mr. CRAUFURD said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate whether he intended to introduce into the Bill those clauses which he suggested giving permissive powers to the magistrates in boroughs to unite with counties, or to place themselves under the counties in cases where they should think it desirable for the purposes of the Act.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it would be very desirable that such a power should be introduced into the Bill; but considering the stage at which the Bill had now arrived that could only be done in another place.

Schedule, as amended, agreed to.

Schedule 2 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

On Question that the Chairman report the Bill, as amended, to the House,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the Bill would come on as an Order of the Day to-morrow after the notice with respect to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he wished to inquire whether it was the intention of the Government to pass the Bill to-morrow?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hoped so. It was intended to move the third reading after the Report had been received.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

Bill brought from the Commons; read 1^a; and to be printed (No. 12).

Order of the Day for Standing Orders Nos. 37 and 38 to be considered in order to their being dispensed with, read.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, in moving that this Bill be now read a second time, I have to inform your Lordships that it is with great regret Her Majesty's Government have felt themselves compelled to propose the present measure for the suspension for a limited time of the Constitution in one portion of Her Majesty's dominions; and it is now my purpose to state shortly to your Lordships the reasons which have induced Her Majesty's Government to consider that an extensive and formidable conspiracy exists in Ireland, against which all the regular powers of the law have been put in force by the Lord Lieutenant administering the Government in that part of the United Kingdom.

Nevertheless, as by the exertion of those powers the conspiracy has not been suppressed, we now ask your Lordships to apply the apparent remedy in such a dangerous case — the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. With respect to the nature of this conspiracy, it is hardly necessary that I should detain your Lordships by any lengthened explanation. I am not going to refer to any documents, or to bring forward any secret information, because, generally speaking, the proceedings of this conspiracy have been so notorious, and those engaged in the conspiracy have been so much more ready to boast of their strength and objects than to conceal their intentions, that it is not necessary that I should enter into details upon those points. It may, I think, be true that had it not been for the civil war in America, Ireland would have remained in peace and tranquillity at the present time, and the adoption of no extreme measures would have been necessary. But towards the end of the American war the Irish residents in America formed themselves into a vast conspiracy. They collected a large amount of subscriptions, and at one meeting alone it was stated that 1,000,000 dollars were subscribed. Sometimes an invasion of Ireland and at other times an invasion of Canada were threatened. The purpose of this conspiracy was in the first place to overthrow the Queen's authority in Ireland; in the next place to take possession of the estates of the landed proprietors; and in the third place it was an attack against religion, whether the religion of the Protestants belonging to the Established Church and of other Protestants, or the religion of the Roman Catholics. It has been conspicuous from the beginning that these attempts were directed, as stated in the Queen's Speech, against all lawful authority, against property, and religion. After a time the denunciations against England made at the meetings in America were collected and circulated by emissaries sent over from that country to Ireland, where they began their course of operations. Their purpose was to enlist as many persons as possible, whether civilians or military, with a view to insurrection. There can be no doubt as to these facts, because for this offence of conspiring to levy war against the Queen, as defined in a late and most useful Act of Parliament called the Treason Felony Act, the Law Officers of the Crown having advised a prosecution, and many persons having been brought to trial under that Act, the most conclusive evidence was produced against them, showing that they were persons engaged in treasonable practices against the Queen, and that their intention was by means of bloodshed and terror to produce a revolution in Ireland, with all the frightful consequences which must ensue from the attempt at such an outbreak. During the late Special Commission in Ireland, the learned Judges expounded the law in the most lucid and convincing manner, and the juries discharged their functions with a fearlessness and impartiality which showed that a great change had taken place since 1844 and 1848, and a great number of the accused persons were convicted. It was the expectation of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland that the proceedings adopted by the Government would prove sufficient to check the spirit of insurrection; they proved however to be ineffectual, and the conspiracy has accordingly made great advances. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in consultation with his Law Advisers, deliberated a little before the meeting of Parliament on the matter, and they came to the opinion that it might be their duty to ask for a suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, though the necessity for such a step was not at that particular time undoubtedly obvious; and they wished, therefore, to wait as long as possible, in order to try to put down the insurrection by the ordinary powers of the law. In this respect I think your Lordships will see reason to commend the conduct of the Lord Lieutenant, who, while desirous to put down the insurrection, and restore the country to peace and tranquillity, was at the same time anxious to perform that service to the Queen and country by the ordinary means of the law, and without any suspension of the Constitution in Ireland. After some time, however, it was found on inquiry that the spirit of Fenianism, as it is called, so far from being subdued, had spread more and more; that fresh emissaries were arriving from America, and that a great fabrication of bullets and implements of war was being carried on. It was then evident that, instead of considering their enterprise altogether a failure, the "Head Centre," as he is called, and the other persons who were the heads and leaders in this Fenian conspiracy, persuaded themselves that they might speedily take measures to begin a successful insurrection. There was not, I think, any danger that such an insurrection, if they were rash enough to attempt it, would really have had any success; but there was a very great chance that much bloodshed and destruction of property might have occurred, and that the country might have been placed in such a state of insecurity that all persons of property would have fled from it, and that there would have been a suspension of all those operations by which the industrious classes live. Attempts were made—almost universally unsuccessful, I am happy to say—to tamper with Her Majesty's soldiers, and to induce them to abandon their duty of obedience to the Crown, to receive what was called the Fenian pay, and to become parties in this great conspiracy. A few men, I am sorry to say, were seduced from their allegiance—they are, however, but few, and they will, no doubt, be made amenable to the law by which such an offence is punishable. I may add that by a long letter from the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in which he details all the measures he has adopted to put down this conspiracy, it appears that his conviction is that the Fenian spirit still continues unsubdued; that there are a number of strangers in Ireland, about 500, engaged in treasonable practices and acting in different bodies, and that it would be impossible for him to answer for the peace of Ireland or the safety of Dublin, unless the Irish Government are armed with greater powers. Of course, such a statement coming from the Lord Lieutenant, who has shown himself anxious to keep as long as possible within the limits of the ordinary law, was calculated to produce a great impression on Her Majesty's Government. At the same time, the Chief Secretary for Ireland states in a letter that week after week the danger was obviously increasing; that these bands of Fenians are increasing in number; that private meetings are held; and that there are many places in which there are numerous depôts for the store of pikes and other weapons. At these meetings the Fenians hold out hopes, both to civilians and Her Majesty's soldiers, that there will very shortly be an insurrection, and that for three days all that licence which is allowed to soldiers who take part in the capture of a town or fortress will be allowed to the persons joining in the Fenian movement, and that even the women would be given up to their brutal passions. Such statements having been made, according to the information received by Her Majesty's Government, we could not but think that, if we allowed these proceedings to go on, and if we allowed the lives and property of Her Majesty's loyal subjects to be for a moment placed in a state of insecurity, that we should be deeply responsible, however successful in ultimately putting down the insurrection, and that we should deserve the highest censure, if we did not make use of all the means which Parliament might grant for the purpose of suppressing this mischief. The last point on which I have to address your Lordships is as to the applicability of the remedy which the House of Commons has sanctioned, and which it is now my duty to propose that your Lordships should agree to. A great number of these persons who have come from America to Ireland are by origin Irish, but have become citizens of the United States; many of them took part in the late civil war in America, and being disappointed in their expectations that when they became victorious in battle the property of the conquered would be given up to them for general plunder, they have thought they might execute in Ireland those projects of spoliation which they were not allowed to carry out in America. Consequently, the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act will enable the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to lay his hands on these men, who are engaged in the same treasonable correspondence as those who have been convicted by law, but who have hitherto evaded apprehension. These persons have latterly been made additionally cautious and cunning by the arrest and conviction of some of the conspirators, but they are yet pursuing their projects with as much or more activity than ever. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, if this Act is passed, will be enabled during the limited period for which it will be in force to retain the persons in prison; and it is to be hoped that by these leaders of insurrection being kept in custody the population will no longer be worked upon, but will be disposed to resume their usual avocations and demeanour. In fact, it has only been by the grossest delusions, and by holding out to these unfortunate people that some great benefit would accrue to them from these treasonable projects, that any impression has been produced. It may be necessary to have this Act in force for a considerable time; but it will, I trust, have the effect of not only preventing the teaching of treasonable lessons to their victims by these mischievous men, but also of deterring many persons who are meditating a journey to Ireland for similar purposes from coming to that country. My Lords, it has been made a kind of reproach that Her Majesty's Government in proposing this Bill propose a scheme of simple coercion, unaccompanied by remedial measures. My Lords, I think that the maintenance of law and order and the restoration of peace in the country—that the assurance that every man shall enjoy the fruits of his industry in security, without the danger of having his property seized and confiscated by rebels—is of itself a remedial measure, and one that is not to be accounted less valuable than any other means of promoting the prosperity of Ireland. With regard to other measures of a remedial character, I do not think that this is the time for entering upon them. There will, no doubt, be many occasions when the state of Ireland may come under the consideration of Parliament, and it may then be a fair question whether or not Her Majesty's Government are adopting all proper means in their power for the improvement of the condition of that country. But the immediate question now before your Lordships is one of the utmost importance, and also one of the utmost urgency; and it appears to me that the first thing we have to do is to secure peace and order in Ireland, and maintain the authority of the Queen. I therefore beg, my Lords, to move in the first place the suspension of the Standing Orders, to enable the measure which I have described to pass without delay.

Moved, "That Standing Orders Nos. 37 and 38 be dispensed with."—(Earl Russell.)

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I quite concur in one part of the statement just made by the noble Earl—namely, that this is not the opportunity for considering any other question than the one which is immediately before us. It would be extremely inconvenient to enter at this moment into any discussion whatever upon the state of Ireland, upon the causes which may have led to that state, or upon what possible remedial measures it might be desirable to suggest for the benefit of that country. We have now to deal with a great present necessity. We know from common report—we know from our private correspondence—we know from every means of information which we possess—that Ireland is at the present moment in a most perilous position: we have it from the statements of Her Majesty's Government, who are now holding very different language from that which they used on this subject until very recently, that they are now compelled to apply to Parliament for powers which they thought unnecessary a week or two ago; because, certainly, at the time when this Parliament first met their tone and language were that the ordinary course of law had been appealed to and had been found effectual for the putting down of these dangerous conspiracies. Since then I presume Her Majesty's Government have obtained information from the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland that, notwithstanding the manner in which the Judges, juries, and Crown prosecutors of that country have done their duty in the late trials, the ordinary course of law has not proved sufficient to deter these persons from engaging in or continuing their treasonable proceedings, or to put an end to their malpractices. I do not think, my Lords, that we should call upon Her Majesty's Government now specifically to vindicate the step which they are taking upon their own responsibility. They tell us that the danger is so great and so imminent that it is absolutely necessary not only to suspend the ordinary course of law by the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, but that in dealing with this subject there is not even time for passing their Bill in the ordinary manner—that it is imperative upon us now, as it was in 1848—when the noble Earl also had the fortune to be at the head of the Government—to put this Bill through all its stages at once, on the very same day as that on which it has been introduced and also passed through all its stages in the House of Commons. Therefore, my Lords, while giving my cordial assent to the measure proposed by Her Majesty's Government upon their own responsibility as being absolutely indispensable for the maintenance of peace in Ireland, I abstain altogether from entering into the causes which have produced, or which have encouraged, the present disaffected state of that country. But there was one statement made by the noble Earl as to which I would now make a single remark. The noble Earl said that if it had not been for the civil war in America there would have been no such disturbance of the tranquillity of Ireland as this. I do not mean for an instant to deny that the civil war in America, that the military and warlike habits which people have there contracted, that the tendency to indulge in acts of violence and plunder developed during the progress of that sanguinary struggle, or that the consequences of the excitement which that contest has produced in America, may not have given great encouragement to the outbreak of this mischievous spirit in Ireland; but I venture to say, speaking from my own knowledge, that as long ago as 1859 we ascertained that the most dangerous portion of the then called Phoenix conspiracy which prevailed in Ireland was the branch of it which then existed and flourished in America; and from that time down to the present hour there has been no moment at which that conspiracy has not been there organized, and at which it has not been in correspondence with the parties who were desirous of promoting an outbreak in Ireland. I am not now asserting that that spirit has not been properly met in Ireland. I only demur to the statement that this is a spirit of which the origin is entirely new, or that it only dates from the civil war in America, and would not have existed but for that war. My Lords, I do not mean to say a single word more. I think it would be very inconvenient at present to enter into any lengthened discussion. Her Majesty's Government state on their own responsibility that this measure is essential to the maintenance of the peace and to the protection of life and property in Ireland. These they declare to be its primary objects; and if they solemnly announce to both Houses of Parliament that these objects cannot be attained without the suspension of the liberty of the subject, then Salus populi suprema lex; we are bound to accept the necessity that is imposed upon us, and to grant Her Majesty's Government the extraordinary powers for which they ask. Occasions may hereafter arise for calling upon the Government for a fuller justification of this measure, and also for a vindication of the policy which they have pursued in Ireland; but the House of Commons having, in a House of 370 Members, passed this Bill with a protest against its introduction from the insignificant number of only six Members, I hope that your Lordships' House, without even so many as six, or even one dissentient voice, will not hesitate, in the cause of law and order and the security of life and property, to give to Her Majesty's Government that support and those powers which they declare to be essential.

MR. WHALLEY AND DR. MANNING.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished briefly to occupy the attention of the House while he gave a personal explanation, and sought to do justice to a gentleman of great eminence. In a recent speech he had used words which purported to express the sentiments of Dr. Manning. He had received a communication from Dr. Manning, requesting him to state the authority upon which he (Mr. Whalley) had attributed those sentiments to him. He had furnished Dr. Manning with that authority, and he held a letter in his hand from Dr. Manning, in which he entirely repudiated the sentiments which had been attributed to him, and he (Mr. Whalley) was perfectly ready to accept the repudiation of those sentiments on the part of Dr. Manning.

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION (IRELAND) BILL.—LEAVE.

FIRST, SECOND, AND THIRD READING.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, it is with very deep and sincere regret that I rise to make the Motion of which I have given notice, and which I shall have to place in your hands to put from the Chair. The power which the Government now feel it their duty to ask Parliament to grant them is one which no Government ought lightly or hastily to ask for; and I need not say to the House of Commons that no House of Commons ought lightly, or on insufficient grounds, to place such a power in the hands of a Government. In making the Motion I am about to submit, I make it under a deep sense which the Government entertain that, in the present state of Ireland, after having exhausted all the powers of the ordinary law, it is their imperative duty to ask Parliament for that additional power which will enable them to put an effectual check on a wicked and wide-spread conspiracy which now exists in Ireland, and afford protection to the loyal and faithful subjects of Her Majesty in that country. There may, indeed, be some who think that the Government are late in making this application, and that it ought to have been made sooner. I know that impression is entertained by some Gentlemen who, residing in Ireland, are deeply sensible of the alarm and apprehension which pervade that country, and of the injurious consequences which must ensue to Ireland from the treasonable proceedings which unhappily are going on there. But I do not think the House of Commons will censure the Government for having waited till they were convinced that every power of the ordinary law had proved ineffectual, and every constitutional form of proceeding had been exhausted, and that additional and extraordinary powers were necessary for the accomplishment of the object which we must have in view.

Sir, I need not advert in detail to the existence and the objects of the Fenian conspiracy; they are unhappily too notorious—too painfully notorious—to those Gentlemen who have resided in Ireland, and have shared—and shared, I believe, on reasonable grounds—in the alarm and apprehensions which the proceedings of persons engaged in that conspiracy have caused. The Fenian conspiracy has lately assumed proportions, a form, and an organization which could hardly have been expected a short time ago. I believe, if you go back to 1862, the Fenians were then known to exist in Ireland; and that persons calling themselves Fenians, in different parts of Ireland, were making speeches, and writing articles in the newspapers, of a seditious character, tending, if their opinions became generally prevalent, to subvert the institutions of the country. But those individuals were few and inconsiderable; and the Government, while they kept a watch upon them, did not think it would be wise or prudent at that time to use the power which the law placed in their hands by instituting prosecutions against them. A remarkable change, however, has taken place coincident with the cessation of the civil war in America. The connection of these two events—the cessation of the civil war in America, and the present form, extent, and organization of this conspiracy in Ireland—it is not difficult to trace. We all know that a very large number of Irishmen were engaged in the service of the United States, and formed a considerable part of the armies with which that civil war was conducted. On the termination of that war—their services being no longer required in the ranks of the army of the United States—these men concerted together, they met, and they formed themselves into associations for the purpose of organizing a conspiracy, in concert with disaffected persons in Ireland corresponding with them, to subvert the authority of the Queen in that country, and sever Ireland entirely from the Crown of England. We all know that meetings have been held; that conventions have met in America; and that there has been a complete organization, corresponding with a similar organization in Ireland, with a view to effect that treasonable object. The avowed objects of those conventions, those meetings, and that organization in America has been to excite and assist by money, by arms, and by men, insurrectionary movements in Ireland. For that purpose agents have been sent in large numbers from America to superintend operations in Ireland in correspondence with the leaders of the movement in America, and those agents have been most active in the measures they have taken with a view to the accomplishment of the purposes for which they were sent to this country. I am passing lightly over these matters, because I think it would be wasting the time of the House if I were to dwell on matters which are so notorious; but I may say that the proceeding of those men were closely watched by the Government. The Government were not indifferent to them, because they did not take immediate steps for the suppression of this conspiracy. The Government watched the conspirators till they could strike a blow with effect, and could strike it on evidence so clear, so cogent, and so overwhelming as would convince every one they were fully justified in the steps they had taken. But the time came when it appeared to the Government that they ought, without further delay, to defeat this conspiracy, and bring those persons to justice. Accordingly, on the 16th of September, a seizure was made by the Government of the paper called The Irish People. I should be ashamed to waste the time of the House by reading extracts from that paper to show its seditious and treasonable character. Evidence in abundance was given on this point at the Special Commissions held recently. Simultaneously with the seizure of The Irish People the principal leaders—or those supposed to be the principal leaders—in the conspiracy, were arrested, and the mass of documentary evidence which fell into the hands of the Government was of the clearest and most overwhelming character with respect to the designs of the conspirators and the means by which they sought to effect their objects. I need not trouble the House with many of those documents, because I am anxious to occupy your attention for only as short a time as is consistent with my duty; but let me read a paper seized on that occasion in the handwriting of a man named Stephens, well known as the leader of the movement in Ireland—a Head Centre, as he is called. This paper was proved to be in the handwriting of Stephens by a witness named Nagle in the trial of Patrick Connor, and was a part of the evidence adduced at the recent trials. This document was taken from a person named Patrick Power. It runs thus—“Brothers,—I regret to find that the letter I addressed to you has never reached you. Had you received it I am confident all would have been right before this, because I told you explicitly what to do, and, once you saw your way, it is sure to me that you would have done well. Far as I can understand your actual position and wishes now, the best course to take is to get all the working B's together, and after due deliberation and without favour to any one—acting purely and conscientiously for the good of the cause—to select one man to represent and direct you all. This selection made, the man of your choice should come up here at once, when he shall get instructions and authority to go on with the good work. There is no time to be lost. This year—and let there be no mistake about it—must be the year of action. I speak with a knowledge and authority to which no other man could pretend, and I repeat, the flag of Ireland—of the Irish Republic—must this year be raised. As I am much pressed for time I shall merely add that it shall be raised in a glow of hope such as never gleamed around it before. Be, then, of firm faith and the best of cheer, for all goes bravely on.

“Dublin, September 8, 1865.

Yours fraternally, J. P. Power.”

"N.B.—This letter must be read for the working B's only, and when read must be burnt."

I may observe that the letter "B" was used to designate captains in the Fenian force. The paper is dated September, 1865, a few days before the seizure of The Irish People. Now Stephens, as is well known, was subsequently arrested, and on his person were found documents, with which I need not trouble the House in detail. I may, however, mention that among those papers were lists of persons who had come from America to take part in the movement with the "rank" attached to each name. There is "colonel," "lieutenant-colonel," "captain," "sergeant," and so on. One person has the title of "major-general," and another that of "brigadier-general," against his name. There is also a statement of the sum of money advanced to those persons here or in Ireland, in two or three cases amounting to £70. In another column there is the date at which each had sailed from America. There was found on Stephen's a paper signed by a man named Kearney, who seems to have been employed in the manufacture of implements of war. In it there is the statement—

"I have got seven 'B's' (or captains), 54 'C's' (or sergeants), and about 400 rank and file, with five revolvers, fourteen rifles, and 300 pikes. I hope this will satisfy you."

That is the character of the documents which were found on the persons arrested. We all know that most of the persons arrested were tried by a Special Commission. These trials lasted for a considerable time, and the fullest evidence was given at the trials as to the guilt of the accused. It has been universally admitted that the trials were conducted with the greatest fairness and impartiality—in a manner which left on the public mind the impression that every man who had been convicted had been justly convicted. Sir, we hoped that those trials would have had the effect of checking the progress of the conspiracy. The Judges—the eminent Judges—before whom the prisoners were tried, in passing the sentences, addressed not the prisoners only, but the whole nation of Ireland in terms calculated to impress upon all who heard or read their words the dreadful consequences which must result to the country from the prosecution of this wicked, this insane conspiracy. They pointed out all these evils, and raised the voice of warning to the persons engaged in the conspiracy. It was hoped that these trials, and the circumstances connected with them, would have had a useful result. For a time the Government indulged in that hope, but with the escape of Stephens, which seemed to give them renewed energy, the activity of the conspirators increased. Shortly after these arrests, bills from America to the amount of no less than £3,000, addressed to the leaders of the conspiracy who were then in custody, were intercepted by the Government. The Irish People newspaper also, which had been suppressed in Dublin, was ostentatiously republished in America and sent to Ireland for circulation through the country. Of course, wherever that paper has been found containing treasonable articles it has been seized by order of the Government, and any person circulating it is subject, no doubt, to a prosecution; but if this paper is brought over and privately circulated by the agents who are constantly coming from America, it is impossible for the Government, under the existing powers of the law, to prevent it. It has been found that many persons who have been arrested were well supplied with arms, and places have been discovered in which the manufacture was carried on of bullets and other implements of war; and with them documents have been found in which the most treasonable appeals are made to the people, showing the purpose for which these arms were designed. A large number of persons—I do not call them American citizens, but Irishmen, who at a previous period left their country for America, and enrolled themselves in the Federal army, and who are termed Irish-Americans—a large number of those persons, who are well-known to the police, have returned to Ireland, and are now dispersed about the country. Not long ago a seizure was made of a large number of rifle bullets and other implements manufactured for the purpose of this conspiracy. One of these seizures was made on the 11th of January, and a document which I will read to the House was found on the person of a man named James Flood, who has since been tried and convicted on a charge of having been concerned in the manufacture of the bullets. This document purports to be a proclamation to the Irish people. It is dated the 30th of December, 1865, and is in the following terms:—

"To the Irish People.—Citizen Soldiers,—Again we address you on the importance of the coming struggle. To urge upon you the necessity of prudence we shall not now do, as your past conduct proves you to be men of prudence and discretion. But we shall urge upon you the necessity of earnest preparation. Let all true Irishmen understand one another. In a country where it is 'treason' to have a rifle it is necessary for you to put your weapons in concealment until the day of action. That grand work of liberation shall soon begin. Soon shall our country have an army of citizen-soldiers; soon shall the sunburst shine upon our hills. Our perfidious enemy, aware of the power with which she will have to cope, is making every preparation. She is fortifying her strongholds, barring her prisons, arming her 'loyal' subjects—amongst the rest, 'Orangemen.' She is sending English and Scotch troops to our country. But her strongholds shall give way; her prison doors shall fly open; her arms and her troops become an instrument against herself. She has to contend against that mightiest of powers, the outraged but almighty people. The perjured press, in their fear, thunder out against us. They and all Irish foes will have soon cause to regret the day they worked against their country. We call upon all classes of our countrymen, no matter what creed they profess, to stand forth and be ready to aid in the liberation of Ireland. Ours is no party cause. We embrace Protestants, Catholics, Dissenters, and all who love Ireland. For Ireland a Republic, for Ireland in freedom, we work. A band of patriots, bound together by all the ties of amity and patriotism, pledged to one another in the sacred cause of liberty, may ere long commence that glorious struggle for the accomplishment of which so many have sacrificed their lives on the scaffold and in the field. Let all true men hold themselves in readiness. We advise sobriety, preparation, and prudence. Remember Emmett! Think on your imprisoned countrymen.—By order of the Vigilance Committee. God save the People."

Now, the language of that proclamation may be ridiculed as contemptible here, because we know the power of England and how futile any attempt would be to raise an insurrection in Ireland. But we must bear in mind the effect which language like this, conveyed in such a proclamation, is likely to have upon an excitable people—a people, I say it emphatically, deluded by the hope that they will be assisted by an army from the United States. I am bound to say, on behalf of the Government of the United States, that this insurrectionary movement has received no countenance, not even a shadow of support, from them. I know that the hopes of these misguided men are altogether illusory. The very first moment an insurrection should arise, however disastrous the first consequences might be, the power and strength of this country must soon absolutely crush it. But those persons who have arrived from America in large numbers, and who are swearing in members in different parts of the country, are not only holding out these hopes to the uninstructed and half-informed peasants of the country, but they are also doing that which possibly might be attended with far more serious consequences. There is hardly a regiment in Ireland in which they have not contrived to introduce themselves, with the view of seducing the soldiers from their allegiance. But I can speak confidently, and with a firm conviction, of the loyalty of the army. I do not believe that the attempts of these men can have any influence on our military force. It is notorious, however, that in regiments composed in large measure of Irishmen, and some of them scattered in small detachments about the country, agents who have plenty of money in their hands may possess the means of influencing individual soldiers, of detaching them from their allegiance—a result which would only end in their own ruin and punishment. Some instances of that kind have come under the notice of the Government, and some individual soldiers—few in number, I am glad to say—are now under arrest, and awaiting their trials. Now, nothing can be more wicked than the attempts of these men to withdraw our soldiers from their sworn allegiance to their Sovereign, and it is clearly the duty of the Government to check all such attempts in the most effectual manner. It may be asked, "Why are not these agents arrested?" Well, many of them have been arrested, and many more of them are known to the Government and the police. But after what took place on the occasion of the seizure of The Irish People and the arrest of Stephens, it would appear that these agents have carefully abstained from having documents in their possession which would subject them to a criminal prosecution. There has been a great deal of money and gold found in their possession, but no documentary evidence to justify the Government in putting them upon their trial.

Sir, the result of this state of things has been a general feeling of alarm and insecurity pervading the whole country. Representations have been made to the Irish Government from time to time by different classes of persons, calling upon the Government to take measures for their protection, and to prevent a rising in their part of the country. Now, such a rising, though it would be immediately suppressed, would, no doubt, be attended in the first instance with bloodshed, massacre, and the other crimes which the people usually commit in the first moment of an insurrection. The Irish Government had to consider all these applications, and while anxious not to cause unnecessary alarm, have taken from time to time the measures which they felt to be necessary. From time to time reinforcements have been asked for, which were immediately sent over. The effect of this is shown by the proclamation which I have read to the House, in which mention is made of English and Scotch troops being sent to Ireland. There is not the slightest foundation for the statement that the Commander-in-Chief has taken steps to prevent regiments in which there was any considerable number of Irishmen from being sent to Ireland. I do not believe that the Commander-in-Chief has, in a single instance, departed from the regular roster; he has relied upon the loyalty of every regiment, and upon its faithfully discharging his duty. Another question for the Irish Government to consider was the expediency of sending detachments to different parts of the country. It is clear that to station troops in small detachments in different parts of the country is liable to great objection. So strong, however, were the representations received from various parts of the country, and so well founded appeared to be the apprehensions of danger in consequence of the language and conduct of the conspirators, that the Government have felt it to be its duty to send detachments of troops to afford the protection which was urgently demanded.

Sir, I wish to show that the Government have taken all the means in their power to deal with the existing state of circumstances. They exerted all the powers they possess, and resorted to the ordinary legal processes for the punishment of the conspirators. Indeed, they are still doing so. Arrests are now taking place from day to day, as sufficient evidence is obtained, and every person apprehended is taken before the ordinary constitutional tribunals of the country. They have been asked to send, and have sent, the reinforcements which were necessary to afford protection and security to the loyal and faithful subjects of Her Majesty in Ireland. And, in addition to this, the Government has used the power given by the Peace Preservation Act of proclaiming counties in Ireland. This, I believe, has been done to a greater extent than it ever has been before. The object of this was to detect manufactories of implements of war, and the arms which the Government had reason to believe were collected to a large extent with a view of their being placed in the hands of the people when the intended rising should take place. Several maritime counties have been proclaimed in order that vessels arriving from America may be searched, and the consequence has been that a large quantity of arms have been seized by the Government. Now, the Government possesses no other powers except the use of the military force, which could hardly be relied upon to prevent the possibility of a rising in some part of the country. They have no other power beyond that of arresting and sending before the ordinary tribunals the principal persons concerned in the movement. Thirty-six of the principal leaders of the movement are now undergoing penal servitude for various terms, and others are undergoing imprisonment; but every vessel arriving from America brings agents with fresh supplies of money, and these agents endeavour to excite delusive expectations among the people, which cannot but have a very bad effect. I may say here that the proposal we are now making is not suddenly or hastily adopted. Lord Wodehouse has anticipated its probable necessity, and has communicated to the Government his belief that it might possibly be indispensable to have recourse to such a measure. He, however, felt it was his duty to exhaust every power which the ordinary law and the ordinary means at the command of the Government placed in his hands before Parliament should be asked to assent to this extreme measure. On the 21st of January, after the reinforcements he had applied for had been sent to him, he wrote to me a letter, of which the following is an extract:—

"I hope that the presence of troops in some of the towns may perhaps allay the general alarm. I am, however, by no means confident on this point, and I wish to call the serious attention of the Government to the state of affairs here, which I regret to say becomes daily more unsatisfactory. When The Irish People was seized and the arrests made, the Fenians were for a while stunned by the blow, especially by the arrest of Stephens; but after Stephens' escape their spirits greatly revived, and their activity was renewed. At the present moment, notwithstanding the perfect success of the Crown at the trials, they are more active than ever. I waited patiently to see whether the alarm in the country would subside; but the alarm has gone on continually increasing. I am now disposed to try what effect can be produced by proclamations, and by detaching troops to the more remote districts. With this view we are about to send troops to Tralee and Sligo, and to proclaim the counties of Sligo and Carlow in accordance with the strongly expressed wishes of the magistrates. Other proclamations will probably become necessary hereafter. But I do not expect that these measures will be sufficient; and, in common with Mr. Fortescue and the Attorney General, I have come to the conclusion that we may have to propose to the Cabinet to ask Parliament to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act. What we have to deal with is a secret revolutionary organization spread over a great part of the country, supported by money from the Irish in America and Great Britain. This organization has its paid agents in most of the towns in Ireland, diligently propagating rebellion and swearing in recruits. I send you a return of men who served in the American war, who are known to the constabulary as Fenian agents. There are, no doubt, others who escape notice. I have asked for a similar return from the rest of Ireland. These are the men who would take command of the rebels, and there cannot be a more dangerous class. Besides them, we know that there are some hundreds of men in Dublin and elsewhere who have come over from England and Scotland, who receive regular pay, and are waiting for the signal of an outbreak. Now, we see no remedy for this but the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. We should be able to arrest the paid agents of revolution, and to prevent the assemblage in the capital of men sent over specially to take part in a rising. The remedy may appear sharp, but the disease is very serious, and I am convinced will yield to nothing but sharp treatment. Without saying that the moment has actually arrived for so strong a measure as the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, I have thought it right to warn the Cabinet that, in my judgment, that moment is not far distant.

"P.S. I forgot to mention that we have arrested at various times and places the American-Irish agents, but they are too wary to carry about with them the evidence necessary to convict them. We usually find on them drill-books and a sum of money—sometimes considerable—in gold."

MR. ROEBUCK: What is the date of that letter?

SIR GEORGE GREY: The 21st of January. The next letter which I think it necessary to read from Lord Wodehouse relating to this subject—and I may say that for some time past I have been almost in daily communication with him on the matter—is dated the 4th of February, and in it he says—

"I have little hope of pacifying the alarm, which is doing most serious injury to every interest here, without seizing the agents, who are busily employed all over the country, sowing sedition and organizing the conspiracy."

On the 9th of February he wrote a letter the substance of which was that he still desired to try whether, by a judicious disposal of the troops at his command, he could not effect his object without having recourse to more extreme measures. But on Thursday last I received a letter which the House will allow me to read. It is dated the 14th of February, and it reached me on the afternoon of the following day. In it he says—

"I have come to the conclusion, after most careful consideration, that the time has arrived when it is indispensable for the safety of this country that the Habeas Corpus Act should be suspended. The Chancellor and Mr. Fortescue authorize me to say that they entirely concur in the pressing urgency of the measure."

And here I may say that Mr. Fortescue is willing to shrink from no share of the responsibility attaching to this proposal. He is himself an Irishman, and all who know him are aware that he would be the last man unnecessarily to recommend that any extreme measure of this kind should be adopted. But so fully convinced is he of its necessity in the present case, that he wrote to the head of the Government to say how entirely he concurred in the recommendation which he was aware Lord Wodehouse had addressed to us. The Lord Lieutenant's letter goes on to say—

"There is a complete agreement among my advisers, and they feel most strongly with me the urgent necessity for prompt, indeed immediate, action. The state of affairs is very serious. The conspirators, undeterred by the punishment of so many of their leaders, are actively organizing an outbreak with a view to destroy the Queen's authority. Sir Hugh Rose details the various plans they have in contemplation."

He has discovered that these agents are making plans of detached forts and barracks.

"And he draws no exaggerated picture. There are scattered over the country a number of agents who are swearing in members, and who are prepared to take the command when the moment arrives. These men are of the most dangerous class. They are Irishmen imbued with American notions, thoroughly reckless, and possessed of considerable military experience, acquired on a field of warfare (the civil war in America) admirably adapted to train them for conducting an insurrection here. There are 340 such men known to the police in the provinces, and those known in Dublin amount to about 160, so that in round numbers there are 500—of course there are many more who escape notice. This number is being augmented by fresh men constantly arriving from America. In Dublin itself there are several hundred men (perhaps about 300 or 400) who have come over from England and Scotland who receive 1s. 6d. a day, and are waiting for the time of action. Any one may observe these men loitering about at the corners of the streets. As to arms, we have found no less than three regular manufactories of pikes, bullets, and cartridges in Dublin. The police believe that several more exist. Of course, bullets are not made unless there are rifles to put them in. The disaffection of the population in certain counties, such as Cork, Tipperary, Waterford, Dublin, is alarming, and it is day by day spreading more and more through every part of the country. But the most dangerous feature in the present movement is the attempt to seduce the troops. Are we to allow these agents to go on instilling their poison into our armed force, upon which our security mainly depends?"

These attempts, as I have said before, have been successful to only a very limited and partial extent, but such as they are they will, I fear, implicate certain persons in consequences to them of the most serious character. The letter proceeds to say—

"I feel confident that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act will have a most salutary effect. It is remarkable that our reports show that the Fenian leaders are saying that there is no time to lose, as if they delay the Act will be suspended. I trust that the Cabinet will not think me an alarmist. I have watched every symptom here for many months, and it is my deliberate conviction that no time should now be lost in suspending the Act. I cannot be responsible for the safety of the country if power is not forthwith given to the government to seize the leaders. With that power I hope still to avert serious mischief. I most earnestly urge that the Bill for the suspension be brought in without delay."

Sir, upon the receipt of that letter, I communicated at once with the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and asked that a Cabinet Council should be immediately summoned. It was summoned, and took this letter into consideration. We felt it to be our imperative duty—a duty from which we could not shrink—immediately to lay these facts before the House of Commons, and to invite them to concur in granting those powers which the Lord Lieutenant and his advisers, and Her Majesty's Government deem absolutely essential for the safety of the country.

Sir, there is one consideration of a very satisfactory nature connected with this matter. This conspiracy differs from other conspiracies which have existed in Ireland in this—that it embraces within its sphere, I believe, no persons of any position or influence in the country—I mean, of course, no persons who, from their position among their countrymen, are entitled to any just influence. I think the paragraph in the Queen's Speech most justly describes this conspiracy. It is one not for a repeal of the Union, retaining the connection of Ireland with the British Crown, or any legislative change, but one the avowed object of which is to wrest Ireland from the British Crown, and transfer it in subjection to some foreign Power. That Speech describes it as "a conspiracy against authority, property, and religion," and justly characterizes it as a conspiracy—I will not say discountenanced but reprobated by every one who had anything to lose, and who has any regard for authority and religion, irrespective of creed or class. That is a most satisfactory consideration for us in dealing with this conspiracy. It shows that it is no social or political injustice which has given rise to this conspiracy. The truth is, it is a conspiracy which emanates from abroad. Its centre is in America, whence its agents and leaders have come to this country who are endeavouring by combined action to stir up the people to insurrection for the purpose of wresting Ireland from the British Crown.

Let me allude to that great meeting which was held lately in Dublin, comprising men of different politics and different creeds—some supporters of the general policy of Government, others its opponents—but all uniting together in the expression of their alarm at the present state of things, and all pledging themselves as loyal subjects of the Crown to give every assistance to the Government, in putting down the conspiracy, and in restoring peace and security in Ireland.

Sir, the disastrous consequences which must follow from such a state of things as now exists, should it remain unchecked, are too obvious to require me to dwell on them. It must paralyze industry; must deter capital from coming into the country; must check every development of its resources; and prevent every practicable improvement in its condition. It is most important, therefore, for the interests of the country, that the conspiracy should be checked. All I ask this House to do is to judge for themselves whether, from what I have stated, and from their own knowledge of the facts, it is not notorious and patent that a conspiracy, dangerous to the peace and destructive to the interests of Ireland, exists in that country; whether the Government have zealously, and energetically exerted the powers at present vested in them by the law in endeavouring to check this conspiracy; and then, if that be so, whether I have not made a sufficient case to justify me in coming to Parliament and asking for additional powers by which this conspiracy may be put down. If the House is satisfied that there is good cause for the proposals I have made, let me add one word more. I trust hon.

Members will feel that it is important that the powers asked for should be placed in the hands of the Government with the least possible delay, because the object in view might be defeated by delay. The Government make this proposal upon their own responsibility; and it is now for the House of Commons, looking to the great interests at stake and to the important object to be attained, to decide whether they will share with the Government the responsibility of giving to the Government of Ireland the power asked for, to enable it to deal effectually with this evil. I trust hon. Members will feel I have made out a sufficient case for the proposal of the Government. No Government, as I have already said, ought lightly to make such a proposal; no man ought individually to support it unless convinced of its necessity; and no House of Commons should—and I am sure none would—lightly, and on insufficient grounds, place such power in the hands of the Government. I trust, however, that if the House feels it essential, with a view to the security of Ireland, it will arm the Government with the power requisite to counteract and suppress as wicked a conspiracy as was ever conceived, audaciously promoted by men who know how to keep within the limits of the law and not expose themselves to its penalties, and thus to protect Ireland from the disasters and horrors of insurrection. It is not with a view to punishment, but with a view to prevention, that this power is asked for. The effect of its being exercised with the discretion upon which we can rely, will be to frustrate the mad attempt to stir up insurrection. It will afford the most effectual check—indeed, the only effectual check—upon the proceedings of the emissaries of sedition and treason in Ireland. We propose to limit the operation of the Bill to six months, ending on the 1st of September, a period which we hope will be sufficient to accomplish the object in view; and Parliament will have an opportunity before it separates to consider whether it is necessary—which, I trust, it will not be—to leave that power in the hands of the Government for a longer period. Sir, I have now to move that leave be given to bring in a Bill to empower the Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland to apprehend and detain for a limited time such persons as he or they shall suspect of conspiring against Her Majesty's Person and Government.

Motion made, and Question proposed.

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to empower the Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland to apprehend and detain, for a limited time, such persons as he or they shall suspect of conspiring against Her Majesty's Person and Government."—(Sir G. Grey.)

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I listened with much concern to the notice given by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State yesterday, and I have heard his narrative this morning with unaffected anxiety. For a Government to come forward to suspend the most precious constitutional right of the people is an act which requires on their part the greatest courage; and if a Parliament concede such a measure it is obvious that it must be done with the utmost reluctance. I, therefore, cannot agree with some expressions of opinion that I have listened to—that Her Majesty's Ministers should be blamed because they have hesitated in coming forward to make this proposition. If, indeed, this were the occasion on which to criticise the conduct of Her Majesty's Government with regard to their administration of Irish affairs, I would rather myself have touched upon the delay, the hesitation, and the want of prescience and energy which have been exhibited by Her Majesty's Government with respect to these matters on preceding occasions. For example, it was only last year that an act was repealed under which Her Majesty's Ministers might have obtained all the powers that are now necessary, without having recourse to Parliament, under the pressure of the extreme circumstances which now exist. The Members of the present House, who were Members of the last Parliament, will recollect that an Act—an antiquated Act of Parliament—called the Rapparee Act was repealed during the last Session. That was an Act of the reign of Queen Anne. I believe there was no objection from any party in this House to concede the repeal of an Act which was entirely obsolete, and which was totally unworthy of this country. But during the passing of that Act—a clause from a comparatively modern Act of Parliament—I believe the 50 Geo. III—which was inserted during the progress of the Bill, was also repealed. Under that clause I believe the Government of the Queen possessed, and might have exercised, all those powers which are necessary, without the necessity of coming forward to ask, I admit with due reason, this infraction of the Constitution of the realm. I consider that Parliament is entitled to some further explanation on this point from Her Majesty's Ministers. We are told, and told justly, by Her Majesty's Government that these insurrectionary movements in Ireland have been greatly stimulated and precipitated by the termination of the struggle in America—by the conclusion of the civil war in that country. The repealed clause in the Act of George III. empowered the government of Ireland to arrest all vagrant strangers who had no ostensible home, who could give no satisfactory account of themselves, and could allege no legitimate occupation. The Bill for the repeal of the Act, and of the clause in question, was before Parliament for a considerable period during the last Session. The conclusion of the American civil war was pretty certain early in the spring. Wilmington was taken in April. The evacuation of Richmond followed shortly afterwards. The attention of Government ought to have been given, and confessedly was given, to the Fenian movement long before these events took place; and it is a circumstance which requires ample explanation why the Government permitted such an important provision to be repealed when they were duly cognizant of the disturbed and menacing condition of Ireland. Surely, when we are told that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has given such unbroken and anxious attention and vigilance to the affairs of that country, it is not unreasonable for Parliament to expect that the Lord Lieutenant and his Advisers, and Her Majesty's Ministers in this country, should not allow changes in the laws that regulate the condition of affairs in Ireland to take place unnoticed, when, by their negligence, such serious consequences might be produced. Had this clause to which I have referred not been repealed, if the interpretation I put upon it be correct, these dangers, now imminent, could never have arisen, and much of the danger and injury to which Ireland has already been subjected might have been prevented without infringing the rights of orderly and loyal men. But, although I have thought it necessary to advert for a moment to a point of great interest to the country at present, and which requires a due explanation from Her Majesty's Government, I have now to look upon the existing state of affairs in Ireland, and I have to ask myself what is our duty under present circumstances. So far as I am concerned I cannot hesitate upon this subject; and I, for one, shall follow exactly the course which I pursued in the year 1848 under similar circumstances when, by an unhappy destiny, the present First Minister of the country was obliged to appeal to Parliament to sanction a similar violation of the Constitution. If, on that occasion, when I consented to support the appeal of the Government I had believed that the menaced insurrection in Ireland was occasioned by any misgovernment of that country—although I admit that even under such circumstances a consent to the proposition of the Ministry might have been necessary—still, in giving that assent I should have coupled with it an expression of my hope that Her Majesty's Ministers would have taken into consideration measures of a remedial character. But upon that occasion, as upon this, it was perfectly clear that the state of affairs in Ireland was not produced by any domestic or internal cause. It is not now produced by any agrarian cause, because it is well known that the most influential class among the agricultural population, just referred to by the Secretary of State, has, with great reluctance, sanctioned these movements, or connected itself with them. It is not a movement produced by any religious grievances; on the contrary, it is undoubtedly the truth that the Roman Catholic priesthood of Ireland has opposed and discouraged by all its means and powers this disposition and these movements on the part of the disaffected, opposing revolutionary principles as they always have done, and as becomes the priesthood of an ancient and authoritative Church. And no one can hold for a moment that this is a movement occasioned by the ordinary political passions which influence a free country. It is not to obtain increased privileges, and it is not to secure denied rights. It is, on the contrary, so far as political influences can affect men, an attempt upon the majesty of England. It is not directed against the predominance of a party. It is not directed against the authority of any particular institution or establishment; but it aims at the Throne of England and the greatness of her Empire. Under these circumstances, I cannot hesitate to give a complete support to the proposition of the Government. Whether the preceding policy of the Government did encourage such a state of affairs as now exists in Ireland is a legitimate subject for future Parliamentary question and investigation; but all that the House has to consider now is, whether the statement of the present condition of Ireland made by the Secretary of State, is a correct one. Who can doubt it? Who can doubt these facts which are known in their general character to all of us? Her Majesty's Government asks us to legislate upon events and circumstances of which we ourselves are the competent judges. They do not come here as in old days with a conspiracy in a green bag to startle the country by sudden revelations into violent courses. They have given us a statement of the condition of a portion of Her Majesty's dominions of which we, from our own experience, are competent judges. I do not for one moment question the authenticity of the statement made by the Secretary of State, and I cannot for a moment hesitate as to the course I shall pursue with regard to it. But if the House consent, as I hope it will—and consent unanimously—to this proposition; if we are prepared to give the Ministry with respect to this, and to all arrangements connected with this subject, a unanimous and unwavering support, I would impress also upon the House the immense importance of the utmost promptitude of action. It is not merely that promptitude of action may prevent immediate and future calamity and mischief, but if Parliament be unanimous in supporting Her Majesty's Ministers in this proposition, and prompt in carrying the measure into effect, there is a proportionately better chance of diminishing the period during which this exceptional state of affairs is to continue. It is therefore in the interest of the liberty of Ireland itself; it is in favour of its freedom and the continuance of its privileges; that I say it is our duty and our policy if we consent, as I doubt not we shall consent to the measure of the Government, that we should support those regulations by which the passage of this measure shall be carried without a moment's delay. I trust that the House will, by its cordial and unanimous support of the Government, show to Europe that we are resolved to maintain the Majesty of the Crown of England, and that the people of this country—prepared as they are on all occasions to legislate for their fellow-subjects in Ireland in a spirit of conciliation and of justice—are resolved that no foreign conspiracy shall deprive Her Majesty of one of the most valuable portions of her dominions.

MR. BRIGHT: I owe an apology to the Irish Members for stepping in to make an observation to the House on this question. My strong interest in the affairs of their country, ever since I came into Parliament, will be my sufficient excuse. The Secretary of State, on the part of the Government of which he is a Member, has called us together on an unusual day and at an unusual hour, to consider a proposition of the greatest magnitude, and which we are informed is one of extreme urgency. If it be so, I hope it will not be understood that we are here merely to carry out the behests of the Administration; and that we are to be permitted, if we choose, to observe upon this measure, and if possible to say something which may mitigate the apparent harshness of the course which the Government feels itself compelled to pursue. It is now more than twenty-two years since I was first permitted to take my seat in this House. During that time I have on many occasions, with great favour, been allowed to address it, but I declare that during the whole of that period I have never risen to speak here under so strong a feeling, as a Member of the House, of shame and of humiliation, as that by which I feel myself oppressed at this moment. The Secretary of State proposes—as the right hon. Gentleman himself has said—to deprive no inconsiderable portion of the subjects of the Queen—our countrymen, within the United Kingdom—of the commonest, of the most precious, and of the most sacred right of the English Constitution, the right to their personal freedom. From the statement of the Secretary of State it is clear that this is not asked to be done, or required to be done, with reference only to a small section of the Irish people. He has named great counties, wide districts, whole provinces, over which this alleged and undoubted disaffection has spread, and has proposed that five or six millions of the inhabitants of the United Kingdom shall suffer the loss of that right of personal freedom that is guaranteed to all Her Majesty's subjects by the Constitution of these realms. Now, I do not believe that the Secretary of State has overstated his case for the purpose of inducing the House to consent to his proposition. I believe that if the majority of the people of Ireland, counted fairly out, had their will, and if they had the power, they would unmoor the island from its fastenings in the deep, and move it at least 2,000 miles to the West. And I believe, further, that if by conspiracy, or insurrection, or by that open agitation to which alone I ever would give any favour or consent, they could shake off the authority, I will not say of the English Crown, but of the Imperial Parliament, they would gladly do so. An hon. Member from Ireland a few nights ago referred to the character of the Irish people. He said, and I believe it is true, that there is no Christian nation with which we are acquainted amongst the people of which crime of the ordinary character, as we reckon it in this country, is so rare as it is amongst his countrymen. He might have said, also, that there is no people—whatever they may be at home—more industrious than his countrymen in every other country but their own. He might have said more; that they are a people of a cheerful and joyous temperament. He might have said more than this—that they are singularly grateful for kindnesses shown to them, and that of all the people of our race they are filled with the strongest sentiment of veneration. And yet, with such materials, and with such a people, after centuries of government—after sixty-five years of government by this House—you have them embittered against your rule, and anxious only to throw off the authority of the Crown and Queen of these realms. Now, this is not a single occasion we are discussing. This is merely an access of the complaint Ireland has been suffering under during the lifetime of the oldest man in this House, of chronic insurrection. No man can deny this. I dare say a large number of the Members of this House had, at the time to which the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire referred, heard the same speech on the same subject, from the same Minister to whom we have listened to-day. [Sir G. GREY: No!] I certainly thought I heard the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department make a speech before on the same question, but he was a Minister of the Government on whose behalf a similar speech was made on the occasion referred to, and no doubt concurred in every word that was uttered by his Colleague. Sixty-five years ago this country undertook to govern Ireland. I will say nothing of the manner in which that duty was brought upon us—except this—that it was by proceedings disgraceful and corrupt to the last degree. I will say nothing of the pretences under which it was brought about but this—that the English Parliament and people, and the Irish people, too, were told, if you once get rid of the Irish Parliament it will dethrone for ever Irish factions, and with a united Parliament we shall become a united, and stronger, and happier people. Now, during these sixty-five years—and on this point I ask for the attention of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) who has just spoken—there are only three considerable measures which Parliament has passed in the interests of Ireland. One of them was the measure of 1829, for the emancipation of the Catholics and to permit them to have seats in this House. But that measure, so just, so essential, and which, of course, is not ever to be recalled, was a measure which the chief Minister of the day, a great soldier, and a great judge of military matters, admitted was passed in the face of the menace of, and only because of, the danger of civil war. The other two measures to which I have referred are the measure for the relief of the poor, and the measure for the sale of the incumbered estates; and those measures were introduced to the House and passed through the House in the emergency of a famine more severe than any that has desolated any Christian country of the world within the last 400 years. Except on these two emergencies I appeal to every Irish Member, and to every English Member who has paid any attention to the matter, whether the statement is not true that this Parliament has done nothing for the people of Ireland. And, more than that, their complaints have been met—complaints of their sufferings have been met—often by denial, often by insult, often by contempt. And within the last few years we have heard from this very Treasury Bench observations with regard to Ireland which no friend of Ireland or of England, and no Minister of the Crown, ought to have uttered with regard to that country. Twice in my Parliamentary life this thing has been done—at least, by the close of this day will have been done—and measures of repression—measures for the suspension of the civil rights of the Irish people—have been brought into Parliament and passed with extreme and unusual rapidity. I have not risen to blame the Secretary of State, or to blame his Colleagues for the act of to-day. There may be circumstances to justify a proposition of this kind, and I am not here to deny that these circumstances now exist; but what I complain of is this: there is no statesmanship merely in acts of force and acts of repression. And more than that, I have not observed since I have been in Parliament anything on this Irish question that approaches to the dignity of statesmanship. There has been, I admit, an improved administration in Ireland. There have been Lord-Lieutenants anxious to be just, and there is one there now who is probably as anxious to do justice as any man. We have observed generally in the recent trials a better tone and temper than were ever witnessed under similar circumstances in Ireland before. But if I go back to the Ministers who have sat on the Treasury Bench since I first came into this House — Sir Robert Peel first, then Lord John Russell, then Lord Aberdeen, then Lord Derby, then Lord Palmerston, then Lord Derby again, then Lord Palmerston again, and now Earl Russell—I say that with regard to all these men, there has not been any approach to anything that history will describe as statesmanship on the part of the English Government towards Ireland. There were Coercion Bills in abundance — Arms Bills Session after Session — lamentations like that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was not made perpetual by a clause which he laments was repealed. There have been Acts for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, like that which we are now discussing; but there has been no statesmanship. Men the most clumsy, and brutal, can do these things; but we want men of higher temper—men of higher genius—men of higher patriotism to deal with the affairs of Ireland. I should like to know whether those statesmen who hold great offices have themselves comprehended the nature of this question. If they have not, they have been manifestly ignorant; and if they have comprehended it they have not dealt with it, they have concealed that which they knew from the people, and evaded the duty they owed to their Sovereign. I do not want to speak disrespectfully of men in office. It is not my custom in this House. I know something of the worrying labours to which they are subjected, and I know not how from day to day they bear the burden of the labour imposed upon them; but still I lament that those who wear the garb—enjoy the emoluments—and I had almost said usurp the dignity of statesmanship, sink themselves merely into respectable and honourable administrators, when there is a whole nation under the sovereignty of the Queen calling for all their anxious thoughts—calling for the highest exercise of the highest qualities of the statesman. I put the question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He is the only man of this Government whom I have heard of late years that has spoken as if he comprehended this question, and he made a speech in the last Session of Parliament that was not without its influence both in England and in Ireland. I should like to ask him whether this Irish question is above the stature of himself and of his Colleagues? If it be, I ask them to come down from the high places which they occupy, and try to learn the art of legislation and government before they practise it. I believe myself, if we could divest ourselves of the feelings engendered by party strife we might come to some better result. Take the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Is there in any legislative assembly in the world a man, as the world judges, of more transcendent capacity? I will say even, is there a man with a more honest wish to do good to the country in which he occupies such a conspicuous place? Take the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the leader of the Opposition—is there in any legislative assembly in the world, at this moment, a man leading an Opposition of more genius for his position, who has given in every way but one in which proof can be given that he is competent to the highest duties of the highest offices of the State? Well, but these men, great men whom we on this side and you on that side, to a large extent, admire and follow—fight for office, and the result is they sit alternately one on this side and one on that. But suppose it were possible for these men, with their intellects, with their far-reaching vision, to examine this question thoroughly, and to say for once, whether this leads to office and to the miserable notoriety that men call fame which springs from office, or not, “If it be possible, we will act with loyalty to the Sovereign and justice to the people, and if it be possible, we will make Ireland a strength and not a weakness to the British Empire.” It is on account of this fighting with party, and for party, and for the gains which party gives, that there is so little result from the great intellect of such men as these. Like the captive Samson of old,

With their Heaven-gifted strength—” and the country and the world gain little by those faculties which God has given them for the blessing of the country and the world. The Secretary of State, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite, even in stronger language, has referred to the unhappy fact that much of what now exists in Ireland has been brought there from the United States of America. That is not a fact for us to console ourselves with; it only adds to the gravity and the difficulty of this question. You may depend upon it that if the Irish in America, having left this country, settle there with so strong a hostility to us, they have had their reasons—and if being there with that feeling of affection for their native country which in all other cases in which we are not concerned we admire and reverence, they interfere in Ireland and stir up there the sedition that now exists, depend upon it there is in the condition of Ireland a state of things which greatly favours their attempts. There can be no continued fire without fuel, and all the Irish in America, and all the citizens of America, united together, with all their organization and all their vast resources, would not in England or in Scotland raise the very slightest flame of sedition or of insurrectionary movement. I want to know why they can do it in Ireland? Are you to say, as some people say in America and in Jamaica when speaking of the black man, that “Nothing can be made of the Irishman?” Everything can be made of him in every country but his own. When he has passed through the American school—I speak of him as a child, or in the second generation of the Irish emigrant in that country—he is as industrious, as frugal, as independent, as loyal, as good a citizen of the American republic, as any man born within the dominions of that Power. Why is it not so in Ireland? I have asked the question before, and I will ask it again—it is a pertinent question, and it demands an answer. Why is it that no Scotchman who leaves Scotland—and the Scotch have been taunted and ridiculed for being so fond of leaving their country for a better climate and a better soil—how comes it, I ask, that no Scotchman who emigrates to the United States, and no Englishman who plants himself there, cherishes the smallest hostility to the people, to the institutions or to the Government of his native country? Why does every Irishman who leaves his country and goes to the United States immediately settle himself down there, resolved to better his condition in life, but with a feeling of ineradicable hatred to the laws and institutions of the land of his birth? Is not that a fit question for statesmanship? If the Secretary of State, since his last measure was brought in, now eighteen years ago, had had time, in the multiplicity of his duties, to consider this question, possibly, instead of now moving for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, he might have been rejoicing at the universal loyalty which prevailed, not throughout Great Britain only, but throughout the whole population of Ireland. I spent two autumns in Ireland in the years

1849 and 1852, and I recollect making a speech in this House not long afterwards, which some persons thought was not very wide of the mark. I recommended the Ministers of that time to take an opportunity to hold an Irish Session of the Imperial Parliament—to have no great questions discussed connected with the ordinary matters which are brought before us, but to keep Parliament to the consideration of this Irish question solely, and to deal with those great matters which are constant sources of complaint; and I said that a Session that was so devoted to such a blessed and holy work, would be a Session, if it were successful, that would stand forth in all our future history as one of the noblest which had ever passed in the annals of the Imperial Parliament. Now, Sir, a few days ago everybody in this House, with two or three exceptions, was taking an oath at that table. It is called the oath of allegiance. It is meant at once to express loyalty and to keep men loyal. I do not think it generally does bind men to loyalty, if they have not loyalty without it. I hold loyalty to consist, in a country like this, as much in doing justice to the people as in guarding the Crown—for I believe there is no guardianship of the Crown, in a country like this, where the Crown is not supposed to rest absolutely upon force, so safe as that of which we know more in our day probably than has been known in former periods of our history, when the occupant of the Throne is respected, admired, and loved by the general people. Now, how comes it that those great statesmen whom I have named, with all their Colleagues, some of them as eminent almost as their leaders, have never tried what they could do—have never shown their loyalty to the Crown by endeavouring to make the Queen as safe in the hearts of the people of Ireland as she is in the hearts of the people of England and of Scotland. Bear in mind that the Queen of England can do almost nothing in these matters. By our Constitution the Crown can take no direct part in them. The Crown cannot direct the policy of the Government—nay, the Crown cannot, without the consent of this House, even select its Ministers; therefore the Crown is helpless in this matter. And we have in this country a Queen, who, in all the civilized nations of the world is looked upon as a model of a Sovereign, and yet her name and fame are discredited and dishonoured by circumstances such as those which have twice during her reign called us together to agree to a proposition like that which is brought before us to-day. Now, there is an instructive anecdote to be found in the annals of the Chinese Empire. In a remote province there was an insurrection. The Emperor put down the insurrection, but he abased and humbled himself before his people, and said that if he had been guilty of neglect he acknowledged his guilt, and he humbled himself before those on whom he had brought the evil of an insurrection in one of his provinces. The Queen of these realms is not so responsible. She cannot thus humble herself; but I say that your statesmen for the last sixty—for the last forty—years are thus guilty, and they ought to humble themselves before the people of this country for their neglect. But I have heard from Members in this House—I have seen much writing in newspapers—and I have heard of speeches elsewhere, in which some of us, who advocate what we believe to be a great and high morality in public affairs, are charged with dislike to the institutions, and even disloyalty to the dynasty which rules in England. There can be nothing more offensive, nothing more unjust, nothing more utterly false. We who ask Parliament, in dealing with Ireland, to deal with it upon the unchangeable principles of justice, are the friends of the people, and the really loyal advisers and supporters of the Throne. All history teaches us that it is not in human nature that men should be content under any system of legislation, and of institutions such as exists in Ireland. You may pass this Bill, you may put the Home Secretary's 500 men into gaol—you may do all this, and suppress the conspiracy and put down the insurrection, but the moment it is suppressed there will still remain the germs of this malady, and from those germs will grow up as heretofore another crop of insurrection and another harvest of misfortune. And it may be that those who sit here eighteen years after this moment will find another Ministry and another Secretary of State to propose to you another administration of the same ever-failing and ever-poisonous medicine. I say there is a mode of making Ireland loyal. I say that the Parliament of England having abolished the Parliament of Ireland is doubly bound to examine what that mode is, and, if it can discover it, to adopt it. I say that the Minister who occupies office in this country, merely that he may carry on the daily routine of Administration, who dares not grapple with this question, who dares not go into Opposition, and who will sit anywhere except where he can tell his mind freely to the House and the country, may have a high position in this country, but he is not a statesman, nor is he worthy of the name. Sir, I shall not oppose the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman. The circumstances, I presume, are such that the course which is about to be pursued is perhaps the only merciful course for Ireland. But I suppose it is not the intention of the Government, in the case of persons who are arrested, and against whom any just complaint can be made, to do anything more than that which the ordinary law permits, and that when men are brought to trial they will be brought to trial with all the fairness and all the advantages which the ordinary law gives. I should say what was most unjust to the Gentlemen sitting on that (the Treasury) Bench, if I said aught else than that I believe they are as honestly disposed to do right in this matter as I am and as I have ever been. I implore them, if they can, to shake off the trammels of doubt and fear with regard to this question, and to say something that may be soothing—something that may give hope to Ireland. I voted the other night with the hon. Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue). We were in a very small minority. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes! I have often been in small minorities. The hon. Gentleman would have been content with a word of kindness and of sympathy, not for conspiracy, but for the people of Ireland. That word was not inserted in the Queen's Speech, and to-night the Home Secretary has made a speech urging the House to the course which, I presume, is about to be pursued; but he did not in that speech utter a single sentence with regard to a question which lies behind, and is greater and deeper than that which he discussed. I hope, Sir, that if Ministers feel themselves bound to take this course of suspending the common rights of personal freedom to a whole nation, at least they will not allow this debate to close without giving to us and to that nation some hope that before long measures will be considered and will be introduced which will tend to create the same loyalty in Ireland that exists in Great Britain. If every man outside the walls of this House who has the interest of the whole Empire at heart were to speak here, what would he say to this House? Let not one day elapse, let not another Session pass, until you have done something to wipe off this blot—for blot it is upon the reign of the Queen, and scandal

MR. HORSMAN: I appeal to the House whether the hon. Gentleman did not more than once refer to previous speeches that he has made in this House on the Church and Land questions, and if it was not upon those speeches, and upon the part which he took in reference to the Incumbered Estates Court, that he founded his claim to the gratitude of Irishmen. At any rate, the hon. Gentleman said that he would give the Government the benefit of his support. He said he would support them on the present occasion. [MR. BRIGHT: No!] Then I am to take it that he will not support the Government. At any rate, though I do not know what amount of value they might have placed on his vote, I am certain of this—that the Fenian conspirators will place a great deal of value upon his speech, I am quite sure that that speech will be very valuable to them. Sir, that speech did not surprise me, for I know, from what has often taken place here that whenever English authority comes into any collision with foreign interests in any part of the world, the conclusion of the hon. Member for Birmingham has always been that England is in the wrong and the enemies of England always in the right. I do not deny the patriotism of the hon. Member; but it seems to be a patriotism of that kind so well described by Canning, in the Anti-Jacobin—and that he is one of those

And friends of every country but their own.”

But what particularly made me rise was a phrase which the hon. Gentleman used, and which certainly did surprise me. He said that since Catholic emancipation, except the Incumbered Estates Act and the Poor Law Act, England had done nothing for Ireland. This means, in fact, that Ireland is still in the same state that it then was. And he told us, in the same breath, that he had been twenty-two years a Member of this House. Well, I have been here for that time also; and when he was referring to the state of Ireland with pain and humiliation, I could not help thinking that it should fill him with pain and humiliation to have made such a statement. No man who has sat in this House for so many years can fail to see the changes that have taken place in the state of things regarding Ireland. Let me then point out in a few words what was the state of Ireland at that time. No sooner did winter set in than we heard of bloodshed, outrage, and murder; of which every post brought such a catalogue that the atrocities only varied in degree. The Royal Speeches had constantly to refer to such outrages. Every Minister brought in a Coercion Bill or an Arms Act. The debates on Irish affairs took up more time than all the other affairs of the Empire together. The Irish Members sat aloof, as if there was still an imaginary Channel between them and the Scotch and English Members, and they thought they were disliked by the House. There was then an army in Ireland of 60,000, 80,000, or 100,000 men; and Ireland was at that time a constant source of menace and expense. Is not this changed now? How often do we now hear of murders in Ireland? Are they not the exception, not the rule? How long is it since the Queen's Speech referred to crimes and outrages in Ireland? How long is it since a Minister asked us for the suspension of law? How is Irish business now conducted in this House? Is it not as smoothly and as efficiently done as Scotch or English business? Whether you take a Scotch or English Member, is not their interest in matters which immediately refer to the county of Cork or Mayo as friendly and sincere as any they take in matters directly affecting their own country? What, again, is the army we now keep in Ireland, and how often does it come into collision with the people? And yet, after all, why are these grievances to be raked up against us to-day? They are the growth of bygone centuries, and you cannot expect that the grievances of centuries can be corrected in a day. Sir, when the Member for Birmingham reproaches the House of Commons for all this, I do not see how he is less to blame than those on whom he cast that blame. There have been during twenty-two years many beneficent measures passed; but I do not know that those who struggled for them received any great assistance from the hon. Member for Birmingham. On questions, indeed, connected with the land, when Philipps were to be uttered against the landlords of Ireland, the hon. Member was always to be seen in his place; but when sensation speeches were not to be delivered, I can testify that the hon. Member for Birmingham has generally been conspicuous from his absence. There have been occasions when beneficial measures were proposed, as to some of which he was negligent and as to others obstructive. He has referred, and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) has also referred, to the state of the Irish priesthood, who, he says, possess—and from my knowledge of them I can say fully deserve—the veneration of their flocks. Now, one of the most important questions connected with this subject ever considered in this House is that of a State provision for the priesthood to whom the people are so much attached. I have always been, with many friends of mine, in favour of that State provision; but I have always found when the Member for Birmingham was present on these occasions he has gone into the lobby with the supporters of the “No Popery” cry, and voted on the side of illiberality and intolerance. [Mr. BRIGHT: No!] I state positively what I know as a fact, and I challenge the hon. Gentleman to refute it. I have attended too long and closely to these Irish affairs, not to know the course which every prominent man has taken in regard to them, and when the late Sir Robert Peel brought forward that wise and provident measure for improving the position of the College of Maynooth, the hon. Member for Birmingham was one of his opponents. Does he deny it? He voted with the supporters of the “No Popery” cry. I can only repeat from my own knowledge that the hon. Member for Birmingham has been found in his place when grievances were to be alleged or agitation promoted, but I know of no occasion during the last twenty years in which the hon. Gentleman had originated a Motion himself for political improvement of that country. Approving as I do entirely of the course the Government has pursued, I cannot agree with one criticism made by the hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli), who found fault with the Government for allowing the repeal last year of an obsolete law. Now, I hold they are not blamable for that. That law was existing in 1848; the Government then dared not avail themselves of it, and I believe the House would have been extremely astonished if they had now suspended the law in Ireland by means of that Act. I can only say, when the hon. Member for Birmingham appeals to the people of Ireland on account of his own services, I, looking back to what has taken place, cannot regard him as a benefactor in the past, or a safe guide in the future.

MR. DILLON: Sir, the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) has this day delivered a speech which, notwithstanding the censures that have been pronounced upon it, I shall take leave to describe as one of the most generous, most true, and most noble utterances which it has ever been my fortune to listen to. The hon. Member required to make no apology to Ireland and to the Irish Members for intruding himself into this debate; and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the speech he has delivered here to-day will increase that attachment which is universally and profoundly felt for him in my country; and I will say, that though he has been accused of entertaining a sympathy for, and of being a sort of patron of Fenians in this House, he is, on the contrary, a most formidable enemy not only of the Fenians, but of every species of Irish disaffection. It is with unaffected reluctance that I rise for the first time in this House to express sentiments which I know have not the sympathy of the overwhelming majority of the House, and to express my dissent from the proposal which has been made here to-day by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. My reluctance to oppose the measure is mainly due to the indications on the part of the present Government of a better feeling towards Ireland than has characterized the counsels of former Administrations. I entertain no constitutional scruples on this matter. I am one of those who think that a good Government ought to be cheerfully armed by those who have the happiness to live under it with every power that may be necessary for its preservation. I have no sympathy with Fenianism, and those who have had an occasion to investigate the transactions and the peculiar literature of that movement must know very well that I am one of the most prominent objects of the hostility of its leaders. I believe I was the only candidate at the last general election in Ireland that had to encounter the organized opposition of the Fenians. But I did encounter it on the hustings; and I appeal to my hon. Colleague the Member for Tipperary (Mr. Moore), who is himself not a Fenian, whether I did not so meet that opposition, whether I did not defy it, and conquer it. The facility with which I overcame it in one of its reputed strongholds has always made me sceptical of the force which has been popularly attributed to this movement. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, the leader of the Opposition, says he will support the Bill in the belief that the Fenian movement has no connection with the grievances of Ireland. Now, I know that that is true in one sense—namely, that whatever this House might do would not satisfy the leaders of that movement; but then, on the other hand, I know that whatever force there may be in Fenianism for mischief, that force is derived from the general disaffection of the Irish people arising from the misgovernment of the country. Nothing but the strong and deep-seated conviction that Ireland has been sadly misgoverned, and that to the misgovernment of Ireland the disturbances that exist in that country are attributable, could justify in my own conscience my opposition to this Bill. A good Government is one of the greatest blessings any country can enjoy, and in proportion to its value would be the wickedness of any attempt to overthrow it, and in the same proportion ought to be the zeal of every good citizen in coming to its defence. But in Ireland we have not had good government; and although the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield has challenged a detailed statement of Irish grievances, I consider it would be out of place to enter into such a statement on this occasion; but I must say that the Irish people feel bitterly that the laws which are made by the Imperial Parliament have been generally made in the interests of a class and against the people. They all, no doubt, felt, as the hon. and learned Gentleman had said, that property has been amply secured in Ireland; but they felt, on the other hand, that the rights of labour had been left to take care of themselves, and after all it was on the rights of industry and labour that the rights of property ultimately rested. I will do no more than refer to the ecclesiastical institutions with which we are blessed in Ireland, and I will put it to the country and the House, if such institutions existed in any other country under the sun under the same circumstances, whether the universal voice of the English public would not pronounce them to be a sufficient justification not merely for discontent, but insurrection. But it may be said that this is not a time for raising such a question; that the question which presses for an answer now is how the Fenian conspiracy in Ireland, which is directed against the Government, against property, and against religion, is to be put down? But the House ought to remember, as the hon. Member for Birmingham had said, that this question as to how Irish disaffection was to be dealt with is not now for the first time pressing for an answer. It will be in the recollection of many hon. Members that for some ten years immediately preceding the appearance of this Fenian conspiracy, Ireland was in a state of the most perfect repose, and it was a subject of universal congratulation in the English press that Ireland had forgotten her grievances, had ceased to complain, had turned her attention to the pursuits of industry, and had become one of the most loyal portions of Her Majesty's dominions. I want to know in what state Ireland must be before she is fit to receive her full measure of justice at the hands of the Imperial Parliament. If she is silent and there is an absence of complaint, then the inference is that she has no grievance to complain of. On the other hand, if she is turbulent and seditious, then it is said that it would not be compatible with the dignity of the Imperial Government to make any concession under such circumstances. It seems to me that the only appropriate time for doing justice is always the present hour; and until the Government of this country give some specific assurance that they mean to do justice to Ireland I, for one, cannot aid them in any effort to quell the discontent and disaffection which have been caused by the denial of justice. I thank the hon. Member for Birmingham for his manly expression of sentiment this day, and can only regret that so little justice should be done to a man to whom English industry is so much indebted. Discontent and disaffection are not always unmixed evils. To disaffection England is indebted for the great Reform Bill, and the career of the hon. Member for Birmingham is some proof that popular discontent sometimes works good; for if the hon. Member had not exerted himself to excite popular discontent the industry of England might still be suffering under the burden of the Corn Laws. Popular discontent does this service to society, that it renders the infliction of wrong troublesome and sometimes very costly; and those who were either active in the infliction of wrong, or acquiesced in its infliction, had little right to claim aid in their efforts to evade the natural and just consequence of their own misconduct. For this reason I venture to protest against the measure which is now before the House, but in doing so I entirely repudiate any desire to offer a factious opposition to it.

MR. J. STUART MILL said, that some asperity had been introduced into this discussion which he should not imitate. The occasion was one for deep grief, not for irritation. He agreed with the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) that this Bill was a cause for shame and humiliation to this country. We were present at the collapsing of a great delusion. England had for a considerable number of years been flattering itself that the Irish people had come to their senses; that they were now sensible that they had got Catholic Emancipation and the Incumbered Estates Bill, which were the only things they could possibly want; and had become aware that a nation could not have anything to complain of when it was under such beneficent rulers as us, who, if we do but little for them, would so gladly do much if we only knew how. We all knew that in times past England had been unjust to Ireland. Of that national sin this nation had repented; and we were not now conscious of any other feelings towards Ireland than those which were perfectly honest and benevolent, and he did not say this of one party, or of one side of the House only, he said it of all. But we had fallen into the mistake of thinking that good intentions were enough. We had been in the habit of saying pleasant things on this subject in the hearing of foreigners, till, from iteration, foreigners were beginning to believe that Ireland was no longer our weak point—England's vulnerable spot—the portion of our territory where we might perhaps be successfully assailed, and which, in any case, by neutralising a great portion of our available force, disabled us from doing anything to resist any iniquity which it might be sought to perpetrate in Europe. This pleasing delusion was now at an end. Every foreigner, every continental writer, would believe for many years to come that Ireland was a country constantly on the brink of revolution, held down by an alien nationality, and kept in subjection by brute force. ["No, no!"] He did not mean that he shared that opinion; he disclaimed it. He hardly knew to what to compare the position of England towards Ireland, but some illustration of his meaning might be drawn from the practice of flogging. Flogging in some few cases was probably a necessary abomination, because there were some men and boys whom long persistence in evil had so brutalized and perverted that no other punishment had any chance of doing them good. But when any man in authority—whether he was the captain of a ship or the commander of a regiment, or the master of a school, needed the instrument of flogging to maintain his authority—that man deserved flogging as much as any of those who were flogged by his orders. He was not prepared to vote against granting to Her Majesty's Government the powers which, in the state to which Ireland had been brought, they declared to be absolutely necessary. He was not responsible—they were. They did not bring Ireland into its present state—they found it so, through the misgovernment of centuries and the neglect of half a century. He did not agree with his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham in thinking that Her Majesty's Ministers, if they could not devise some remedy for the evils of Ireland, were bound to leave their seats on the Treasury Bench and devote themselves to learning statesmanship. From whom were they to learn it? From the Gentlemen opposite, who would be their successors, and who, if they were to propose anything which his hon. Friend or himself would consider as remedies for Irish evils, would not allow them to pass it? The Government had to deal with things as they were, and not with things as they might wish them to be. He did not believe that the power granted to the Government would be strained beyond the necessity of the case. He would not suggest a suspicion that tyranny and oppression would be practised. He knew there would be nothing of the kind, at least with their cognizance or connivance. He was not afraid that they would make a Jamaica in Ireland; and, to say truth, the fountains of his indignation had been so drained by what had taken place in that unfortunate island that he had none left for so comparatively small a matter as arbitrary imprisonment. When, however, the immediate end had been effected, he hoped that we should not again go to sleep for fifty years, and that we should not continue to meet every proposal for the benefit of Ireland with that eternal "non possumus" which, translated into English, meant, "We don't do it in England." If his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield thought that nothing was now amiss in Ireland except the Irish Church, he would be likely to hear much more on the subject before long, if he would only listen.

MR. MOORE: I can speak of my own knowledge that my hon. Friend has no Fenian sympathies. We travelled together through Ireland, and we saw a good deal last autumn. He met with opposition in all directions from that party. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield has taunted the hon. Member for Birmingham, and those who advocate the cause of Ireland, with not having suggested what the measures are which ought to be taken for restoring peace and prosperity to that part of the Empire. In reply, I will say, that the measures most required have reference to the land question, which is the question that most deeply affects the industry of the country, and to the abolition of the supremacy of the Established Church. These are the real measures to bring back peace and restore order to the country.

MR. CONOLLY, speaking for all those who were interested in authority, property, and religion in Ireland, declared that they were prepared as one man to give their full support to the Government in the powers they now asked for. If, at the recent great meeting held in Dublin, they did not call for the measure now under consideration, it was because they knew the day was not far distant when such a request would be made. The only reason why they did not call upon the Lord Lieutenant to exercise his authority at that time was, that they had complete confidence in the sagacity and in the readiness of the noble Lord to adopt such measures as were necessary for the security of Ireland. If this question had been considered one of importance on previous occasions, every time it came before the House its importance was increased. Up to a recent period, the wise measures which Parliament had passed had produced signs of revival and improvement in Ireland; but these had been interfered with by the Fenian movement, which from his visit to America he had no hesitation in declaring to be of foreign origin. One of the consequences of the cessation of the war in America had been that a number of restless spirits had been thrown into idleness and inaction, and the result had been what might have been anticipated. The ancient policy of the country had been galvanized by the American war, and had taken the form of rebellion. It was the material Crown of this country that was aimed at, and to dis sever Ireland from the English rule. But the policy adopted in the present Motion was an antiquated and obsolete policy, and was not the policy which had been inaugurated for the last twenty years. However, it was absolutely necessary that they should endeavour, by all the support they could give to Her Majesty's Government, to put down what was in all its aspects a wicked and most mischievous thing.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, he was certain that if the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) had said anything in his speech that was calculated to produce mischief, the House would feel that he owed a most ample apology to the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield for having intruded upon his special domain. He did not expect when he came into the House that day that he would hear any Fenian speeches; but he regretted to say that he had heard from the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield one of the strongest Fenian speeches it was ever his misfortune to have listened to. He (Sir John Gray) had no sympathy with Fenianism, and no sympathy with the members of that wicked and foolish conspiracy. From his personal knowledge of the means proposed to be used by the Fenian conspirators, he could not say with his hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) that there was much either of virtue or of honour connected with the movement, in fact or in sympathy. He regarded the Fenians, judging of them by their own avowal, as men who were banded together for the purpose of assailing property of every kind. ["No, no!"] Some Gentlemen might say "No, no!" but he (Sir John Gray) spoke from facts within his own knowledge, and he repeated that it was avowed by these men that a general assault upon the persons and property of either priest or layman who opposed them was not only legitimate but laudable. The Fenians had honoured him by associating him in an indictment with the Archbishop of Dublin, for having given publicity to the opinions of the Archbishop, warning his flock against the criminal designs of those men, which he said were based on a desire to upset the rights of property, and even to deal summarily with the lives of all who differed from them or opposed themselves to their projects. He was charged with being a co-conspirator, to use the legal phrase, with the Archbishop of Dublin, for the purpose of preventing the Fenians from getting a fair trial in their own country, and he had to defend himself in the law courts of the country against that charge. In doing this he had to go carefully into the whole of their proceedings, read all their documents and proclamations, and from the knowledge he thus acquired he would not hesitate to pledge himself to the veracity of the statement that the property and life of all laymen and clergymen who opposed them were distinctly pointed out as proper objects for Fenian assault in Ireland. He had not intended to intrude on the House that day, but having heard the mischievous and unwarranted attack of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield on the Catholic clergy as a body, he felt justified in asking the House was it not true that the whole of the Catholic episcopal body in Ireland, and that every dignitary of the Catholic Church, every priest even of that faith, had joined in denouncing these objects, and had laudably exerted their influence in warning their people against being identified with these destructive projects. That being so, he was, he submitted, justified in saying that a more mischievous or a more Fenian speech could not have been uttered than that in which the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield assailed the Catholic clergy; nor could a more unfounded charge be made than that of accusing them of being the abettors of sedition and sympathizers of the Fenian movement. He asked the House to bear in mind that in the rebellion of '98 the Catholic clergy were the active friends of order. In the attempted revolution of 1848, the leaders of which were men of intellect and generous impulses, the Catholic clergy had been conspicuous in restraining their flocks from joining in the insurrectionary movement (organized by the Presbyterian revolutionists of Ulster). ["No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen who thought that no good could come from a Catholic ecclesiastic or any person of the Catholic party might say "No, no!" but it would be remembered that the Catholic clergy were assailed by many of the leaders of the '48 party, and that the failure of that movement was attributed by these leaders to their opposition. In America and in Canada some of the Catholic clergy were doomed by exiles as the great obstacles to their success. He asked those who heard unprovoked attack, to deal with the facts of the case under the consideration of the House, and say to whom did they owe most for the preservation of peace and the preventing a Fenian outbreak in Ireland. Was it not to the Catholic clergy? And he would ask what would be thought by the Irish people when they read the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman who once was recognized in that country, and in this House, as a leader of the Liberal party, but who, descending from his former elevated position, had no better occupation than that of vituperating. When a man of the transcendent ability of the hon. Member for Birmingham, who stood up in that House to demand in the name of England and her Liberal constituencies that Ireland be governed on just and equitable principles, to endorse the eulogium on the conduct of the Catholic clergy pronounced by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, what would the people of Ireland say on hearing that a gentleman who once called himself a Member of the Liberal party had vituperated that man for pleading for Ireland, and had assailed the Catholic clergy—the loyal men who stood by the Government of the country and the peace of the country, and who endeavoured to prevent this attempted revolution getting to the position in which it now is. While the Government asked for these extraordinary powers, he hoped they would at the same time give an assurance to the people, who are loyal and steady and refuse to be identified with revolutionary projects, that they intend to put an end to the causes which had led many to sympathize with the present movement, and to palliate conduct which they could not approve. The true way and the only way permanently to crush these insurrectionary movements was to do justice to the country and thus destroy the trade of revolutionists. The friends of peace expect a promise to that effect from the Government. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield said the country had nothing to complain of. But was it nothing that during sixty years of British Parliamentary rule there had been sustained in Ireland an ascendancy of the most cruel, obstinate, and galling character? Was it nothing that the whole ecclesiastical revenues of the country were absorbed by a small minority of the people—a minority who could look back on nothing they had ever done for the country, and who had done everything ingenuity could devise to increase the natural feeling of discontent and disappointment entertained by the masses of the people at their being ruled by men who, though living amongst them, treated them as a conquered race, with whom they could have no sympathy? ["No, no!"] He repeated that they were ruled by an ascendancy class who resided amongst them as conquerors, and who had no sympathy with them.

SIR PERCY BURRELL rose to Order.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member for Kilkenny was in order.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, he was obliged to the hon. Gentleman who had called him to order, because the rebuke their hon. Speaker had administered to that hon. Gentleman showed that he it was who was transgressing the rules of order and debate. He would, therefore, again venture to repeat that those who ruled in Ireland as a hostile though resident ascendancy over the masses of the people of Ireland, and those who had grasped to themselves nearly all the places of power, of authority, and emolument, including the ecclesiastical property of the people, had no sympathy with the masses of the Irish population, and were the real promoters of disaffection. When the proceedings of that House were made known in Ireland he regretted to say it would be seen that when an English representative of transcendant power and ability pleaded in this House for justice to the Irish race and nation, with an eloquence that was as much to be admired as was the broad statesmanship that inspired it, there were to be found Members calling themselves Liberal who delighted in pouring out upon that great and gifted man their invectives, and in assailing him for no other offence than that of asking that the Irish people be ruled with justice and with equity.

THE O'DONOGHUE begged to thank his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) for the speech which he had delivered to-day—a speech which, he was certain, if acted upon would be a serious blow to Fenianism, and which he was happy to think justified the efforts he had frequently made to induce his countrymen not to despair, and to convince them that they might yet expect justice from Parliament and the English people. The line of argument taken by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) was no doubt very satisfactory to himself, for it simply consisted in saying what his opinion was, and that he did not care who differed from him. The hon. and learned Gentleman's reasoning did not, however, appear to him to be very forcible or logical. He simply asserted that there were no causes of disaffection; but when he found these who ought to know something about the state of Ireland—the people of Ireland—saying that there were causes of disaffection, he attached no importance whatever to the bare assertion of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield. In anything he (The O'Donoghue) might say, he wished it to be understood that he was not influenced in the slightest degree by what the Fenians wanted or what they might do. What he asked for might not satisfy them; but if what he asked for was conceded—if the Government were willing to inquire into the causes of the disaffection with a view to their removal, and promised to adopt such a course, what the Fenians might think, and what they might do, would be of no importance whatever. He was convinced, however, that robbery and murder were not the motives of the organizers of the movement. He attached no weight to that allegation, because he knew that similar charges had been made against all those who at any time had endeavoured to bring about a national movement in Ireland. They were made against O'Connell, and they were made—if he might be allowed to say so—against the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray) himself, when he was a distinguished inmate of Richmond Bridewell. Statements of that kind were no doubt useful in throwing discredit on the movement, but he maintained that when those statements were without foundation, it was discreditable to those who used them. If the House was inclined to support Her Majesty's Government in their determination to invest with despotic power the nervous and bewildered officials of Dublin Castle, it was quite evident that no opposition which he could offer could be of any avail; but although he was most unwilling to do anything factious or to occupy at any length the time of the House, when to do so would be utterly useless, he could not forget his right nor neglect the duty of declaring that coercion was not what Ireland required—that it would create a panic and intensify disaffection; and that the ordinary constitutional powers at the disposal of the Government, if placed in the hands of men of nerve and judgment, would be amply sufficient to meet any emergency that could arise. When the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department on the previous evening told them he was about to give notice of a Motion which concerned Ireland, he was reminded of the speech of the hon. Gentleman who seconded the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne; but when the right hon. Gentleman rose, and without a single explanatory observation, but in a manner which certainly did not seem to correspond with the gravity or the awful nature of the announcement he was about to make, let the House know that the measure which Her Majesty's Government had in store for Ireland was the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act—that was, the suspension of the Constitution and the placing of the life and liberty of every man ["No!"]—well, the placing of the liberty of every man in Ireland for the next six months at the disposal of an authority whose vacillating conduct would be simply ridiculous, if it were not dangerous—it became the duty of those who represented the Irish people to vote against such a proposal. He had watched the effect on the House of the announcement of the right hon. Gentleman, and he was happy to say that the impression produced upon him by the demeanour of the House was, that there were few in that Assembly who would not willingly lay down the arm of coercion; and although, no doubt, there was the determination to maintain order, there was, notwithstanding, an undercurrent of strong feeling, that if the conduct of the Government had been otherwise than it had been—not during the last few months, not during the last year, but during the last three or four years—these measures of coercion would have been absolutely unnecessary. He saw in the leading journal that the notice given by the right hon. Gentleman had been received with cheers. He had looked to the quarter from which those cheers came, and he saw they came from the representatives or deluders of the small Orange party of Ulster, who looked upon it that the greatest blessing the Government could bestow on Ireland would be to suspend the Constitution, not for six months, but for ever. In his speech of that day the Home Secretary had given them no new information whatever; he had told them nothing which would not have justified the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act six months ago, and which would not equally justify its perpetual suspension. The right hon. Gentleman read letters and proclamations from Mr. Stephens, and he informed them that Mr. Stephens announced that the flag of the Irish republic was to be raised in the year in which he was writing, which was the year 1865. But that prediction had been falsified, and he had no hesitation in saying that all the other predictions made in the same quarter would also be falsified; while he was perfectly certain that no one would rejoice more at the course taken that day than Mr. Stephens. It would give an importance to the movement which otherwise it never would have obtained. Would not those Irishmen in America who had been so grossly deceived and deluded by the statements of Mr. Stephens, would they not say, "We must subscribe; we must get our ships and go over?" As the British Government were obliged to suspend the Constitution, and do what so many of the English had assailed the American Government for doing when hundreds of thousands of armed men were in the field, Irishmen in America would come to the conclusion that the movement must have attained really formidable proportions. He could not help feeling surprised at the new light which appeared to have dawned upon the Government in that matter, and no one certainly could have supposed from the Queen's Speech or the address of the Chancellor of the Exchequer during the first week of the Session that such a measure was in contemplation. He believed that since the Habeas Corpus Act had been passed in 1679 it had been suspended only four times, and, in Ireland, such a step must be regarded as one of a very momentous character. The proceedings of the Government on the present occasion differed from past proceedings in this respect, that formerly the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act preceded instead of following the Special Commission. And how, after the language used by the right hon. the Attorney General for Ireland at the close of that Special Commission, when he and the Judges and the sheriff, and the other officials were interchanging compliments with each other, he could now advise the Government that grounds existed for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, he was at a loss to discover. He could only account for it by supposing that it formed part of that vacillation of purpose which had distinguished every Member of the Irish Executive, from the noble Lord the Lord Lieutenant down to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General. In September last his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant went to Tipperary, and, in a speech made at a cattle show there, said that Ireland never was so contented; and so rejoiced was his Excellency at this prospect of general contentment that he declared that the proclamation which for twenty years had rested on the county Tipperary should be immediately removed. In this fit of generous enthusiasm the Lord Lieutenant removed the proclamation; but unfortunately it was replaced the very next week. The Lord Lieutenant and his advisers resembled a political pendulum, and from their acts it was impossible to tell what the state of the country really was. He had no doubt that stories of the most alarming description reached the Government. A short time ago a reverend friend called upon him early in the morning, and asked could he speak to him for a few moments. He replied "Certainly." "Well," said his friend, "I have just come from So-and-so."—alluding to a gentleman who occupied an important official position in Dublin, and whose name he was prepared to give in confidence to any hon. Member—"and he has told me most positively that next Sunday is to be the rising." His friend asserted his firm belief in the accuracy of the information he had received; and, being asked what advice he would offer under the circumstances, said, "Well, perhaps it would be as well if you left the country." So little importance, however, did he attach to this piece of information, although undoubtedly well meant, that it was not until after dinner on Sunday that he recollected that was to have been the day of the rising. The right hon. Gentlemen the Attorney General and the Solicitor General, if they thought proper to do so, could tell the House some stories of the same complexion, which, no doubt, would be very amusing, in justification of their advice to the Government to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, and thereby deprive the people of Ireland of those constitutional privileges so justly prized by every subject. The language which the Irish Attorney General used at the close of the Special Commission was as follows:—

"I think it very important to observe, for the information of the public, that every single individual connected with The Irish People newspaper and every person whose name has appeared as a leader in the voluminous correspondence of James Stephens and others, has been brought before this Court during its sittings—every single individual of mark, except one or two who fled the country, has been made amenable to justice. Therefore, I may safely affirm that all the leaders of this conspiracy have been now convicted; and, my lords, with respect to the mere rank and file, the Crown has no desire to pursue them if they are disposed to return to that allegiance which they should never have abandoned. One person, James Stephens, escaped by treachery which no care, perhaps, could anticipate, and certainly could not have foreseen; he has not been made amenable. He is a fugitive from justice; but every one of the persons whom he trusted and selected to be leaders in the intended insurrection—every one of those persons has been captured and brought to justice. That certainly is a result with which the Crown ought to be satisfied, and which, I hope, will produce its due effect on the people."

After the lapse of so very short an interval, the right hon. and learned Gentleman now recommended the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. He would only add that the proceedings of the Irish Government reminded him of what occurred on the morning after the escape of Stephens. A second edition of the Government organ came out, in which the public received the startling but consolatory information that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, the Castle adviser, and the Inspector of Prisons had gone up to Richmond Bridewell, and were holding an investigation with closed doors.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the House in general, and my Colleagues with myself in particular, have been anxious to hear on this critical question the sentiments of representatives from Ireland. But as I did not perceive that any one of those Gentlemen rose to address the House after the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and as promptitude is of the utmost importance, I have thought it right to make an appeal to the House to consider whether we should not endeavour at once to carry this matter to an issue. I begin by referring to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, and will, in the first instance, allude to the less important parts of his speech. The right hon. Gentleman, referring in the exercise of his undoubted liberty to the previous conduct of the Government, said, that on former occasions, or on a former occasion, he thought they might have been chargeable with delay, hesitation, and want of prescience and energy. No one, I hope, will suppose that I complain of the right hon. Gentleman for having chosen this occasion to mention that charge against the Government; it was an occasion purely germane, I think, and suitable for any objection of that nature. At a time when we are performing the irksome and painful duty of asking Parliament for powers beyond the practice and foreign to the spirit of the Constitution the right hon. Gentleman was well entitled to say, "Had you at a former period been more careful of the powers which the law already gave you, you need not have placed Parliament in the painful position it occupies to-day; you need not have called on us to make this choice between endangering the peace of Ireland and the security of loyal subjects on the one hand, and interfering with the regular course of law and abridging the privileges of liberty on the other." But admitting entirely the relevancy of the charge, I hope it will be thought right that I should state in a few words the answer of the Government. The Act to which the right hon. Gentleman referred is an Act 50 Geo III., entitled—

"An Act for more effectually preventing the administering and taking of unlawful oaths in Ireland, and for the protection of magistrates and witnesses in criminal cases."

The seventh section of that Act provides that any stranger sojourning or wandering in Ireland may be brought before any justice of the peace in Ireland and there examined. We are well convinced that this Act was prepared with an aim and purpose wholly different from that which we now have in view. So far as this section is concerned, it is plain that the legislation had reference to aliens as distinguished from native born subjects, a style of legislation much in vogue at the time when this Act was passed, but which has now disappeared from our statute-book. And we should not, I think, have been justified, even supposing that Act were in existence, in availing ourselves of an accidental power intended for a different purpose, and in using it to enable us to depart from the regular practice and from the known spirit of the Constitution. But I have this second answer, which I think the right hon. Gentleman himself would admit to be conclusive. I have said that the section authorizes the arrest of any strangers sojourning or wandering, and their examination respecting place of abode, place from which they come, means of livelihood, and their objects or motives in remaining or coming into the county, city, or town in which they may be found. Let the right hon. Gentleman consider who are the persons—foreigners, indeed, to this country, but yet connected with Ireland by birth—who are the persons that we have at this moment principally in view? They are the very class of persons who would at once say, when challenged before the magistrate, "We are not here as vagrants or vagabonds; we are not here for any doubtful purpose; we are emigrants from Ireland who have returned to see the friends and relatives that we left behind when we went away, and it is cruel that we should be brought before a legal tribunal because, on this occasion, we have been found among them." But how does the section proceed? It goes on to say—

"And unless he or she shall answer to the satisfaction of such magistrate, or produce sufficient security for his or her good behaviour, he shall be then detained."

The meaning of these words of course is this, that the charge on which these parties would be brought before the magistrate would be a bailable charge; and the whole question of finding bail merely means whether he has or has not money enough to induce parties to become security without risk to themselves. Whatever may be said of Fenianism no one pretends that it is wanting in funds for its support. And had it been in the power of the Law Advisers to recommend proceedings under that section, the ridiculous process would have been gone through of taking up persons who would have no difficulty whatever in getting themselves admitted to bail, and the matter therefore would have resulted in an entire frustration of the proceedings of the Government. I trust I have shown sufficient cause for the conduct of the Government last year; and I need not therefore take shelter under the fact, which I admit would not be a shelter, of the repeal of this clause. That repeal was proposed—and I give him credit for it—by my hon. Friend, an independent Member of this House, now sitting near me: and the Bill was passed through the House of Lords, not by Her Majesty's Government, but at the instance of the Earl of Donoughmore, a distinguished Member of the Opposition. Now, that would be no excuse to us if the measure had been unwise, but it is a most important testimony that the repeal was wise, though the right hon. Gentleman has, perhaps, somewhat hastily alleged that our conduct savoured of delay and want of precision and energy. Well, Sir, I pass from that less significant portion of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, and I must in justice say that I can hardly remember an occasion on which my hon. Friend has exercised his extraordinary powers with greater force. I must freely admit that the exercise of those powers, great as they are, derived additional impressiveness from the evident, the undeniable, and the transparent sincerity of the speaker. Sir, having made that admission, or rather, having tendered the tribute to my hon. Friend which truth demanded, I do not scruple to add that I listened to the speech of my hon. Friend with regret and with pain. It was a speech, I admit, containing many truths; but it was also a speech containing many propositions of which it may be said that some were not true, that many were open to question, and that most were out of place on the present occasion. A wise man has said that everything is good in its time, and the converse of this proposition will also hold—that nothing is good that is out of its time. But there were two statements contained in parts of that remarkable speech, and suggested by it all along, to which alone I shall make particular reference. My hon. Friend stated that in this matter we are dealing coercively with the Irish people; and he appeared to believe—indeed, he distinctly said—that the numerical majority of that people, if left to themselves, and if it were physically possible, would unmoor the island from its fastenings in the deep, and convey it at least 2,000 miles westward. Now, Sir, I think there is no fallacy which can be propagated in connection with the present subject more dangerous in its character than the supposition that the proceeding in which we are now engaged is an appeal to a simply or substantially English Parliament to apply the hand of force to Ireland. Her Majesty on this occasion makes an undoubted and unhesitating appeal to the well-tryed loyalty of her faithful Commons in the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and that Parliament as it is English, as it is Scotch, so also is it Irish. The Irish portion of the Parliament is not less freely elected than the English and Scotch portions. It is elected by the voices of the people of Ireland; and, for my part, I decline to recognize the voice of that people, or to accept any interpretation of their real feelings and opinions, other than that which is conveyed through the mouths of its representatives lawfully chosen to sit in this House. Well, then, what has been the voice of the representatives of Ireland on the present occasion? Have they come forward to protest against the measures that we propose? My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham—let me again do him that full justice—and my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) have avowed, though reluctantly and with hesitation, that they approve, under the circumstances, of the proposal we have made, and that at least they will not take the responsibility of resisting that proposal. Then we have heard Members representing popular constituencies in Ireland—Members sympathizing with every sentiment which exists in the popular mind, and having close associations with the religious teachers of the great majority of the Irish people—they have spoken unchecked and uncontradicted by their companions, and they have advised

the House to pass this measure, and given decisive support to the proposal of my right hon. Friend. ["Name!"] I would instance the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray), and I do not understand either the hon. Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue), or the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), to mean that they raise their voice in defence of Fenianism. Indeed, the hon. Member for Tipperary emphatically condemned it, while the hon. Member for Tralee founded his objection to the Bill, not on the proposition that Fenianism was a movement which it was not our duty to repress, but simply that to upset the ordinary course of law would defeat the end which we have in view. [The O'DONOGHUE: I said it was unnecessary.] Just so—that it was unnecessary. Therefore, we have the unanimous consent of the House expressed to this effect, and expressed by every Member who comes from Ireland, that this conspiracy deserves the disapproval and the condemnation which have already been bestowed upon it by every one who can claim to represent either the property, the morality, or the religion of the country. That, of course, amounts in principle to approbation of the measure which the Government have proposed to-day. And on the part of the Government, I must express our gratitude to the right hon. Gentleman who preceded me in this debate, and to the House generally—gratitude entirely unqualified by any remarks which have been made during the discussion—for the manner in which it has thought fit to receive our proposal. I believe that hon. Members have given us credit for not having lightly, wantonly, or needlessly made a proposal and submitted a measure of a character so grave and, at first sight, so objectionable in the eyes of all those who understand the spirit and who love the action of our Constitution. We have delayed it up to the last moment. The hon. Gentleman the member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue) says that neither the Speech from the Throne nor the debate which ensued upon it in this House gave the slightest intimation that such a measure was intended. But the reason is obvious. Such a measure was not at that time intended. The subject of Fenianism was mentioned, indeed, in the Speech from the Throne; but, although it had been mentioned, the emergency was not at that time of that grave character which alone would have justified us in taking any extreme step in regard to it ; and I am confident that the hon. Gentleman himself will agree with me that it would have been a breach of our duty if, under those circumstances, we had caused unnecessary alarm and other grave inconveniences by adopting such a course. We have endeavoured to ascertain fully the necessity for this measure before submitting it to the House, and we have also endeavoured to limit the time of its action, so that at a very early period we may be again compelled, if we feel that its prolongation is necessary, to submit the question to the mature judgment of Parliament, ripened and strengthened by the observation which the interval will have afforded. We have endeavoured to exhaust, before resorting to this measure, all the means afforded by the ordinary law. After what has already been said on the subject, I will pass over that portion of the speech of the hon. Gentleman, with reference to which I could only repeat what has been so convincingly stated by my right hon. Friend (Sir George Grey), as to the condition of affairs in Ireland which leads us to believe that this measure is indispensably necessary. We do not propose this measure because we believe that it is through English influence and English regiments that the connection between the two countries is to be maintained. My firm belief is that the influence of Great Britain in every Irish difficulty is not a domineering and tyrannizing, but a softening and mitigating influence ; and that were Ireland detached from her political connection with this country, and left to her own unaided agencies, it might be that the strife of parties would there burst forth in a form calculated to strike horror through the land ; though I do not hesitate to express my conviction that if that struggle were carried on with Irish means and resources exclusively, Ireland, united as it is, without distinction of creed or class, in support of order, would effectually and quickly extinguish all the machinations of these disloyal and misguided men. The hon. Member for Birmingham has asked me for expressions of sympathy with Ireland, and declarations as to the intentions of the Government in regard to applying itself to a consideration of measures for the improvement of the condition of the country. Neither my Colleagues nor myself have been, or will be, slow to give utterance to those sentiments at the proper time. My hon. Friend says we have no statesmanship ; and it may be, if we have not shown it, he is perfectly justified in saying we have not got it. It may also be that the depressing and the bewildering influence of the masses of detail, with which all public life is overlaid at this hour, may have had upon us, and others more worthy, the effect of obscuring our view and lowering our aims as to the highest objects of public policy ; but on this day we have one, and only one, duty to perform—an irksome, a painful, a grievous duty, and yet one of solemn and primary obligation. However contracted be the scale of statesmanship in this country, at least let us see that we retain a sensitive perception of its elementary functions, and that we know as no man can reach the higher rounds of the ladder without treading on the lower, so no man is fit to deal with great political problems unless he sets before his eyes, and never consents to turn away his vision for one moment from, the primary duty of maintaining in an orderly and peaceful country the blessings of peace and order, and of defending the loyal and well-disposed masses of the community against those who may have been unhappily misled. This is the duty of to-day, and to that duty for the day we confine ourselves. I have said we are grateful to the House—grateful to it for the appreciation which from every one of its Benches it has shown of the obligation which at this moment presses upon us. When time and occasion offer, let us give anxious consideration to every subject connected with the welfare of Ireland ; but do not let us permit those subjects which, important as they are, are less important than the duty of to-day, to interfere with the discharge of that duty. Do not let us say to-day that which can be as well said on any other and future occasion. Let me remind the House of the position in which we stand in another respect. Every question of this kind, however marked may be the unanimity that prevails upon it, is a critical question ; it is one of a class of questions which puts free institutions on their trial before the world. We aim by our laws, our habits, and our institutions, at the preservation and development of the fullest liberty. If the foes of public freedom sometimes ask contemptuously whether that individual liberty is not purchased at the expense of weakness in the State in times of public difficulty or danger, it devolves upon this House to give the answer ; and I feel well convinced what that answer will be. I believe, from the manifestations of opinion that have proceeded from every quarter in this House, that before another hour has struck its note this Bill will, in all likelihood, have passed into another place for the purpose of being submitted to another judgment; and we shall show to the world upon this occasion—as the House has never been slow to show upon other occasions—that you need not paralyze the arm of authority in the time of danger because you appreciate the value of freedom, and that the harmony of those two great principles is recognized, understood, revered, and practised among us. It is well to bear in mind that, however difficult be the problem that faces us with respect to Ireland, even upon this very occasion we may see, and it is our duty if we see, to record the signs of progress made. Two generations ago a wide-spread rebellion in Ireland would have plunged whole provinces or extended districts in blood. In 1822, when the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended, there was a spirit of disaffection, powerful not in numbers only, but in other elements of strength, and that was not of foreign introduction. In 1848 this House divided upon the proposal to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, and that division was preceded by a deliberation totally different in tone, I rejoice to say, from that of to-day. No Member has to-day said that he thought he best discharged his duty to the Queen by endeavouring to detach from her dominions those portions of them which it was not convenient for her to occupy and to rule. Nor are we likely, I think, to see the proceedings of this day followed up, as were those of 1848, by a Member rising, and, amid the suppressed indignation of the House—which then, perhaps, more than upon any historical occasion, testified its inestimable regard for the great principle of liberty of speech—stating that when he quitted the House he would go to Ireland for the purpose of offering armed resistance to the law. Some progress, at least, has been made towards unity of sentiment; and we have in that unity of sentiment additional testimony, if additional testimony were needed, to the assertion that was authoritatively made in the Speech from the Throne, and was not contradicted, I think, in this House, with respect to that remarkable state of opinion, that remarkable unity of sentiment in Ireland which encourages us to go fearlessly forward with those measures which are necessary for the maintenance of authority and law; for the purpose of preventing, if it may be, and at any rate limiting and reducing to its minimum, the frightful mischief of the outbreak of insurrection; for the purpose of defending the loyal masses of the people, of whatever class and religion; for the purpose of vindicating the name and fame of this country; and for the purpose, last of all, of defending also the misguided and misled agents of these frightful evils against themselves.

The Question having been put, and the great majority of voices appearing to be for the Ayes, Mr. Speaker declared that “The Ayes have it;” but an hon. Member (believed to be The O’Donoghue) crying that “The Noes have it;” the House divided:—Ayes 354; Noes 6: Majority 348.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir GEORGE GREY, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND.

“Bill to empower the Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor or Governors of Ireland to apprehend and detain, for a limited time, such persons as he or they shall suspect of conspiring against Her Majesty’s Person and Government,” presented, and read the first and second time; committed; considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; read the third time, and passed.

CATTLE DISEASES BILL—[BILLS 6 & 22.]

REPORT.

[The Bill having been Committed, Re-committed, and Considered as Amended, without having been re-printed, great difficulty has been experienced in following out the Motions for Amendments, particularly those of which no Notice had been given. When a Clause has been agreed to, with or without Amendment, the small figures added refer to the No. of the corresponding Clause in the re-print of the Bill No. 22.]

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, that some of the Scottish boroughs were very small; he knew one instance where the population of a borough consisted of only 400 persons. The Bill, as it now stood, made the magistrates of boroughs the local authorities by whom the slaughter of diseased cattle in towns was to be ordered. He feared that in some of the small Scottish boroughs the magistrates would, from a fear of entailing expense on their fellow townsmen, shrink from ordering the slaughter of cattle. He therefore moved, after Clause 5, to insert the following clause:—

"The powers of each Cattle Plague Board shall extend over the whole of the county for which it is appointed, and over all burghs situated therein, excepting cities and burghs which have the right to elect Members to Parliament, and whereof the population within the Parliamentary boundaries of any such burgh exceeds ten thousand."

SIR ANDREW AGNEW said, that when the county which he represented (Wigtonshire) was threatened by the cattle plague the magistrates of a small burgh on the borders of the county refused to prevent a cattle bazaar being held in their town, although frequently remonstrated with on the subject. He strongly urged the House to insert the proposed clause in the Bill.

MR. M'LAREN protested against the adoption of a clause which would disfranchise nearly sixty Scottish boroughs. He had had opportunities of knowing, from the meetings of the Convention of the Royal Burghs held in Edinburgh every year, that there was no set of men more intelligent or more anxious to do their duties than the municipal authorities. Why, then, should a stigma be cast upon the Scotch people by this Amendment? If there was any difference between England and Scotland, it might be supposed that the £10 constituency in Scotland would elect a better class of magistrates than the mere ratepayers in an English borough.

MR. CUMMING-BRUCE said, that the addition to the clause was not proposed in order to disfranchise the boroughs in any sense, but in order to secure harmonious action throughout the country. He was willing that the magistrates should be represented in the county boards, and should there unite in laying a common plan of action. But, unless some such security was taken, all the evils of conflicting action and jurisdiction would be revived.

After a short conversation,

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he did not see any reason for drawing such a distinction between English and Scotch boroughs as would be drawn by the clause now under discussion. He believed the magistrates of the small Scotch boroughs were quite competent to discharge the duties imposed on them by the Bill.

Clause negatived.

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

The House divided:—Ayes 100; Noes 146: Majority 46.

Clause 4 (Definition of "District," "Local Authority," "Local Rate," and "Clerk of Local Authority").

MR. CRAWFORD proposed to add the following proviso:—

"Provided, that within the City of London and the liberties thereof the Court of the Lord Mayor and Aldermen shall, for all the purposes of this Act, except that of making a rate, be deemed the local authority, but for the purpose of making a rate for the purposes of this Act the Metropolitan Board of Works shall be the local authority."

Motion agreed to.

Proviso added to clause.

Clause 15 (Slaughter of Cattle herded with Diseased Animals).

SIR EDWARD BULLER moved to add the following proviso:—

"Provided always that the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, or any two or more of them, may reserve animals (ordered to be slaughtered as aforesaid) for the purpose of experimental treatment."

Motion agreed to.

Proviso added.

Clause 21 (Regulations as to Movement of Cattle).

MR. E. CRAUFURD said, the first part of the clause prohibiting the removal of cattle by sea would injuriously affect the agricultural interest of the various inlands around Scotland. The cattle of Argyllshire were not fat cattle fit for the market, but were young lean beasts sent down to be fattened. He therefore proposed to add such words as would permit sound cattle to be moved by sea from one part of a county or district to another part of the same county or district with the permission of the local authorities.

Another Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 30, to leave out the words "place in," and insert the words "part of the mainland of,"—(Mr. Edward Craufurd,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. BARING said, he could not agree to the insertion of the words proposed by the hon. and learned Member, as they would admit of a much wider construction than the hon. Member supposed them capable of. For instance, if the words were inserted as proposed, cattle might be removed from the Isle of Wight to Portsmouth.

MR. HUNT remarked that the proviso to be introduced into the Bill permitting lean cattle to be removed at certain periods would meet the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill re-committed, in respect of Clauses 35, 37, and the last clause; considered in Committee, and reported; as amended, considered; to be printed as amended. [Bill 22.]

On Motion that the Bill be read a third time,

LORD ELCHO said, he had been reminded by a letter which he had received from the country that one thing had been omitted from the Bill. It had been resolved that the railway companies should not carry cattle in their trucks; but it had not been declared illegal to carry anything else in them. He found from the information his correspondent had supplied him with that the railway authorities were carrying wood, bricks, tiles, and other things in their cattle trucks. He thought it was incumbent upon the House to make some stringent provisions, ordering that until the trucks had been disinfected to the satisfaction of some thoroughly competent person nothing whatever should be carried in them.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a third time, and passed.

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 21.]

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS—That they have agreed to—Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Bill, without Amendment.

Bill considered in Committee (on re-commitment.)

MR. HUNT desired to explain what arrangement had been come to between him and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. It had been arranged that the Cattle Diseases Bill, which had just been passed, should deal with the movement of cattle only as regarded their carriage by rail and their landing at ports. The Bill under consideration, it had been arranged, should deal with the movement of cattle generally; and, therefore, all other clauses foreign to that matter had been struck out of it. He was obliged to the Government for having consented to his proposal to place this Bill first upon the Orders of the Day for Monday, and he moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Monday next.

MR. SPEAKER left the Chair at six o'clock.

MR. SPEAKER resumed the Chair at eleven o'clock.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS—That they do request, that this House will continue sitting for some time.

Message considered.

Resolved, That this House will continue sitting for some time, as desired by their Lordships.

Message to attend the LORDS COMMISSIONERS.

The House went; and being returned;—

MR. SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to—HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION (IRELAND) BILL.

SECOND READING: COMMITTEE:

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading and for Standing Orders Nos. 37 and 38 to be considered in order to their being dispensed with, read.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I am not in the habit of trespassing at any very great length upon your Lordships' time, and it is not my intention to do so upon the present occasion. There are, however, a few reasons in support of this measure which I feel it desirable to state, but not at any great length, the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) and the noble Lord on the cross-benches having both declared on a former occasion that time was a very great element in the stoppage of the cattle plague. I am compelled to admit that if I went very closely into the details of the measure there are many clauses of which I could not conscientiously recommend the adoption to the House, and many which must inflict great inconvenience if the Act is to be at all effectual for its purpose. On the other hand, it is a great pleasure to me to introduce this Bill to the attention of your Lordships, because I have a strong hope that it will go far to stop the progress of the disease which has so long baffled our endeavours to cope with it. With the provisions of the Bill your Lordships are already generally acquainted, and I believe that it does in a very great measure represent the feelings of the vast majority of the agricultural interests, who are, at any rate, most immediately concerned in the issue of this grave question. In dealing with this Bill there is one point which is to be remembered. Your Lordships, who all pay so much attention to the subject, have naturally made yourselves aware of what passed in the other House of Parliament, and of the very great difficulties that have to be encountered in dealing with the question; and that, since there may exist in some minds a doubt as to the perfect adaptability of this Bill to accomplish all that may be desired, this Bill is to be immediately followed by another containing regulations as to removal of cattle, and other matters, to a certain extent introducing exceptions from that isolation which it is the object of the present measure to establish. It certainly is, in the minds of many, a very great object that we should pass this Bill at once, reserving for introduction into the Bill that will immediately follow it any Amendments that may appear to be necessary. On the other hand, it may be, your Lordships may feel that there are in this Bill clauses which it is not desirable by suspending the Standing Orders to pass into law at once, but rather that it is desirable to wait for that other Bill which is coming up from the other House. This Bill, in the first place, constitutes local authorities to carry out its provisions, and confers upon them the power to appoint inspectors or other officers. The duties of those officers are clearly defined. Among other powers they will be enabled to enter any farm or buildings where they may have reason to suppose that the cattle disease exists. The next portion of the Bill is very important, and relates to the slaughter of animals. We propose by this Bill to give to the local authorities power to destroy all diseased animals, and also to authorize the slaughter of all such animals as, owing to their having been in contact or herded with diseased animals, may be suspected to be liable to the disease; and the Bill further provides for the payment of compensation to owners for cattle which may be thus destroyed. This compensation is to be provided by a local rate, and is in no case to exceed one-half of the value of the animal slaughtered, or the sum of £20 at the utmost. With regard to the removal of cattle, the Bill contains clauses prohibiting entirely the movement of cattle by railway up to the 25th of March, and that cattle imported by sea shall be slaughtered at the port of entry. The rest of the measure consists of matters of detail. It deals, for instance, with the expenses of the local authorities, and with cases in which a voluntary rate may have been self-imposed in the district. There is also a clause as to the lending of money by the Public Works Loan Commissioners, to be repaid in seven years; and the rest of the Bill is made up of provisions with regard to legal proceedings and saving clauses. I do most sincerely trust that the measure, attended as its operation must necessarily be with great inconveniences, may prove effectual for the purpose for which it is intended. I am quite sure that the Government will receive all the co-operation which the local authorities can possibly afford. And though, abstractedly, I cannot approve all the provisions which it contains, yet I am very glad to be able to move the second reading of a Bill which appears to meet the wishes of those who have most carefully considered the subject, and who are most immediately affected by the disaster.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
 —(The Lord President.)

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH said, he had no intention of opposing the second reading, but he must express his surprise at the manner in which it was proposed to proceed with the Bill. It was not till that morning that he was aware that the Bill had left the other House of Parliament, and now it was proposed to suspend the Standing Orders that they might pass the Bill with the same rapidity as the House had been asked to give its consent for suspending the Habeas Corpus in Ireland on Saturday last. No previous intimation had been given by the Government of their intention to carry the Bill through with such extraordinary haste. There were many points in the Bill requiring consideration, and they were in danger of making this a "botched" measure. He protested against a measure of such importance being brought up to that House at the last hour of the night of Saturday, so that their Lordships had not had the opportunity of seeing the Bill till Monday morning, or of communicating with those in distant parts of the country, whose interests the provisions of the Bill vitally affected. Now, on Monday, their Lordships were asked to suspend their Standing Orders, in order that the Bill might be passed through all its stages at one sitting. Moreover, they were told that they ought to accept the Bill as it stood, because there was coming up from the other House another Bill which would remedy all the deficiencies of the present; but which very probably, having been passed with equal haste, might be found to be equally botched. Upon the principle of the Bill, no doubt, their Lordships were agreed; but how, with the suspension of the Standing Orders, was it possible to consider the details? He wished to know as to Clause 5, why the local authorities in Scotland had been entirely changed? For what purpose was this? Had the justices of the peace failed in their duty, had they been negligent, or had one single instance been brought forward in which they had either fallen short in the performance of their duty or exceeded it? He was not aware of any. As far as he was aware, they had done their duty well and fearlessly. Sometimes the orders and regulations which they had to enact were excessively distasteful and unpopular, and in some cases these inflicted hardships on individuals; yet, when the public good rendered it necessary, they had not shrunk from the discharge of their duty. The arrangement proposed was a slur upon the justices of the peace of Scotland. They were now to have a new Court. The Commissioners of Supply and some tenant-farmers to be nominated by the lord-lieutenant, the lord-lieutenant himself, the convener and sheriff, or sheriff-substitute of the county were to form the local authority. Who were the Commissioners of Supply? The qualification was the possession of £100 a year in land, but the body had no judicial power—all it had to do was to collect the land tax and impose the assessment. True, it had by recent statute certain powers with respect to the police, but those powers were merely fiscal. He should certainly move the omission of the clause when it came under discussion, and propose that the local authority in Scotland should be the justices in quarter sessions assembled, as in England. There was necessarily some delay in calling the Commissioners of Supply together, and it would take a fortnight, at least, before anything could be done by them; whereas there was at present a local authority ready at hand: if it should be necessary to take the advice of practical agriculturists words might be put into the clause, enabling certain tenant-farmers to assist the sub-committee. In the south of Scotland, at all the meetings of the justices, the tenant-farmers had been invited to be present, and although they had no hand in issuing the orders, their advice had been very much attended to and had been of great value. By the clause, as explained by the schedule, a separate local authority was placed not only in every Parliamentary burgh, but in every burgh which contributed to send a Member to Parliament, which latter were in many cases in Scotland little better than villages, and sometimes the chief magistrate was a butcher, baker, or blacksmith. Surely these were not the persons to set up as a separate local authority. He could not see why the present local authorities in Scotland should be set aside as unworthy and unfit to hold the position they had hitherto occupied. They knew perfectly well the difference between justices in England and justices in Scotland. In England the justices were always upheld by the Superior Courts, but in Scotland it was the reverse. Call a man a sheriff-substitute, and he was immediately a Solon, his knowledge and authority were above all; but if the most astute lawyer and the most talented person were acting as justice of the peace, it would be said, "Oh! he's only a justice, and he cannot be right." That was too often the way in which justices of the peace were spoken of in Scotland. He trusted this clause would be altered, as well as many others which required their Lordships' most anxious consideration. For this reason he counselled caution and delay rather than precipitate action.

EARL GRANVILLE: In reply to the arguments of the noble Duke, I would say that I believe every one of your Lordships is agreed that it is desirable to pass the second reading of this Bill with unanimity. I have merely proposed the course I have in the full belief that it would be the best; but I have not the slightest desire to force my opinion, and hope your Lordships will judge for yourselves and act in accordance with that judgment. I moved the second reading of the Bill as I supposed pro forma, and took that opportunity of bringing the principal provisions of the Bill under your Lordships' notice; and if the second reading be agreed to, I shall move the suspension of the Standing Orders, and then that the Committee be negatived—not with the view of precluding your Lordships from considering the Bill clause by clause, but to take the opinion of your Lordships, whether they think it necessary to discuss the clauses seriatim. I will, however, observe that if much of your Lordships' time is occupied in discussing this Bill clause by clause, and then if it be again discussed in the Commons when our Amendments are taken there, and again brought back here to be considered, much valuable time will obviously be lost. If such a result should be attended with serious consequences, I trust it will not be laid to the door of Her Majesty's Government.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he could not agree to the principle of the indiscriminate slaughter of cattle ordered by the Bill. He was of opinion that the indiscriminate slaughter of cattle was altogether wrong—it was a principle which would press with great hardship on the country, and unless it was modified, they would have the whole agricultural interest in arms. He was of opinion that the clause might be modified. In some instances compulsory slaughter might be absolutely necessary; but in others it would be a very great injustice, and would be scarcely any provision against the extension of the disease. As he was of opinion that alterations were absolutely necessary, if we were to read this Bill a second time on the understanding that it was to go into Committee and be discussed as usual, clause by clause, he should be the last to throw any charge upon the Government for the delay; but it was absolutely necessary that it should be so discussed. There were Amendments which he considered necessary to various clauses, and he would rather they were introduced in the Bill actually under discussion, than wait for the other Bill not yet come up from the Commons. As to the clause with respect to the local authorities in Scotland, he could not understand by whose advice a slur had been cast upon the magistracy of Scotland, by taking from them powers with which they were invested under the Orders in Council, and giving them to a body totally irresponsible to any public body whatever. Magistrates were responsible in the execution of their duty to certain high authorities; but the Commissioners of Supply and agricultural tenants to be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant were responsible to no one, either for over-straining their duty and doing too much, or for neglecting their duty, and doing too little. He entirely agreed with the noble Duke (the Duke of Buccleuch) in thinking the change was altogether unnecessary, and thought they should take all Parliamentary means of restoring the magistracy in Scotland to the position which they ought to hold under this Bill. He trusted that if the Bill were read a second time, with the unanimous assent of the House, that they would then proceed to discuss it in Committee in the usual way.

THE DUKE OF MONTROSE said, he considered it would be a most foolish proceeding to pass a Bill leaving its known defects to be corrected by another Bill which might or might not come before their Lordships. If they made such alterations as they might consider necessary, it would not cause a delay of twenty-four hours in the passage of the Bill. The only point of importance in this Bill was that it stopped the cattle traffic by railway; but at this moment the traffic by road was open, and so were the markets. The other Bill was to deal with the traffic by roads and the general movement of cattle. Until that Bill, therefore, was passed, the work would be only half accomplished; consequently, the delay proposed would not in fact frustrate the main object they had in view. If they merely stopped the railway traffic, the work would only be half done, and it was not till the other Bill came up that they would be able really to attain the object which they all had in view—namely, to stop entirely the traffic in live animals. The Local Authority clause to which the noble Duke referred was a most extraordinary one; and he should like to know whether such a clause would have been permitted in the English part of the Bill. Would their Lordships submit to a clause which proposed to put the county magistrates under the orders of the tenant-farmers and rate-payers?

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: When we come to the clause I shall be happy to explain.

THE DUKE OF MONTROSE understood they were not to be permitted to come to the clause at all. They were asked to pass the Bill through all its stages, and postpone the discussion till the second Bill came up. The clause which had been referred to was the most monstrous one that had ever been invented; and it was part of the system of the Edinburgh lawyers to throw over the justices.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it was perfectly true that he had proposed to negative the Committee, in order to meet what he thought was the general feeling of the House; but he was quite ready to take the other course of going into Committee and discussing the Bill clause by clause.

Motion agreed to.

VOL. CLXXXI. [THIRD SERIES.]

Standing Orders Nos. 37 and 38 considered, and dispensed with.

Bill committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Definition of Terms).

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, that this was, in fact, only the skeleton of a Bill. Almost the whole of the important parts had been cut out, and the Bill would be inoperative in all respects but one till another Bill, now before the House of Commons, should have been passed. The present Bill prohibited the removal of cattle by railway, but all the remaining questions relating to the removal of cattle were left untouched. It dealt with the slaughter of diseased animals, but in no way provided for the treatment of infected districts. The two Bills ought to have been discussed together.

EARL GREY urged the necessity of passing the Bill with as little delay as possible. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Bath) had said that it only dealt with one part of the question; but it gave the power of compulsory slaughter, and it also provided compensation. These were provisions which were really wanted, and they would do much towards stopping the plague. In the next place it stopped all the great markets. It also prohibited the movement of cattle imported from abroad along the roads and canals. By this Bill animals were prohibited from being sent by rail, and already by the Orders in Council they were prohibited, in several counties, from being sent along the roads. This Bill, therefore, would completely stop the removal of cattle for a time, and would meet all that in the first instance was required. These provisions were understood to be quite in accordance with the wishes of the agriculturalists themselves.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Definition of "District," "Local Authority," "Local Rate," and "Clerk of Local Authority").

THE MARQUESS OF BATH had not a word to say against the clause as it stood, but complained that they were in ignorance as to what powers would be conferred upon the local authorities in the way of granting relaxations, which all admitted were to some extent necessary.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that he could not of course say in what form the Bill would come up from the other House; but if it should be found that any objectionable powers were conferred upon the local authorities by the Bill under discussion in the other House, their Lordships would have the opportunity of negating them on its being sent up to them.

Clause 5 (Local Authorities in Counties in Scotland).

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH thought the clause might be struck out, and the powers in Scotland granted by the Act conferred upon the authorities by whom they had heretofore been exercised.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that as the conduct of the Government had been attacked with such extraordinary warmth by the two noble Dukes opposite, he could scarcely avoid—though the matter was one rather of local interest—occupying their Lordships' attention for a few minutes while he explained to their Lordships the course which had been taken with regard to this clause. The whole dispute was, who should constitute "the local authorities" in Scotland, and it would be better perhaps for him to explain to their Lordships the circumstances of the case. The local authorities in Scotland as constituted by the Order in Council were the justices of the peace, and for this plain reason—the Order in Council was issued under a statute which, owing probably to the circumstance that at the time of its being framed such an event as the cattle plague was never contemplated, happened to be the only one under which such Orders could have been issued. This Act enabled, or had been construed to enable, the Government to delegate its powers to the justices of the peace; but they were purely executive, and there was no power of taxation whatever. But in Scotland there already existed a very old constituted body who exercised the powers of levying rates, and therefore when the Government were going to give the power of levying this rate they naturally gave it to the Commissioners of Supply. The Commissioners of Supply in Scotland were composed of the landed gentry of the country; and as they, and they alone, possessed the powers of taxation, it was but right that the Government, in providing for the levying of taxes, should have recognized their existence and authority. It was also natural that, having fixed upon the Commissioners of Supply as the authorities for levying the rates, the administration of those rates should also have been intrusted to the same body. Then the two noble Dukes were excessively indignant that the lord-lieutenant should be empowered to add to this body a few of the tenant-farmers of the county. The tenant-farmers, however, were to pay half the rate, and it was their beasts that were to be slaughtered. These were strong reasons why they should have a voice in the matter. The noble Duke had asked why Government had drawn up the clause in its present form. They had done so in compliance with a memorial sent to them by the Highland and Agricultural Society of Scotland, which had been agreed to at a meeting over which the noble Duke himself presided, a society which represented nearly the entire body of landed proprietors and of tenant-farmers in Scotland. The resolution agreed to at that meeting was as follows:—

"That this Society memorialize Government to prepare a Bill, and to urge the same through Parliament immediately on its assembling, in which Bill shall be named a central Board of Commissioners, who shall authorize and require, as they shall see fit, the formation of county and town Boards throughout the kingdom consisting of Commissioners of Supply, and one or more elected tenant-farmers from each parish in counties, and of the magistrates of towns or burghs," &c.

That memorial the noble Duke, as chairman of the meeting, sent up to Government without one word of protest; and the Lord Advocate had framed the clause in question with special reference to the suggestions it contained, supported as they were at a subsequent meeting of Scotch Members of the House of Commons, who, he believed, adopted the proposal without a single dissentient voice. He (the Duke of Argyll) confessed that [he did not attach much importance to the point at issue one way or the other, because the same persons for the most part constituted the bench of magistrates and the Commissioners of Supply; and, under these circumstances, he was not disposed to insist on the retention of the clause, although he had thought it his duty to offer a justification of the course pursued by the Government. The matter, however, was of such comparative unimportance that should the noble Duke persist in his opposition to the clause he should not trouble the House to divide upon the question.

THE EARL OF MANSFIELD said, the noble Duke on the other side of the House

(the Duke of Argyll) seemed to regard the justices of the peace and the Commissioners of Supply as identical — a supposition which almost made him doubt whether the noble Duke was a Scotchman after all. The noble Duke appeared to forget that the Commissioners of Supply had no judicial functions, and that the police were not in any way subject to their jurisdiction. They had power only over the levying of taxes and of making out rates at the recommendation of others; whereas the magistrates had power over the police, and he had not heard one word of complaint as to the mode in which they had exercised that authority. Again, the magistrates met on several days in the week, whereas the Commissioners of Supply only met on one day in the week. If the clause were passed as it stood at present, great inconvenience would be caused, as it would be necessary to create a new organisation for the purpose of carrying the Act into operation. He would undertake to say that if the Amendment were adopted everything in his county would be ready in four days for carrying the Act into operation; while if that power were intrusted to the Commissioners of Supply, it would take three weeks to bring the scheme into working order.

EARL GRANVILLE thought, that as the Scotch Members of the other House of Parliament were in favour of the clause as it stood, nothing could more induce to delay than the adoption of the proposed Amendment.

LORD POLWARTH was understood to say that if the clause were permitted to remain the Act could not be brought into operation in Scotland until March.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL asked the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Buccleuch) how he proposed to deal with the question?

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH said, he intended to move an Amendment to strike out the clause under discussion, to amend the 8th clause, and to alter certain parts of the schedule.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL wished to know how the tenant-farmers whose property was to be destroyed, and who paid one-half the rate, were to be dealt with.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH said, that the tenant-farmers of Scotland were in the same position as those of England. By his Amendment he proposed that local authorities should be enabled to form themselves into committees, and to place tenant-farmers upon those committees. Reference had been made to a meeting of the Highland Society, over which he had the honour of being president, at which the resolution was passed that had been forwarded to Government. An amendment was moved and took every one by surprise; he should have himself spoken and voted against it if he had not been in the chair; but the resolutions were carried by a majority. The memorial had been sent up to the Government by the secretary of the society in the usual way, and all he had done was to sign it as president.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, to save the time of the House, was ready to accept the Amendment of the noble Duke.

EARL GREY suggested that the clause under discussion had something of the nature of a taxing clause, and therefore the Amendment might involve a question of privilege. It would alter the constitution of the body by which a local rate was to be imposed.

THE DUKE OF MONTROSE observed; that this clause did not impose the rate, or make any alteration in the manner of levying it.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the local authority was the body to which the 18th clause confided the power of levying the rate, and to alter this clause would be a direct violation of what were considered the privileges of the other House of Parliament. He spoke under correction; but there must always be a considerable number of justices among the Commissioners of Supply.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE did not think the clause involved any breach of privilege. It simply constituted the local authority. It was not proposed to touch the 21st clause, which dealt with the mode in which the rate was to be levied.

EARL GREY was still of opinion that their Lordships could not alter this clause without coming into collision with the other House of Parliament and preventing the passing of the Bill. His own opinion was corroborated by a very high authority in the other House that they were not at liberty to alter the authority by which a local burden was imposed. That was the rule. If they left out the clause, they would undoubtedly interfere with the privileges of the other House. But if there were no question of privilege, he must say he should feel bound by the authorities which had been adduced in favour of the clause as it stood, supported as it was by the unanimous opinion of the Scotch Members in the other House, by the Highland and Agricultural Society of Scotland, and by the Members of Her Majesty's Government. He was not content to risk the Bill altogether on a mere matter of punctilio.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that when he had consented to adopt the Amendment, he had done so upon the supposition that it would not in any way endanger the passing of the Bill. But he was at present disposed to believe that its adoption would be an interference with the privileges of the House of Commons; and he, therefore, trusted those Peers who were honestly anxious that the Bill should pass without delay would support the clause as it stood.

EARL RUSSELL said, that if the House of Commons should consider that the proposed alteration involved a matter of privilege, this Bill would be laid aside; a new Bill must in such a case be brought forward, and delay would necessarily be occasioned.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY observed, that the objection raised on the ground of the length of time which must elapse before the meeting of the Commissioners of Supply might be obviated by inserting in the clause words empowering them to meet "forthwith."

THE EARL OF DERBY thought that the present discussion showed the extreme inconvenience of the course pursued by the Government with regard to the Bill; for their Lordships were now called on at a short notice to discuss many points of detail, as to which there was great difference of opinion, and on which the Government did not appear themselves to have made up their minds; while their Lordships had not had the opportunity of seeing the Bill until eleven o'clock that morning. The Bill, too, was not a mere temporary measure, for some of the provisions were to last two years and a half; and therefore he thought that the infinitely better course would have been to pass Resolutions in both Houses of Parliament with respect to three or four points on which there was a general concurrence of opinion, giving the Government power to legislate by Orders in Council in reference to those points until the period when Parliament might have been able to pass a Bill on the subject. With regard to the case under discussion, he was quite ignorant of its merits; but it seemed extraordinary that it should be proposed to take away authority from a body which had hitherto exercised it without complaint, and transfer it to another body of which they had no previous experience; but, for his part, he was so anxious to see the Bill pass without a moment's delay that he should be disposed to waive any objection to the provisions of the Bill—whatever he might think of some of them. With respect to the point raised in respect to the delay in the meeting of the Commissioners of Supply, he thought that that might be deemed disposed of by the 7th clause, which, as it appeared to him, gave power to summon the Commissioners of Supply at any time. As to the question of the privileges of the other House, it would certainly be unfortunate (whether they were right or wrong—whether the other House gave way or not) if that question should create any delay, and some delay must inevitably take place. He therefore submitted to his noble Friends that it would not be desirable to delay the Bill by pressing their Amendment. If, however, their Lordships consented to pass this Bill in its present defective state he hoped the Government would consent to insert a short clause to the effect that this Act may be altered or amended by any Act passed for that purpose in the present Session of Parliament.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that no special Act was necessary for that purpose.

VISCOUNT MELVILLE thought that if the House found in the Bill a clause clearly objectionable they ought to strike it out, even if it involved the necessity of having another Bill brought up from the other House.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH said, he would yield to the objections made to his Amendment (which, however, were purely technical) rather than defeat the Bill, and would not press it.

Clause agreed to.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH wished to know what course the Government intended to pursue if the Cattle Plague Bill in the other House did not receive the Royal Assent this week. The clause stated that all quarter sessions should stand adjourned "to the Monday in the first week succeeding the week in which this Act passes." Would the Government prolong the Orders in Council for a short time after that day, or continue the existing orders in quarter sessions for a few days?

Moreover, they would have new local authorities who would not know the duties devolving on them. He suggested that the 1st of March should be substituted for the Monday mentioned in the clause.

EARL GRANVILLE believed, subject to what might take place in the other House, that the other Bill could receive the Royal Assent this week as well as the present measure.

Clauses 6, 7, 8, and 9 agreed to.

Clause 10 (Power of Entry for Inspectors, &c).

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE called the attention of their Lordships to the fact that this clause gave power to any inspector to at all times enter any field, stable, cowshed, or other premises within his district where he had reasonable grounds for supposing that cattle affected by the plague were to be found. He confessed that he was more alarmed at the visit of the inspector than at anything else, because he was satisfied that the inspector was the medium of infection in many cases; but what he wished to suggest to their Lordships was that the inspector should be required to state in writing the grounds on which he proposed to enter before he required the owner or occupier to admit him under the penalty prescribed by the clause.

EARL GRANVILLE reminded their Lordships that the local authorities would have authority to revoke the licence of the inspector on any well-furnished complaint.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he had an Amendment to propose in the clause with the view of securing that notice to the owner or occupier which the noble Earl (the Earl of Hardwicke) had referred to. He thought the owner or occupier was at least entitled to a notice in writing of the grounds on which it was sought to enter his premises, before he was compelled to admit the inspector.

EARL GREY called attention to the closing sentence of the clause—

“Provided always that such inspector shall, if required, state in writing the grounds on which he has entered such premises for the purpose aforesaid.”

Clearly this was a provision for notice in writing by the inspector, and showed that the inspector was to state the grounds of his visit before he entered. He should vote against all verbal Amendments, as they would only tend to defeat the object of the Bill.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE had supposed that the noble Earl (Earl Grey) understood English better than it appeared he did. The words of the clause were, “on which he has entered such premises,” and not “on which he is about to enter such premises.” The proviso at the end of the clause evidently contemplated the case of a complaint from the owner after the entry, in which case the inspector was to state in writing the grounds on which he had entered.

EARL RUSSELL asked what object would be gained by his noble Friend's Amendment if the owner was not to have the power of refusal.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he did not propose to alter the clause so as to take away the compulsory power of entering.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said, that his experience in his own district was unfavourable to giving the inspectors power to enter at will upon any premises, and perhaps going directly from an infected to an uninfected herd, upon the mere village gossip that this disease existed in the latter. During the last three weeks many cases of this sort had arisen. He thought some notice to an owner should be given in order to give him opportunities, if he could, of showing that there was no necessity for so dangerous a visit. He feared that the Amendment, even if adopted, would not secure that the inspector would be free from infection.

EARL GRANVILLE observed, that Clause 14 provided for the disinfection of the inspectors. If this was a case that allowed of delay it might be desirable to have a preliminary process, such as an application to a magistrate and the granting of an order by a justice; but this would be a source of delay, while the check suggested would be attended with no practical security.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, there was a good deal of force in some of the arguments which had been put forward in the course of the discussion, and suggested that the clause should be postponed for the present. It could then be dealt with as might be necessary in the event of Amendments being introduced into any of the other clauses.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, it was hopeless to imagine that inspectors passing from diseased to healthy cattle could be prevented from spreading the contagion by any process of disinfectants. He doubted whether if fresh clothes were kept at every farm which the inspector visited that would suffice, unless the inspector also bathed between each visit. He proposed that all the compulsory powers in the Bill be struck out.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, the noble Earl might as well move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months. The compulsory principle was the very essence of the Bill.

THE EARL OF DERBY remarked, that the course of treatment proposed for the inspectors reminded him of the regulations affecting the "casual" poor, who were not allowed to come into the house unless they previously submitted to the operation of the bath. The Bill would certainly lose much of its force if the compulsory powers were materially interfered with, for it was very necessary that the inspector should have the power of entering when cattle were diseased or with good reason suspected of being so. At the same time, something ought to be done to satisfy the owner of the cattle as to the grounds on which the inspector was acting, and the general nature of the information which he had received; because it was quite possible that the owner might have it in his power to explain the circumstances to the satisfaction of the inspector, without necessitating an inspection of the cattle. He did not agree with the parallel sought to be established between the inspectors and the doctors, who, it was said, might equally spread infection by their visits. The difference was, that the doctor did not come till you sent for him.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, that if delay were to be deprecated in the case of the present Bill, to pass the one which was still to come would be ten times more important, because it was to amend the imperfections of another Bill, which by that time would already have become law.

EARL GRANVILLE consented to the postponement of the clause.

Clause postponed.

Clause 11 agreed to.

Clause 12 (Slaughter of diseased Animals).

THE EARL OF AIRLIE expressed the opinion that the clause was too stringent. The slaughter of diseased animals was made imperative in all cases, without exception of any kind. In the county of Forfar, with which he was connected, 50 per cent of the animals attacked recovered.

The Earl of Hardwicke

Many would be convalescent when the Act came in force, and the local authorities would have no option but to destroy them, while it was acknowledged on all hands that a recovered cow was the very animal upon which you could best depend upon for the restitution of your stock. A letter from Forfar informed him that the percentage of recoveries there was increasing. Therefore, with a view to correct the evil he had indicated, he proposed to add a proviso at the end of the clause.

Moved to insert the following words:—

("Provided, that when an Inspector shall give a Certificate in Writing, countersigned by a Justice of the Peace, that any Cattle within his District are recovering from the Cattle Plague, the Local Authority shall not be required to cause such Cattle to be slaughtered, but the said Local Authority, if they shall think fit, may order such Cattle to be slaughtered in the Manner and subject to the Provisions contained in this Act.")—
(The Earl of Airlie.)

THE EARL OF WINCHILSEA thought there would be great difficulty in fixing a price upon the animal slaughtered. How could anyone tell what it was worth immediately before it was slaughtered? It would be more proper, in his opinion, to price the animal in accordance with its value when the inspector came to it.

EARL GRANVILLE: I would say, with regard to the Amendment of the noble Earl behind me (the Earl of Airlie), that in my opinion it is worthy of your Lordships' consideration. The Amendments proposed before this are really not of sufficient importance as to entitle them to comparison with the question of time. But this is not only a question of importance, it is also a question of great difficulty. I entirely agree with the noble Earl that the clause as it stands is calculated to deal hardly in individual cases. It would deal so with the man who had nursed a cow through the disease up to the present time and brought her into a convalescent state, and consequently increased her value. For the same reason the destruction of that animal would be a national disadvantage, because the cow would surely do good service in the future. But we should remember that the object of the Bill is to employ very stringent measures to put an end to a very great evil. Probably these measures will cause a rise in the price of meat, and probably they will interfere with the course of trade; but it is thought in the wisdom of Parliament to be worth while to make the experiment of using these very stringent measures in order to eradicate this great evil, if possible. We propose, therefore, to adopt the principles of isolation and slaughter. In my opinion, we should adopt those principles thoroughly; for if we commence making exceptions we shall make loopholes for the disease to escape. The convalescent cow, though likely to recover, contains as much contagious matter about it as one actually suffering from the disease; and if you get excuses for preserving it the disease must spread. Then, again, it is very difficult to distinguish between the animal likely to recover and that which is past cure. I doubt, however, whether an animal which it is thought will recover from the pest would fall under the description of "a beast affected by the plague." Although it is with great reluctance that I do so, I certainly think it my duty to oppose the Amendment introduced by the noble Earl. And as it is proposed that the Bill shall only be in force during a short period, I think it would be especially unwise to make exceptions to its provisions which would detract from its efficacy.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE still desired to see some mitigation of the hardship which the Bill would inflict upon the farmer. He had been assured that 300 convalescent animals were at present in Forfar; and he desired to see some means placed at the disposal of the local authorities for saving such animals as they thought fit by strict isolation or some such means. He entreated their Lordships to give the local authorities some discretionary power at least for this purpose, and not compel them to destroy what might afterwards turn out to be useful animals.

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD was entirely opposed to the Amendment, because it was opposed to the chief principles of the Bill. If that Amendment was admitted the principles of slaughter and compensation must go. But he would suggest that the words "as soon as possible" be added after the word "slaughtered."

LORD EGERTON also objected to the proposed Amendment.

LORD STANLEY or ALDERLEY objected to the clause as it at present stood. In conversation with a friend of his, a Member for Cheshire, he had been informed that the clause, if carried, would in that county, which had suffered much from the plague, be attended with great hardship. His friend had mentioned an instance in which a widow and her daughter possessed ten cows, which before the appearance of the disease were worth about £15 each. By great care they managed to save two of the animals, all being attacked, and the remainder dying from the disease; but the value of animals which had recovered from the plague had so increased that she sold those remaining two for £100. Now, if this clause had been in operation at the time, both of these animals would have been ordered to be killed, and the poor woman would have been ruined. He therefore regarded the clause as too stringent.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH said, he did not believe that the disease could be got rid of by a system of wholesale slaughter, because where the disease had by that means been temporarily suppressed, it had subsequently re-appeared. He thought that the plan was likely to be as effective as if they had attempted to keep the smallpox from spreading by putting to death every man, woman, and child who should be attacked, or should have been in any house where any one had been attacked. He had learnt only that morning of an instance in which eighteen out of twenty-five animals seized with the disease in the county of Edinburgh had recovered; and yet if this clause had been in effect the whole of those eighteen must have been slaughtered. In another case three had recovered out of fourteen; and he might mention, as a singular fact, that those three had come from a farm where the cowpox had raged the previous summer, and where these animals had suffered severely from its effects. In a case of his own, twenty out of twenty-one cattle had recovered, if the inspector who examined the animals had given a correct opinion. One died, as the inspector insisted most strenuously, of cattle plague; and though others were also seized, they all recovered. He concurred in believing that some discretion ought to be given to the local authorities.

EARL SPENCER desired to make one or two remarks upon the principle of slaughter. It was true that cases of recovery were frequently reported, and in some instances they were said to have been as high as 90 per cent; but he thought that every one ought to be extremely careful in deciding upon individual cases—they must take the percentage of disease over the whole country. In some districts the disease had assumed a mild form; and even in districts where the infection had raged very violently large percentages of recoveries had, in individual instances, been reported; but the experience of men eminent in medical as well as veterinary science had shown that in England, and throughout Europe, of the total of those attacked, but few recovered. In England, Scotland, and Wales they amounted, he believed, to 10 per cent. He did not, therefore, think it would be wise to sacrifice the salvation of the country, as regarded the cattle plague, to a delusive hope of successful treatment. Without the principle embodied in the clause under discussion, the Bill would, in his opinion, be entirely inoperative. The Amendment moved by his noble Friend would take out the whole pith and essence of the clause. They were not legislating for the particular owners of cattle, who would be placed under great disadvantage and inconvenience if cattle were slaughtered, which from the fact of their having recovered from the cattle plague were more valuable than before; but they were legislating for the general good of the public. Those cattle had the seeds of disease about them, and if allowed to remain alive would probably convey the infection to their neighbours' stock. Then, again, how were they to define what a convalescent animal was? Experience had shown that many animals after partially recovering from the disease had relapsed and died, and animals ought not to be allowed to remain alive to the probable injury of the cattle in the neighbourhood, because some local inspector or veterinary surgeon happened to possess great confidence in his own skill. Even if they thought that convalescent animals might be allowed to live, the very difficulty of defining what a convalescent animal was, should, in his opinion, induce the Government to insist upon the clause in its original form.

VISCOUNT MELVILLE said, he could not concur with the principle of compulsory slaughter, although he could understand that of compulsory isolation. The cholera was shown to be atmospheric, and it had yet to be proved that the rinderpest did not partake of the same character. He thought, therefore, that the clause was an exceedingly harsh one, especially since many credible cures had already been effected.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that the Amendment before their Lordships was in reality the only important one which had been moved that evening, and in the discussion which had occupied their Lordships' attention they had had a specimen of what the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) on the first night of the Session had called a "chorus" upon the conduct of the Government. The noble Earl said there was a perfect "chorus" of voices condemning the conduct of the Government with respect to the cattle plague, and the specimen they had that evening showed that any course which the Government might have adopted would have met with similar treatment. He could only hope that those to whom the harmonies of sound were agreeable were pleased with the performance. The clause under the discussion of the House was of an extremely stringent—he might say, violent character. If it were proved as a matter of certainty that the disease could not be cured, then the course recommended in the clause would be the only rational one. But he believed it to be the unquestionable fact that in some districts, and in Forfarshire and Renfrewshire especially, a very considerable proportion of the cattle attacked by the disease were saved; and, such being the case, he could not bring his mind to vote in favour of a clause under which an animal on the point of convalescence might be slaughtered by the order of an inspector. It might be said that, after all, this was a Bill which would only remain in force for five weeks; but in that time the whole of the cattle in the kingdom might be slaughtered; and, therefore, he thought that a certain amount of discretion should be left to the local authorities, as it was unreasonable that animals should be killed when convalescent. He had seen a letter in one of the newspapers that morning from a very eminent man in which it was pointed out that with regard to epidemics of this kind, whether attacking man or beast, it was almost a general law that after a certain time, and after they have run a certain course, their violence and their virulence diminished, and they became more amenable to curative measures. At the present moment, in some parts of the country, the disease appeared to him to be entering into this mitigated stage, and in many counties was neither so prevalent nor so virulent as it had been. Yet by this clause it was enacted that all animals, however mildly attacked, and however great might be their chance of recovering, were to be at once killed. He agreed with the noble Lord (Lord Stanley of Alderley) that the animals which recovered were more valuable than they were before they had had the disease, and, therefore, the wrong would be greater to kill those which were likely to be cured. He could only repeat the remark he had made on the first night of the Session, that some discretion should be given to the local authorities in the matter.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he was afraid the noble Duke's fine ear for harmony must be somewhat jarred upon on the present occasion, as the course of proceeding he had adopted was almost unprecedented with regard to a Government measure. The House was called upon at twelve hours' notice to consider the provisions of a Bill upon which the Government implored them to abstain from introducing any Amendments whatever, as they were desirous of passing it without discussion and without delay; and then one if not two Members' of the Cabinet avowed their intention of opposing this most important clause. He had come down to that House willing and anxious to support Her Majesty's Government in carrying the Bill as it was passed by the House of Commons; but he could not sanction such a material alteration in the principle of the Bill as it was now proposed to effect.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, after the remarks that had fallen from the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Argyll), he must ask whether this Bill was brought forward upon the authority of Her Majesty's Government or not?

EARL GRANVILLE said, he had to state, in reply to the noble Earl who had acted so efficiently as the whipper-in of the Cabinet, that this Bill was brought in under the authority of the Government; but, as there was a general understanding that all party feeling was to be avoided in discussing the question, he could not prevent the noble Lords behind him from differing in their opinions any more than the noble Earl had been able to enforce a unanimous opinion among the noble Lords opposite.

THE EARL OF DERBY reminded the noble Earl that there was a great difference between views which might be expressed by independent Members, in whose hands the Bill had only just been placed, and those of Members of the Cabinet, who had had ample time to consider the question in all its bearings.

Clause 13 (Burial of diseased Animals).

THE MARQUESS OF BATH proposed an Amendment prohibiting cattle slaughtered under the Act from being buried within the limits of large towns. He understood that the soil of Liverpool was so rocky that there would be great difficulty in burying the slaughtered animals within the town, and in any case such a practice would be detrimental to the health of the inhabitants.

After short discussion,

Clause 14 (Purification of sheds, &c., of diseased Animals).

THE MARQUESS OF BATH inquired, whether it was intended by Government to issue any code of regulations by which the local authorities throughout the country might be guided as to the work of disinfection?

EARL GRANVILLE had no doubt the local authorities would adopt the proper regulations for carrying out the Act.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH thought the regulations to be adopted would require to be framed with scientific knowledge.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that some valuable suggestions on this subject were embodied in a paper appended to the first Report of the Royal Commission on the cattle plague.

EARL SPENCER considered it desirable that regulations should be framed for the local authorities, in order to enable them to carry out the system of disinfection on a uniform system.

EARL GRANVILLE would refer the noble Earl to the Report which had been drawn up on that subject by Dr. Lyon Playfair.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 15 (Slaughter of cattle herded with diseased Animals).

LORD WALSHINGHAM expressed his belief that this provision was entirely unnecessary, and would tend to destroy those herds which had given a reputation to the cattle of this country throughout the world. A case had come under his knowledge of an inspector, educated at the London Veterinary College, being called in by a farmer, and pronouncing that an animal had got the plague; but a different view prevailed with the farmers, the animal was put under proper treatment, and recovered, and no other animal had the disease. Under this Bill the whole herd might have been destroyed by the order of the inspector. He moved the omission of the clause.

LORD FEVERSHAM supported the Amendment.

LORD HOUGHTON, while admitting that this was a revolutionary measure, could not draw a distinction between that clause and the one preceding it. Both were enactments oppressive to individuals, and they would only be justified by a great emergency such as that which at present existed. There was no fear of the local authorities abusing the power given to them under this clause, for they would not be desirous of increasing the rate.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE thought it very hard upon the farmer that when healthy fat cattle were slaughtered by the order of an inspector, he should not be allowed to send them to market instead of receiving only a part of their value.

THE EARL OF DERBY reminded his noble Friend that the slaughter was not to be at the discretion of the inspector, but of the local authorities, and as they would have to bear their share of the loss, they would not unnecessarily increase the amount. There was a provision made which would meet the case to which his noble Friend referred, for it gave the farmer the option of taking three-fourths of the value, or taking the responsibility of sending the carcase up to the butcher. If they were to deal with the question by stringent regulations, they must endeavour to make the regulations as stringent as possible.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 16 agreed to.

Clause 17 (Regulations as to movement of Cattle).

LORD WALSHINGHAM did not see why the prohibition of the carriage of cattle by railway should not also apply to sheep. Whether sheep took the disease or not was a moot question, but there was no doubt it might be conveyed in their wool.

Clause 18.

In reply to The Earl of DALHOUSIE, EARL GRANVILLE stated that the payment of the inspectors would fall on the local rates.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 19 and 20 agreed to.

Clause 21 (Mode of levying and recovering Assessments of Cattle).

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH presented two petitions from towns in Scotland, stating that the words "lands and heritages" would include heritages in town as well as in country, and praying for an Amendment in favour of towns. His own opinion being that the calamity was a national one, he thought the towns as well as the counties should contribute to the rate to be levied under the Bill.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 34, Clause D (Continuance of Act).

THE EARL OF CARNARVON suggested that the wording as well as the working of the clause would be improved by the substitution for the words "it shall be lawful for Her Majesty in Council" of the words "it shall be lawful for any two or more of the Lords of the Privy Council." There might be difficulty in procuring the immediate attendance of more than two or three Members of the Privy Council at any particular time, and the above words were in conformity with the Act of 1848.

EARL GRANVILLE agreed with the noble Earl that the alteration would be very desirable; but as the Bill—with the generous co-operation of noble Lords on the opposite side of the House—had passed through so far without Amendments it would not be worth while, he thought, for the sake of a verbal improvement, merely to delay the final adoption of the measure.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

On Question that the Schedule be agreed to,

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH objected to the constitution into separate local authorities in Scotland of burghs which return or contribute to return a Member to Parliament. In the county of Ayr there were five such burghs, in Dumfries five, and in Elgin six. Of some of these places the population was exceedingly small; in one case there were only 568 persons in all, of whom but 23 were voters.

EARL GRANVILLE regretted that the noble Duke who was so well acquainted with the local matters referred to was not at the moment in his place. The point, however, he thought was a small one, remembering that the House had not rejected or altered any of the provisions of the Bill.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH differed from the noble Earl. He thought the point one of considerable importance.

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD called attention to a suggestion put forward, among others, by the local authorities of Liverpool, to the effect that permission should be given, where desirable, to dispose of the carcasses of diseased animals by other modes than that of burial.

EARL GRANVILLE thought that during the four or five weeks the Bill would be in operation, no real inconvenience could result from enforcing the process of burial, whereas experiments on the subject might be attended with serious consequences.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the clause relating to burial had been adopted, and the discussion accordingly was somewhat irregular. At the same time it might be worth mentioning, with a view to future legislation on the subject, that there were many districts in England, lying upon sandstone rock or gravelly soil, where it would be simply impossible to bury the animals as required by the Act "with not less than 6 feet of earth."

Schedule agreed to.

Clause 10 (Power of Entry for Inspectors, &c.).

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD said, he felt bound to press the following Amendment:—

"Provided always, that such inspector shall, if required, before entering state in writing the grounds on which he proposes to enter the said premises."

After ("required") moved to insert ("before entering.")—(The Earl of Lichfield.)

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported, without Amendment, and read 3^d and passed.

RAILWAY DEBENTURES REGISTRATION.—QUESTION.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, the Question which he was about to put arose from the fact that considerable alarm had been excited among the holders of debentures in consequence of some remarks which had been made at railway meetings to the effect that those bonds had been issued by railway companies in excess of their Parliamentary powers. He therefore wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he intends to propose any measure this Session for the registration of debentures issued by Railway Companies, with the view of enabling debenture holders or lenders of money on debentures to ascertain whether the Companies are in a position legally to issue such debentures?

MR. MILNER GIBSON: The subject to which the Question of his hon. Friend related has been considered, and a measure is in course of preparation for the purpose of giving security to the public that the statutory debentures issued by Railway Companies do not exceed the limits of the borrowing powers which such Companies are entitled to exercise under their Acts of Parliament.

DIRECTOR OF THE NATIONAL GALLERY.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT COURTENAY, in the absence of Lord Henry Lennox, asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Mr. Boxall, R.A., has been appointed to the post of Director of the National Gallery, in the place of the late Sir Charles Eastlake; and, if so, whether any and what alterations have been made in the relations existing between that officer and Her Majesty's Government?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in answering the Question just put to him he might also reply to another Question of which notice had been given. Mr. Boxall had been appointed to the office of Director of the National Gallery in place of the late Sir Charles Eastlake, and his relations to the Treasury were regulated by a Minute passed some years ago, which Minute had not undergone any alteration. Before advising the appointment of Mr. Boxall, his noble Friend at the head of the Government applied to those Trustees who took an active part in the administration of the National Gallery, and saw Lord Overstone and Mr. Russell, and took their advice. In making choice of Mr. Boxall, the noble Lord had been guided simply by a desire to obtain the most efficient man. He did not proceed upon the idea of creating any precedent or establishing any rule that the Director of the National Gallery must necessarily be a painter or an artist. No rule of that kind had been established; nor should any such rule be adopted, inasmuch as the appointment ought to be conferred solely according to the qualities and attainments of the individual, and not because of the profession he happened to pursue. Perhaps his noble Friend would like him also to state that in making the appointment he had reason to know that it was one which would have been recommended and was desired by the late deeply lamented Director of the National Gallery, Sir Charles Eastlake.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR asked, whether the appointment was for a period of years or for life?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER believed that the Minute of the Treasury directed that the appointment should be made for five years.

SEA FISHERIES COMMISSION. QUESTION.

MR. E. CRAUFURD asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is his intention to introduce any Bill during the present Session founded on the recommendations contained in the Report of the Sea Fisheries Commission?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the Report referred to a matter of very great importance, and one involving large interests. It had, however, been but a short time in the hands of the Government. He was, therefore, unable to say at present what course the Government would take in respect to it in the present Session.

CATTLE STATISTICS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN asked the President of the Board of Trade, When he will be able to lay upon the table of the House information with respect to the number of cattle in the United Kingdom? He also wished to know whether the Government intended to call for those Returns periodically or not?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the Returns of the number of cattle in the different parishes of Great Britain would be made by the 5th of March next, by the occupiers of land and others. No time would be lost in making up the aggregate Returns, and it was expected that they might be laid on the table immediately after the Easter recess. Those Returns were voluntary; but from the favourable disposition that had been evinced by magistrates, Boards of Guardians, and other local authorities, to co-operate with the Board of Trade in procuring those Returns, they might not unreasonably hope that the desired information would be satisfactorily obtained. With regard to the second Question, he would state that as the present attempt to obtain information was experimental, and until they had the test of experience, he would be unable to answer the inquiry.

COLONEL STUART asked, whether the whole of the cattle in the country would be included in the Returns?

MR. MILNER GIBSON replied, that the endeavour was being made to procure Returns relating to all the cattle in the country.

In reply to an hon. MEMBER behind the Ministerial Benches,

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he did not think it would be convenient to add another column to the schedule that was about to be sent to the farmers throughout the country in order that information might be procured as to the number of cattle in the country on the 1st of September. Whether it would be desirable to have a separate Return for that purpose he could not say without further consideration.

CATTLE PLAGUE (IRELAND). QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill applicable to Ireland on the subject of the Cattle Disease?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAWSON) said, a Bill had been prepared on the subject, and had been sent to Ireland for approval. As soon as it had been submitted to the Lord Lieutenant it would be laid before the House.

THE HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION (IRELAND) ACT—THE ROYAL ASSENT —THE SITTING ON SUNDAY.

MR. MAINWARING: I wish to ask the Government, Why, when moments were so very precious, Her Majesty was not in London on Saturday to give the Royal Assent to the Bill for suspending the Habeas Corpus in Ireland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think a short statement of the facts of the case will be the best answer to the Question put by the hon. Member, and will show that there are no grounds out of which any occasion for an inquiry of this nature could arise. A Cabinet Council was held on Friday, and it was late on the afternoon of that day that the Council determined to lay the Bill before the House at an early hour on Saturday. It happened that on Friday, the day on which the Council was held, Her Majesty was at Osborne.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH wished to ask the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary a Question upon a point of form, which was exciting considerable interest out of doors; whether, in point of fact, there was any illegality in the proceedings which took place on Sunday morning in the House of Lords; and, if so, if the Government were prepared to rectify it?

SIR GEORGE GREY: There was no illegality whatever in the matter. There is no law, Parliamentary or otherwise, to prevent the Houses of Parliament sitting on a Sunday when cases arise to render it necessary.

COMMITTEE (ON RE-COMMITMENT.)

[The Bill having been Committed, Re-committed, and Considered as Amended, without having been re-printed, great difficulty has been experienced in following out the Motions for Amendments, particularly those of which no Notice had been given. When a Clause has been agreed to, with or without Amendment, the small figures added refer to the No. of the corresponding Clause in the re-print of the Bill No. 24.]

Bill considered in Committee (on re-commitment.)

On the Preamble,

MR. NEWDEGATE asked, whether the attention of the Government had been called to the claims of insurance companies for compensation for the sums paid by them to persons whose cattle had been slaughtered; and, if their attention had been drawn to the matter, whether they intended to introduce a clause giving such compensation?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that as far as he was aware, the attention of the Government had not been drawn to the matter. He was bound to say, without giving a conclusive answer on a subject with which he might be imperfectly acquainted, that he saw no grounds for thinking that insurance companies were entitled to any compensation for the sums paid by them to farmers whose cattle had died from the plague. The insurance companies paid for the cattle that had died, merely to make up the losses of the farmers, while the object of the Bill was not to compensate the persons who had suffered, but to check the progress of the disease.

MR. NEWDEGATE thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer misunderstood the Question. What he wished to know was whether the companies were to be compensated, not for the sums they had paid to persons whose cattle had died, but for the sums they had paid to persons whose cattle had been slaughtered by the cattle inspectors.

MR. HUNT rose to order. They were now on the Preamble, and there was nothing in the Bill before the Committee bearing on the subject introduced by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate). The matter was a very fitting one for discussion at the proper time.
